LONDON, JULY 2, 1870.

THE LAMENTED ILLNESS of Lord Justice Giffard has obliged the Government to overcome its reluctance to appointing another Lord Justice. Vice-Chancellor James is to be promoted to the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy is to succeed the Vice-Chancellor, retaining his own work at the same time. Of Sir W. M. James's appointment we need say little; it cannot fail to give satisfaction to everyone concerned, as suitor or lawyer, in the business of the Lords Justices' Court. With regard to the subordinate appointment, we mean no disrespect to Mr. Bacon, who has made an excellent Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, when we say that it can be justifiable only on the ground that the High Court of Justice Bill is shortly to become law. Possibly in the present state of the bankruptcy business Mr. Bacon may be able to dispose of his work as Chief Judge in two or at most three days per week, though we do not imagine that such a possibility can endure long. But we do not regard it as an appropriate method of providing for the business of the Vice-Chancellor's court, to hand it over to the leisure time of another judge. Is it likely, again, that the business of the Bankruptcy Court can do anything but increase considerably above its present amount as the country becomes familiarised with the working of the new law? If such should prove the case, either the business must get in arrear or the Chief Judge must delegate largely to his registrars, and thus the success of the new law may be postponed indefinitely—for the public, if they try a new procedure and find it work inconveniently, will not bestow their confidence upon it.

IN THE LAST STAGE of the Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration Bill in the Upper House, Lord Chelmsford inserted an amendment providing that contracts for remuneration in litigious business shall be submitted to a taxing master before payment, with power to the master, if he should consider the sum unreasonable, to refer the matter to the Court, who may either reduce the sum or cancel the agreement. We adhere to the opinion which we expressed many years ago, as well as on the first introduction of this bill, that a distinction should be made between litigious and non-litigious business. Special agreements are inconvenient and inappropriate as to costs of actual litigation. Lord Chelmsford has recognised that principle, but his amendment appears to us very ill-calculated. It is of no use to attempt any such half measure. Either you must confer perfect freedom of contract, controllable only by the undefined equity jurisdiction against fraud, or you must hold your hand. It is futile to legalise stipulations as to costs, and then add a distrustful proviso like that of Lord Chelmsford's. The bill should either let the string go, or leave it as it is; it is of no use to slack it and then keep plucking at it. The good principle of the bill is the recognition in taxation of skill, labour and responsibility, instead of mere length and bulk; and a shorter enactment providing for that would be far more useful than such a measure as that which the Upper House have just passed.

WE PRINT IN ANOTHER COLUMN an abstract of the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons appointed to inquire into the state of the law affecting members of the House who have been reported guilty of corrupt practices by Commissions. The select committee contained two legal members, Sir Roundell Palmer and Mr. Russell Gurney. The report may, therefore, be considered, to some extent, as a legal authority. In fact, however, the legal points which the committee had to consider presented but little difficulty, the only one which could admit of doubt having been already decided by Mr. Justice Blackburn at Bewdley. The committee recommend two alterations of the law. As to one, the omission of the words "other than a candidate" from the 45th section of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, there can be no difference of opinion. In fact, this is another instance of the legislative slovenliness to which we called attention last week. The draughtsman or amender (we fancy it was the latter) desired to apply to the case of all persons guilty of corrupt practices the same disqualifications which a previous section had imposed on candidates. The process, however, upon which candidates were by the previous section to become subject to the disqualifications—viz., by the report of a judge trying an election petition was not applicable to persons other than candidates, for it would be a proceeding to which, in all probability, they would have been no parties. General words were, therefore, used for the case of persons other than candidates, and the result was to give a special immunity to candidates, as they became subject to the disqualifications only upon conviction in one particular manner, and that perhaps the least likely to occur, while other persons became for what is a less rather than a greater offence, subject to disqualification upon conviction in any proceeding to which they were parties. This obviously could never have been intended, and the committee's suggestion that the distinction ought not to continue must be acquiesced in. Their other recommendation, that the limitation of time within which prosecutions must be commenced shall be extended, in a particular way, seems to us much more doubtful. They propose that in any case in which lapse of time is not already, before the change of law, a conclusive bar, prosecutions may be commenced not only within a year after the commission of the offence but also within three months after the alleged offender shall have been reported guilty by a judge or by a commission. If corrupt practices are to be regarded as analogous to other criminal offences, the limitation should be done away with altogether. The policy of the Legislature hitherto has evidently been against permitting old misdoings of this character to be raked up long after their commission. It would be, in our opinion, far better to abrogate the limitation altogether as regards criminal prosecutions, leaving it to apply only to penal actions, which should still be brought only within a limited time, than to make a special exception that if the offence came to light in one particular mode proceedings might be taken. A distinction might also be made between punishment and disqualification. Even if it should not be thought expedient otherwise to punish offenders of bygone years, their offence might well be a good reason for holding them incapable of sitting in Parliament, at all events during the seven years during which they would have been incapable if the offence had been detected at the time.

ANYTHING TENDING TO FACILITATE and accelerate windings up will be welcomed by the public as well as by the profession. Mr. H. B. Sheridan's bill "for facilitating compromises and arrangements between the creditors and shareholders of joint-stock companies in liquidation"

tion," which has been read a second time by the House of Commons, would enact that any compromise proposed between a company and its creditors or any class of its creditors, or between the shareholders or any class of the shareholders shall, if assented to by a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of such creditors or class of creditors, shareholders or class of shareholders as the case may be, and confirmed by the Court, bind all such creditors or class of creditors, shareholders or class of shareholders. Under the present law a liquidator may propose a general scheme of arrangement with the creditors (Companies Act, 1862, s. 159), for confirmation by the Court, which, after confirmation will bind the creditors as well as the shareholders; and the Court has jurisdiction to confirm such a scheme even though some of the creditors dissent from it (Re Commercial Bank Corporation of India and the East, 17 W. R. 840). So too a liquidator may propose, and the Court may confirm a compromise with contributories (section 160); and although it is proper to communicate the proposed compromise to the creditors, and the Court will not sanction it behind their backs, still the Court has not refused to confirm because the creditors would not be paid in full (Re Smith, Knight & Co., 16 W. R. 1104). It is, therefore, difficult to see what is the exact object of Mr. Sheridan's bill beyond this, that a compromise under the Companies Act, 1862, must be general; whereas under the bill it may extend only to a class either of shareholders or creditors, and it must be noticed that in the bill as it stands, a compromise between the company and a class of creditors would not bind the general creditors, but only members of the class. One effect of the bill, if it became law, would be that the onus of deciding on the expediency and propriety of a proposed compromise would virtually rest not on the Court, but on the creditors or shareholders as the case might be, for the Court would, in the absence of strictly proved fraud, hardly withhold its sanction from any compromise assented to by the required majority. The proposed change is scarcely to be coveted in the interest of those who are unfortunate enough to be concerned in or with rotten companies.

A CORRESPONDENT WHOSE LETTER we print this week objects to some remarks in our last number upon the nature and object of the debtor's summons under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. We said that "the summons was not intended as a new and convenient means for the recovery of debts, but as a new and convenient test of insolvency." And we argued that, upon principle, where the debtor pays the debt and so shows himself to be solvent, the creditor should not have the costs of the summons. Our correspondent, on the other hand, regards the debtor's summons as a summary procedure for the recovery of debts. And he thinks that, as in the case of other legal proceedings for the recovery of debts, the costs ought to follow the event. As the question is one of importance, and as our correspondent has stated his views with force and clearness, we give our reasons for differing from him.

The main principle which underlies all bankruptcy legislation is this,—that if a man is insolvent and cannot pay all his creditors in full, they shall at least all fare alike and be paid rateably. In order to give effect to this principle the Act of 1869, like its predecessors, endeavours to secure that if a man is insolvent, the fact shall be discovered as quickly as possible, and the doctrine of equality applied. This is, in modern times, the object of defining acts of bankruptcy. The older acts of bankruptcy were found in many cases insufficient; and accordingly in the bill of 1869, as it was first framed, a new act of bankruptcy was introduced (one which even our correspondent will probably admit to have been meant as a mere test of insolvency)—namely, failure to pay a debt of £50 in the case of a trader for seven days, in the case of a non-trader for three weeks, after a demand in writing with notice that non-payment will be followed by a petition in bankruptcy. During the progress of the bill through Parliament, this act of bankruptcy was struck out and the present enactments as to debtors' summonses were substituted. These considerations seem to show pretty clearly what the object of the debtor's summons is.

But let us now look at the class of cases in which alone a debtor's summons can be obtained. No creditor can have such a summons unless his debt amounts to £50. This is a very intelligible rule if the debtor's summons is meant as a mere preliminary to bankruptcy; perfectly unintelligible if it is meant as a process for the simple recovery of debts.

But look, further, at the proceedings upon a debtor's summons. In form it is, as our correspondent points out, to resemble a writ in a court of law; but form does not seem to us very important. What are the proceedings upon it? What is the consequence of disobedience? for that is the true test of the object of the summons. If that object be the recovery of a debt, what is the logical result of disobedience? Judgment and execution for the defendant. But what is the consequence of disobedience to a judgment-summons? Bankruptcy; a process the very object of which is to prevent any one creditor from recovering his debt, unless there is enough to pay other creditors also. But suppose the debtor, instead of simply neglecting the summons, gives security for his debt, what then? In that case the creditor must at once begin an action for his debt or forfeit the security. Is the summons in that case a remedy for recovering the debt? Lastly, the debtor may pay the debt. If he does so, he does so either being solvent or not being solvent. If he is solvent, he might have been made to pay by ordinary process of law, and the judgment-summons was unnecessary; the case was not within the mischief aimed at by the section. But, on the other hand, as our correspondent points out, he may pay in obedience to the debtor's summons, when he is not solvent. Our correspondent, if we understand him rightly, speaks of a case in which he, by this means, obtained payment in full of a debt from a man who was, in fact, insolvent. If so, he undoubtedly did what was perfectly right both in law and in morals, and his client ought to be very much obliged to him. But he also did the very thing which it is the object of the whole law of bankruptcy to prevent; he secured from an insolvent man payment of one creditor in full instead of an equal distribution of the assets between them all. Would he seriously say that the debtor's summons was intended to facilitate such a course?

A CURIOUS BLUNDER appears in the return of county court business for 1869 recently issued. Circuit No. 38 is set down as only having issued 1,282 plaints, an error of 10,000 too little, which is easily discoverable by adding up the numbers issued at each court in the circuit. Two of the sixteen courts issued larger numbers each than the number set down for the whole circuit, a fact which ought to have rendered the blunder so conspicuous to the most casual of glances as to have ensured its instant detection. The blunder is, in fact, surrounded by figures, which make it as conspicuous as any blunder in figures can be. It is, of course, a misprint, but on turning to the summary it is there found reproduced in the midst of figures, which render it even more conspicuous than before. Probably no great harm can result from such an error, but the carelessness which renders it possible tends to raise doubts as to the accuracy of the return as a whole.

THE SOCIETIES OF THE MIDDLE TEMPLE and Gray's Inn have appointed committees to enter into communication with the Legal Education Association, whose circular we recently published. The Inner Temple and Lincoln's Inn are understood to have each decided their willingness to enter into communications with the other Inns, but to have declined, for the present at any rate, to recognise the new association. Sir Roundell Palmer writes to the Times stating that his own motion that the Society of Lincoln's Inn should appoint a committee with the association was lost by a majority of one only; adding, "The benchers, however, of Lincoln's Inn, in the resolution by which they determined to open such communications with the other Inns of Court, have declared their sense of the importance of further improvements in the system of legal education, and in the qualifications for admission to the profession of the law. And the majority of one against my own proposition would not have been obtained without the concurrence of some who are certainly zealous for reforms in this direction, and who stated that they did not intend to preclude themselves from hereafter advocating communication with the Council of the Legal Education Association if they should think it expedient to do so, in the interest of those reforms, though they were opposed to an immediate vote in favour of that course." Lincoln's Inn have granted the use of their hall for a meeting of the Association, to be held at half-past four o'clock on Wednesday next.

LEGAL REFORMS.

No one can fairly accuse the present generation of lawyers of unwillingness to suggest legal reforms of all kinds. It is true that it is not easy to get them to agree as to the way in which these reforms should be made, but there is no longer that feeling of stubborn opposition to reform, merely because reform implies change, that used once to exist. We have now plans for complete codes of the law, for digests of the law, and for a combination of codes and digests; schemes have been suggested for an entire alteration of the present judicial system and for establishing throughout the country local courts of first instance, in which all actions should be commenced. Others again advocate merely an extension of the powers of the county courts without giving them any exclusive jurisdiction. Last, but not least, there is the proposal that law and equity should be fused, and some reformers even propose that trial by jury should, not perhaps be abolished, but be limited to criminal and some specified classes of civil trials.

We have noticed from time to time most of these schemes, and indeed there is little danger of such great alterations as these being carried out without ample consideration and discussion. There is some danger, however, in the midst of suggested changes of such magnitude, that some of the evils in our present legal system which do not involve any great legal principle may be allowed to remain unnoticed and unchanged. Whatever may hereafter be the result of the present desire for legal reform, we may be sure that much of the existing procedure will still continue in use. Under any system there must be trials of questions of fact, and arguments on questions of law; there must be applications for new trials, arguments on agreed states of fact, and appeals of all sorts from the inferior to the superior courts, to say nothing of whole classes of less important proceedings. The lesser machinery by which all this is now carried out will in all probability be used, even although the present constitution of the courts of law may undergo much alteration. Although this is a question of detail, it is of great importance. By bad rules for the regulation of these matters a system excellent in other respects may be so clogged as to operate most perniciously; while, on the other hand, law faulty in theory may, by a consistent arrangement of its every-day operations, be so administered as to be rendered tolerable.

The daily experience of any barrister or solicitor in large practice will furnish abundant examples of needless delay and expense, those two crying evils of all litigation in the present working of the law—not caused by the nature of the law itself, but solely by bad rules and practice under which the administration of the law is at present carried out. We will take a few instances to explain our meaning. By the old common law rule only one plea could be pleaded to each count of a declaration, only one replication to each plea, &c. This has been altered by statute, and any number of defences may be pleaded or replied; but except in certain specified cases, this can only be done by leave of a judge (now, under the new practice, of a master) at chambers. The consequence of requiring this leave is, that in any case when it is desired to plead pleas not falling within the permitted list, the defendant must go to the expense and suffer the delay of obtaining this leave (unless he obtains the consent of the opposite party) before he can plead, no matter how regular and common-place the pleas may be, and although their allowance is a mere matter of course about which there can be no substantial dispute. In an action on a contract the defendant frequently desires to put the plaintiff to strict proof of his case, and therefore pleads that he never made the contract, and that he did not break the contract. There is no objection to his so pleading; but, by the present rules, he must obtain leave to do so. Not only does this directly cause much inconvenience, but it also indirectly causes an immense amount of unnecessary, and, therefore, objectionable squabbling over matters as to which there should be no contention. As the defendant is obliged to obtain leave to plead, the plaintiff is, we may say, invited by the practice to oppose the granting of such leave, and applications for leave to plead are habitually opposed, or rather the form of opposing them is gone through merely because the plaintiff does not like to yield without opposition a point which he is thus urged to resist.

Precisely the same evils follow from the practice of requiring that neither party to an action shall administer interrogatories to the opposite party until he has obtained leave of a judge at chambers. No matter how simple and fair are the interrogatories, they are as a matter of fact nearly always opposed by the other side. The present practice assumes that pleas and interrogatories are prima facie unreasonable, and ought to be opposed, and consequently they are opposed. The costs of opposing in these cases are generally costs in the cause, and, therefore, there is no reason why this sort of opposition should cease.

The mischief of the practice is so glaring that it is almost universally admitted, but nevertheless it is still allowed to exist. To remedy these evils would, however, be very easy, and the change might be effected by the slightest possible alteration of the present rules. Allow any defendant to plead any pleas he likes, and either party to an action to administer any interrogatories he likes to the opposite party, no matter how objectionable or improper, and let the objection to the pleas or the interrogatories come from the plaintiff or the person interrogated. Let the onus of proof be on those objecting to the pleas or interrogatories, and not on those propounding them. If the pleas or interrogatories are embarrassing, unfair, or objectionable—that is if they ought not to be pleaded or administered—let there be the most complete means of setting them aside, but let them be delivered first. If this rule were followed, and if the unsuccessful party, whichever he might be (unless, of course, there were exceptional circumstances in the case), had to pay the costs at once to the other side, we should find as a general rule that objectionable pleas and interrogatories would not be delivered, and good pleas and interrogatories would not be objected to. The costs of these applications should abide the event of the application, and not of the ultimate result of the cause.

The practice in granting rules nisi in court is also open to much objection. We do not say that the evils of so doing are by any means as serious as those we have just pointed out, but there are strong reasons for thinking that there should be no rules nisi, but that in all applications for such rules cause should be shown in the first instance. The rule nisi is granted upon an ex parte statement of facts and on a one-sided argument as to the law; it is therefore, comparatively speaking, easy to get a rule nisi, although not so easy to retain it. Either party to a suit who may wish to delay the proceedings has therefore every incentive offered to him to move for a rule nisi. It is made as easy for him as possible, and when obtained it not only defers the ultimate result of the proceedings and increases the costs, but it very often gives the party obtaining it a great apparent advantage to which he may be in no way entitled, and which he could not have obtained if the other side had been heard when he made the application. Whenever a rule nisi is either discharged or made absolute the facts of the case must have been twice stated to the Court, and the law on the point twice argued, and the decision of the Court is thus most unnecessarily deferred for the period intervening between the granting and the making absolute or discharging the rule.

Demurrers are another evil of our system. It is not too much to say that a demurrer hardly ever decides the questions really in issue between the parties. A demurrer is an objection of law taken to a statement of the facts made by one party to a suit in his pleadings. The statements made in pleadings, which purport to set out the facts of the case in detail, are rarely accurate, and consequently the usual effect of the judgment on the demurrer is to decide the law on a hypothetical state of facts, but not on the facts really existing in the case. Demurrers in practice are far more frequently used to "hang up" a cause than for any other reason. If judiciously used in this way they very often stave off a final decision in a case for a year or more, to say nothing of the right of appeal.

All the supposed advantages of demurrers might be gained by creating a quick and ready tribunal for stating special cases. When the parties are agreed or nearly agreed as to the facts there is no better way of obtaining a judicial decision than on a special case; but unfortunately there is at present no way in which a special case can be stated (unless, of course, the parties are quite agreed on every point) except by leaving it to a referee, a process which too often has the effect of involving the parties in all the miseries of an arbitration before their suit is well commenced. A tribunal which would put an end to this abuse would be a great boon to litigants. When parties are not to some extent agreed upon the facts it would be far better that the facts should be ascertained in the usual way before the law applicable to the facts of the case is discussed.

We have taken at random these rules of practice as instances of the importance of looking narrowly at the law in its hourly operation as well as at its general symmetry and effect as a whole. We do not wish to suggest a doubt as to the necessity for considerable changes in the structure of the law, but we urge that such changes should be accompanied by a careful examination of details. It is said that there can be no right without a remedy, and therefore the remedy is as important as the right. The one cannot exist without the other. The right is a matter of legal principle; the remedy is for the most part (although not exclusively) a matter of detail. It is necessary that legal reformers should remember that a simple and expeditious procedure for the enforcement of rights is not less important than a clear enunciation of such rights and the establishment of competent courts for their recognition.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

LIABILITY OF SEPARATE PROPERTY FOR DEBTS CONTRACTED BEFORE COVERTURE.

Chubb v. Stretch, V. C. M., 18 W. R. 483, L. R. 9 Eq. 555.

The decision in this case, that property settled to a woman for her separate use is liable after her husband's bankruptcy for debts contracted before marriage, follows the early case of Biscoe v. Kennedy, cited in a foot-note to the report of the leading case of Hulme v. Tenant (1 Bro. C. C. 17). In Biscoe v. Kennedy, a creditor who had sued the husband and wife jointly for a bond debt contracted by the wife before coverture, and recovered nothing from the husband, who absconded and was outlawed, filed his bill to be paid out of the settled property of the wife, and obtained a decree. It may or may not have been the ratio decidendi in Biscoe v. Kennedy, that the settlement was fraudulent and void under the statute of Elizabeth as against an existing creditor, but we infer from the observations of the Court in Chubb v. Stretch, that the rule applies to separate estate in general, whether settled by the wife or not. By the common law, the husband is liable for his wife's debts contracted before coverture; and it follows from this as a consequence, that if judgment be recovered against the husband and wife for such a debt, which the husband is unable to pay and becomes bankrupt, on his discharge the debt is gone, and the wife released in the event of her surviving (Miles v. Williams, 1 P. Wms. 249). Upon this principle, to a declaration against husband and wife for a debt due from the wife before coverture, the husband's discharge under the Insolvent Act was held a good plea (Lockwood v. Salter, 5 B. & Ald. 303). Courts of common law cannot reach the separate estate in these cases, but could before imprisonment for debt was abolished do what was done in Sparkes v. Bell (8 B. & C. 1), where a wife had been taken in execution, viz., refuse to discharge her, unless it appeared that she had no separate estate out of which she could pay her debts. By the husband's discharge, as we have already seen, the wife's personal liability is extinguished, yet her separate property is not discharged thereby, but remains liable in equity to satisfy the debt. This was recognised at common law in Lockwood v. Salter (ubi sup.), and is distinctly laid down in the present case. But a bill will not lie unless the legal remedy against the husband is gone. For this reason an earlier bill, in Biscoe v. Kennedy, filed before the outlawry of the husband, was dismissed. Unless his remedy at law be gone, the creditor cannot come into equity.

OF THE JURISDICTION TO WIND UP COMPANIES WHICH ARE VIRTUALLY FOREIGN ONES.

Re General Company for the Promotion of Land Credit, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 605, L. R. 5 Ch. 363.

This virtually foreign company was formed under the Companies Act, 1862, and it had a registered office in London, though the members, property, management, and directors were abroad. The fact of registration under the Companies Act, and that the registered office was in England, sufficed to give the Court jurisdiction to wind the company up, as in the case of the Madrid and Valencia Railway Company (3 De G. & Sm. 127), where a company had been provisionally registered with the object of forming a company in Spain for the construction of a railway, to be conducted by a board in London, where the registered office was situate, assisted by a committee at Madrid, and the Court made the order notwithstanding the connection of the undertaking with Spain in origin, constitution, and character. In the case of the Factage Parisien (18 W. R. 380) the management was in England and the business in Paris. In the case of the Peruvian Railway Company (15 W. R. 1002) there was a board of directors in London, and the funds were to be expended in Peru, and in both cases the usual winding-up order was made. In a case which goes further than these (Re Commercial Bank of India, 16 W. R. 1104) the sole fact of an agency branch existing in London was held to give the Court jurisdiction in the case of an Indian Company. In Re Union Bank of Calcutta (8 De G. & Sm. 253) the circumstances were similar, and the jurisdiction was not denied, though the order was refused on the ground of expediency. In fact, if the registered office be here, there is clear jurisdiction to wind up the company, and it matters not where the business is being carried on. But the Court will pause, as in Re Union Bank of Calcutta, where there are obstacles in the way of carrying the order into execution, even where the jurisdiction is not disputed. Whether it be expedient that foreigners should be allowed to come here and register companies for essentially foreign objects is a question into which we do not enter now, but that they can do this is quite clear. Every company under English law must have a registered office situate in the United Kingdom, and if the registered office be situate in England the Court may wind it up, though all the members be foreigners, and it has never transacted business in England. Such a company is now an English company, whether its members be foreigners or other persons; and if it contemplate some kind of business and some kind of management in England, it may be properly registered as an English company, though it would seem that if it ceases to carry on business here at any time, it may be ordered to be wound up solely on that account, though we believe that there is no express decision to that effect.

LIFE ASSURANCE POLICIES NO CHARGE ON THE FUNDS OF THE SOCIETY.

Re International Life Assurance Company. McIver's Claim, V.C.M., 18 W. R. 539.

That a policy of life assurance in the usual form creates no charge on the funds of the society for the amount assured was decided in Re State Fire Assurance Company (11 W. R. 1011), dubitant Knight Bruce, L.J. But the law on this point may be regarded as settled since the decision of Wood, V.C., in Kearns v. Leaf, 12 W. R. 462. The holders of such policies, are, therefore, simple contract creditors, and upon the winding-up of the society they can only come in amongst the general creditors and prove for the amount of their respective claims. In the policies issued by the International Life Assurance Company there was a proviso that the amount assured should be payable only after satisfying all assurances previously payable, and all prior charges on the funds of the society, to which the claims of the assured were restricted in the usual manner. It was contended in this case, but without success, that under the foregoing proviso policies subsequently becoming payable ought to be postponed to those previously becoming payable. Had a charge been created, then we presume that the claims of policyholders would have to be met according to priority of date of the policies maturing. But as between simple contract creditors there is no priority, and the consequence was, that the holders of policies already matured were held not to be entitled to be paid before provision was made for the holders of current policies, who are entitled, accordingly to the recent decision of James, V.C., in Bell's case (18 W. R. 688), to prove for such sum as would be required to furnish them with policies in all respects similar to their own, in an office as nearly as possible resembling the office in liquidation. The decision has since been affirmed by the Lord Justice (18 W. R. 794).

See, however, Re International Life Assurance Society, Warner's Claim (18 W. R. 593), where Vice-Chancellor Malins held that the holder of a current policy was entitled to prove for the amount of premium already paid, with interest at five per cent.

APPLICATION FOR SHARES—AGENCY.

Re International Contract Company. Levita's Case, L.J. G., 18 W. R. 476.

The observation of Vice-Chancellor Wood in Re Saloon Steam Packet Company (16 W. R. 75), that three things are requisite to constitute or ascertain the position of a shareholder—first, application; second, allotment; third, communication of and acquiescence in the allotment—was calculated to mislead, and did in fact mislead, many people. The word “acquiescence” was unfortunately brought in. The truth is that after communication the contract is clinched, and so far from the allottee's acquiescence being necessary, it is not in his power to recede: subject to this, that until a communication of the allotment has been made the applicant is at liberty to withdraw his offer, and (as in Baily's case, 16 W. R. 1093) the company must not take an unreasonably long time before they allot or the allottee will be at liberty to repudiate even after communication. In Levita's case Levita had signed an application for shares at the request of McHenry, who told him that he should have no further trouble in the matter. He accordingly signed the application and returned it to McHenry who forwarded it to the company. The allotment was made and notified to McHenry (the shares being registered in Levita's name), but not to Levita, who never heard anything further of the matter until the winding-up. These at least were the facts upon which the decision proceeded. The Court regarded Levita as having signed his application and handed it to McHenry to do what he liked with, trusting to him for indemnity: he was therefore to be treated as having constituted McHenry his agent in every respect. It followed, of course, that the notification of the allotment to McHenry completed the contract between the company and Levita. This decision is therefore in perfect accordance with the principles on which the Court has acted in all the previous cases, and with those which Vice-Chancellor Wood's subsequent decisions show that he intended to lay down in the Saloon Steam Packet Company's case (ubi sup.). For a case in which the Court were not satisfied of the fact of agency, see Re Peruvian Railways Company. Robinson's case (17 W. R. 454).

COMMON LAW.

MARINE INSURANCE — CHARTERED FREIGHT — TOTAL LOSS—ABANDONMENT.

Potter v. Rankin, Ex. Ch., 18 W. R. 607.

The facts of this case were somewhat unusual, and they gave rise to a great difference of judicial opinion upon some important points of the law of marine insurance. The plaintiff's vessel was chartered to sail from Glasgow to New Zealand, and from thence to Calcutta, there to load a cargo for London. The freight from Calcutta to London was insured by the plaintiff, the risk to attach only during the voyage to and the stay at New Zealand.

The vessel, which was also insured in a separate policy, received injuries at New Zealand during the insured voyage. These injuries would have justified an abandonment of the vessel, but the plaintiff did not then know and could not ascertain the extent of the injuries which were, in fact, not ascertained until more than a year afterwards at Calcutta (whither the vessel sailed in prosecution of the chartered voyage) when the plaintiff abandoned the vessel to the underwriter on the vessel, and the freight to the underwriters on freight. The vessel could have been repaired so as to enable her to proceed on her voyage, but only at a cost greater than her value. The question was whether the plaintiff could recover for a total loss of freight.

The Court of Common Pleas held (16 W. R. 1049), that the plaintiff could not recover on the ground that he was in a dilemma. Either he claimed for an actual total loss or a constructive total loss. He could not claim for an actual total loss because the vessel existed at Calcutta before her abandonment in specie, and the freight might have been earned only it would have cost more to do so than it was worth. If he claimed for a constructive total loss he could not recover unless he had duly abandoned the freight, and the Court thought that under the circumstances he had not done so in time as there had been an unreasonable delay in giving the notice to the underwriters. This judgment has now been overruled by the Exchequer Chamber, but with some difference of opinion amongst the learned judges.

Cleasby, B., thought that there was not an actual total loss of the freight, and that therefore the plaintiff could only recover, if at all, by showing a constructive total loss, and that he failed to establish this, as he thought that there had been unnecessary delay in giving the notice of abandonment. Cleasby, B., was therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas should be affirmed. The other learned judges thought that the judgment ought to be reversed. Cockburn, C.J., seems to have been of opinion, although he does not distinctly state it, that there was a constructive total loss, but that it was of such a kind that no notice of abandonment was necessary. He says: "It is enough to say that to necessitate notice of abandonment there must be an actual, tangible, and appreciable right or interest capable of being transferred; as for instance, in the case of freight where the cargo is already on board, and the shipowner would have the right of sending it on to its destination in another ship, and so earning the freight." He thought, however, that it was not necessary to determine this point, because he was of opinion that the notice of abandonment was in fact sufficient. Kelly, C.B., Channell, B., and Lush, J., held that there was an actual and not a constructive total loss of the freight, and therefore that no notice of abandonment was necessary; but they also thought that notice of abandonment, if necessary, had been given in time.

There was a further point suggested in the case—viz., whether a shipowner, who having insured both ship and freight, abandons the ship to the underwriters on the ship in order to claim for a constructive total loss loses the right to claim on the policy on freight, inasmuch as by his own act he incapacitates himself from carrying on the cargo and so earning the freight.

Cleasby, B., seemed to think that the shipowner under such circumstances would lose his right to claim on the policy for freight, but Cockburn, C.J., expressed a very strong opinion that the affirmative of "the position appears to me to be altogether untenable in principle, and one which would lead to very inconvenient consequences." The other learned judges do not deal at length with this question, but it may be gathered that they agree with the view of Cockburn, C.J. The points actually decided in this case are therefore (1) that where freight is lost under circumstances similar to those in Potter v. Rankin no notice of abandonment is necessary to entitle the assured to recover from the underwriters as for a total loss; (2) that even a delay of more than a year between the time when a vessel is injured and the date of notice of abandonment may be not unreasonable under special circumstances. No clear general rule is laid down on the question as to the time within which notice of abandonment ought to be given. This subject, however, has lately been considered in Currie v. Bombay Native Insurance Company (P.O., 15 W. R. 296), which we noticed a short time ago (ante 372), and in that case the general rule on the subject is clearly stated.

EVIDENCE—ADMISSION BY CONDUCT.

Moriarty and Wife v. London, Chatham, & Dover Railway Company, Q. B., 18 W. R. 625.

The general rule that hearsay evidence is not admissible at a trial is subject to several exceptions, one of which is that the "direct admissions of a party to a suit, and admissions which may be implied from his conduct, are evidence against him." (Roscoe Ev. 11th ed. 56.)

The simplest possible instance of an admission by a party to an action is the case where a written receipt is given acknowledging that a specified sum of money has been received. If the person who gives the receipt subsequently brings an action for the money so acknowledged to have been received by him the receipt will be evidence and generally conclusive evidence against him that the money he claims has been paid to him.

The receipt is an admission by him that he has received the money. He may explain any special facts connected with the giving of the receipt which show that he did not in fact receive the money, as by showing that the receipt was given under some mistake of fact, or was obtained by fraud. Although presumptions raised by such admissions may be thus rebutted they are always evidence for what they are worth, and generally, of course, such admissions as these are of the greatest possible value. Precisely the same rule applies to a verbal admission as if in the case we have just put the acknowledgment of the receipt of the money had been merely verbal. It is usually more difficult to prove a verbal than a written statement, but when proved the effect is the same. We are not now speaking of written statements under seal, which operate not merely as admissions but have in consequence of a technical rule of law the further effect of creating an estoppel. Evidence of an admission by the conduct of a party to a suit may be given against him in the same way as his verbal or written admissions, and it has been held that the raising an objection to one item of the account, no remark being made as to the rest, will be evidence of an account stated as to those items on which no objection has been made. (Chisman v. Count, 2 Man. & G. 307.)

The application of these rules was the question in dispute in Moriarty v. London, &c., Railway Company. The action was for damages for an injury sustained by the plaintiff's wife upon the defendants' railway. The substantial question of fact was, were the defendants guilty of negligence. The defendants tendered the evidence of a witness to show that the plaintiff and one Cox, the clerk to the plaintiff's attorney, had admitted that they had tampered with one of three plaintiff's witnesses. The defendants also called the other witnesses to prove that Cox had endeavoured to procure false testimony from them for the plaintiff. Neither the plaintiff nor Cox had been called as witnesses.

If they had been called as witnesses, there is but little doubt (although there is some conflict of authority even upon this point) that the evidence tendered by the defendant, would have been admissible to impeach the character of the plaintiff and of Cox. As neither the plaintiff nor Cox were called, the evidence went not to affect the credit of any witness, but to affect the credit of the cause itself. The question was, could such evidence be admitted. Lush, J. admitted it at the trial, and his ruling was upheld although a new trial was granted on another ground.

Evidence of this sort is very peculiar. It no doubt is very good for the purpose of showing that the party thought he could not establish his cause by legitimate methods, but it is difficult to see on what particular issue in a trial such evidence would bear. If there is but one issue as, for instance, if the only question is whether the defendant executed a particular deed, an admission by him that he had a bad cause might be tantamount to an admission that he had executed the deed. If, however, there are several distinct issues, such evidence as this is worth little more than general evidence of bad character of a party to the action, which would clearly not be admissible. The only case which is an authority for receiving the evidence tendered in Moriarty v. London, &c., Railway Company is Annesley v. Earl of Anglesey, an Irish case (17 How. St. Tr. 1189), decided in 1748. It was an action of ejectment, and evidence was admitted to prove that the defendant had prosecuted the plaintiff for an alleged murder, and had said to his (defendant's) attorney in speaking of that prosecution "that he (the defendant) did not care if it cost him £10,000 if he could get the plaintiff hanged, for then he (the defendant) would be easy in his title and estate." This was admitted as a kind of general admission by the defendant of the plaintiff's title. The facts of that case are, however, in many respects very peculiar. The judgments delivered in Moriarty v. London, &c., Railway Company do not rely so much on Annesly v. Earl of Anglesey as on the general principle that the evidence was "good evidence, that the cause was bad."

Although, as we have pointed out, such evidence as this may be as vague for all practical purposes as evidence of a general character, yet its admission seems in accordance with the principle which admits evidence of an offer of a compromise (unless made "without prejudice") as some evidence of liability by the person making it (see Taylor on Evidence, 5th ed. 697). It is probable that cases will but seldom arise where evidence such as that admitted in Moriarty v. London &c. Railway Company can be procured. Where, however, such evidence is admitted it will require more than usual care on the part of the presiding judge to prevent its having in many cases an undue effect. Unless very carefully dealt with evidence of this kind is more likely to excite the prejudices of the jury than to afford them a clue to ascertain the facts which are in issue before them.

REVIEWS.

The Practice of the High Court of Chancery, as Altered by Recent Statutes, and by the Consolidated and Other General Orders of the Court; comprising Proceedings by Bill, Information, Special Case, Summons, Petition of Right, and under the Charitable Trusts Acts, the Settled Estates Acts, and the Infants Marriage Act. Ninth Edition. By HUBERT AYCKBOURN, a Solicitor of the Court. London: Wildy & Sons.

We have had occasion in past years to review several earlier editions of this useful book, which is as popular among solicitors as "Daniell" is among barristers. Since the eighth edition was noticed by us several important Acts have passed, such, for instance, as the new Partition Act, the last of the Judgment Acts, the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, &c., &c. These new matters have been treated, and the new decisions noted, while by curtailing the text the work has been kept within the size of the previous edition. It would be impossible to compress in one duodecimo volume of 700 pages all that is contained in the three volumes of Daniell; and it would also be impossible to carry Daniell in your pocket as you can Ayckbourn. The compression is very judiciously done, and all the decisions are to be found in the notes. This edition of Ayckbourn is a very useful guide. Testing it in subjects on which important decisions have been recently delivered—such, for instance, as taxation of costs, or revivor and supplemental bill—we find that the new cases are all noted at the proper places.

An Historical Sketch of the French Bar, from its Origin to the Present day; with Biographical Notices of some of the Principal Advocates of the Present Century. By ARCHIBALD YOUNG, Advocate. Edinburgh: Edmonston & Douglas.

Any lawyer who cares to learn what is the history and constitution of the French bar will find this an interesting book, in which the profession of advocacy in France is traced from the middle ages to the modern days of Berryer or Jules Favre. Wager of battle, while it endured in France, appears to have been attended with a danger to the advocate which we do not remember to have heard of as a contingency under the English law. The advocate had to be very careful of his words whenever the proceedings took this form, or he might find himself under an obligation of defending his client with more tangible weapons than mere words. "Antoine Loisel," says Mr. Young in a note, "makes mention of an advocate named Favrefort, who was on the point of being compelled to enter the lists in person, because, while stating the case for Armand de Montaignu, one of the parties in a judicial combat, he affirmed that he was ready to make good his averments with his body in the field, without taking care to make it clear that he said this for his client and not for himself. Those present on the occasion thought the matter a capital joke." Did Favrefort, we wonder? Such a contingency would have been just the very thing for Sir Jonah Barrington and the fire-eating Irish bar described in his memoirs. In perusing the numerous accounts which Mr. Young has given us of the most eminent French lawyers, advocates, and their great successes, one cannot help remarking how very much we hear of their rhetoric and their eloquence, and how very little of any other of the qualifications of a barrister.

The Medical Practitioner's Legal Guide on the Laws Relating to the Medical Profession. By HUGH WEIGHTMAN, M.A., Barrister-at-Law. London: H. Renshaw, 356, Strand. 1870.

Mr. Weightman tells us in his preface that this work is a substitute for a new edition which he had at one time thought of bringing out, of Mr. Willcock's treatise on "The Laws Relating to the Medical Profession, with an Account of the Rise and Progress of its Various Orders," published nearly forty years ago. He found, however, that the amount of new matter which subsequent legislation had supplied was so great that he thought it better to re-write the work, merely acknowledging in his preface his obligations to the earlier treatise of Mr. Willcock. In this we think he was right. The effect, however, of the introduction into a "Medical Practitioner's Legal Guide," of matter appropriate enough to Mr. Willcock's history of the rise and progress of the medical profession, is at first sight somewhat incongruous. We have, in a chapter entitled ancient orders of the medical profession, notices of druids, alchymists, witches, and astrologers, and a quotation from Spenser's Faerie Queene about a sweet lass who deftly converted her white smock into bandages for dislocated bones. Besides these materials supplied by Mr. Willcock, we find matter of somewhat similar character, apparently written by the author—biographical notices of Hippocrates and Galen, anecdotes of bishops who have been doctors, and clergymen who have become professors of anatomy, and also a remarkable anecdote of an intimate friend of the author's family, who committed suicide in so ingenious and skilful a manner, that if he had not done it before spectators, the cause of his death would never have been known. We have said enough to show that the "Legal Guide" contains a certain amount of gossip as well as guidance. The effect, however, is to make the book far more readable than it otherwise would be, and we suspect that Mr. Weightman has been imitating a practice adopted by those for whom he writes, and endeavouring to gild the very substantial pill which he subsequently administers in the shape of about 250 pages of Acts of Parliament. The Acts of Parliament, and the chapters explanatory of them, are the most useful part of the work. The author also gives chapters on subjects but remotely connected with the medical profession, such as defamation of character and the law of copyright. Where he quotes cases he generally gives the decision at considerable length, for the very good reason that he is writing principally for persons to whom reports are not easily accessible. This method has the further effect of securing that the law laid down is in most cases reliable, and we have only detected one instance in which there is a chance of a reader being misled. This is by the statement given at page 71 of what was said by Chief Justice Erle in Turner v. Raynall (14 C. B. N. S. 228), to the effect that it is enough to enable a firm of medical practitioners to recover their fees, if one member of the firm is registered under the medical Act. The difference between a dictum and a decision is scarcely likely to be understood by a non-legal reader, and what was said by the Chief Justice seems to have been so little considered that we cannot recognise it as any guide at all, much less as indicating that even in that learned judge's opinion an unqualified person as well as an unregistered one might in partnership with a registered practitioner recover fees. It is only fair to say that Mr. Weightman does not treat this point as having been so decided, but he seems to think it possible that it might be, for which in our opinion the dictum in question, uttered in a case where all the plaintiffs were properly qualified, though one was not registered until after action brought, is no authority at all. On the whole, however, we have no doubt that members of the medical profession will find a great deal of useful information in this book, and find it in a readable form.

The work would have been improved by more attention to details. The index is a very bad one, and does not profess to extend to the appendix of the Acts of Parliament, which constitutes more than half the volume. This is scarcely compensated for by the fact that the table of contents is very full and elaborate. Again, we have besides a preface an introduction which contains observations on the Medical Act, which, certainly, ought to have been incorporated in the body of the work. The references are given not only to different sets of reports, but with different abbreviations. As the work is intended principally for non-legal readers, it would have been better, either to give the references always at length, or, better still, to give a table of abbreviations.

COURTS.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

(Before BRETT, J., and a Special Jury.)

June 29.—Lewis v. Southgate.

This was an action by a horsedealer and jobmaster, in Berkeley-mews, Portman square, to recover fifty guineas for the price of a horse sold to the defendant, a solicitor practising in the Temple, and residing at Lee, near Shooter's-hill.

Denman, Q.C., and Philbrick, for the plaintiff; Sir G. Honyman, Q.C., and Knight, for the defendant.

Verdict for the plaintiff for fifty guineas. Leave was reserved to the defendant to move to set it aside and enter a nonsuit, or to reduce the damages on points raised as to the construction of the correspondence and the pleadings.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN-FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

June 23.—Re Riden.

This case came before the Court upon a motion to continue an injunction granted by Mr. Registrar Roche on the 26th May restraining one James Mills from further prosecuting two actions of ejectment brought against the bankrupt for the recovery of possession of four houses at Clapton.

It appeared that the bankrupt, who formerly carried on business as a builder and contractor at Clapton, was adjudicated in February last. Some time previously he had taken a building lease of land at Clapton, upon which four houses were in course of erection, and in September last, in anticipation of his marriage with Miss Mills, he assigned his interest in the lease to James Mills, the father of his intended wife, and one Jolley, upon certain trusts. On the 18th November the marriage was solemnised, but, in consequence of the alleged non-performance by the bankrupt of the covenants contained in the lease, Roberts claimed to be entitled to re-enter, and thereupon Mills, on the 7th April, purchased from Roberts the freehold, and on the same day commenced two actions for the purpose of recovering possession of the property.

R. Griffiths, for the trustee under the bankruptcy, urged that Mills, being still trustee of the settlement, had no right to bring ejectment for the purpose of turning out the cestui que trust.

F. Knight, for Mills, contended that the sale being in every respect bona fide, he was entitled to the benefit of the conveyance by Roberts, and that he had a right to continue his proceedings at law for the recovery of possession.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that giving Mr. Mills credit for the most virtuous, honest, and honourable intentions, it was clear that he, being the trustee, had no right to continue the action against the cestui que trust. Prima facie he purchased for the benefit of the settlement; he was not competent by law to buy for himself; the fact of his having purchased did not make him less a trustee, and he could not bring an action to put an end to the interest of the cestui que trust. The injunctions must be continued until further order.

APPOINTMENTS.

SIR WILLIAM MILBOURNE JAMES, Vice-Chancellor, has been appointed a Lord Justice of Appeal in Chancery, which office had remained unfilled since the death of the Right Hon. Sir Charles Jasper Selwyn in August, 1869. The new Lord Justice is the son of Christopher James, Esq., of Swansea, by Anne, daughter of Mr. Williams, of Merthyr Tydvil. He was born on the 29th of June, 1807, and had, therefore, completed his sixty-third year on the day of his appointment as Lord Justice. Sir William James was educated at the University of Glasgow, where he graduated M.A. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn on the 10th June, 1831, and at one time went the South Wales Circuit. In January, 1853, he was appointed Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster, and was created a Queen's Counsel in February of the same year. In January, 1869, he was appointed a vice-chancellor on the promotion of Sir G. M. Giffard to be a Lord Justice of Appeal, in succession to the present Lord Chancellor. Sir William James married, in 1846, Maria, daughter of the late Right Rev. William Otter, Bishop of Chichester.

Mr. JAMES BACON, Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, has been appointed a Vice-Chancellor, in succession to Sir W. M. James. The new Vice-Chancellor is the son of the late James Bacon, Esq., of the Middle Temple, by Catherine, daughter of the late Mr. Day, of Manchester. Mr. Bacon was born in February, 1798. He was called to the bar at Gray's-inn in May, 1827, and afterwards became a member of Lincoln's-inn, of which he is a bencher. He received his silk gown in 1846. In September, 1868, on the death of Mr. Commissioner Goulburn, he was appointed Commissioner of Bankruptcy for the London district, and continued to hold that office till the end of last year, when he was raised to the bench as Chief Judge of Bankruptcy, under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. Mr. Bacon married, in 1827, Laura Frances, daughter of the late William Cook, Esq., of Clay Hill, Enfield. By this lady (who died in 1859) he had three sons and a daughter. One of his sons is Mr. Francis Henry Bacon, of the Home Circuit.

Mr. BOWKER WELDON, clerk to the late Mr. George Moore Smith, solicitor, of Whittlesea, Cambridgeshire, has been elected Clerk to the magistrates of that district, in succession to the said Mr. G. M. Smith.

Mr. GEORGE HENRY GARRARD, of Evesham, Worcester, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery.

Mr. JOHN MAXTON, of Glasgow, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery in Scotland.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1869.—DEBTOR'S SUMMONS.

Sir,—May I be allowed to offer a few observations on this subject referred to in one of your articles in last Saturday's number, commenting upon Mr. Registrar Murray's decision that creditors must bear their own costs of a debtor's summons if the debtor pays the debt within the time limited by the summons. You argue in support of the registrar's decision that "the summons was not intended as a new and convenient means for the recovery of debts but as a new and convenient test of insolvency," and in a prior portion of your article you say "the registrar decided the case, as he was, of course, bound to do, upon the strict construction of the Act and rules." I beg to ask, upon what construction of the Act and rules is it to be discovered that the authors of the Act and rules intended this summary process as a test of insolvency and not as a means of obtaining payment of a debt due? Section 7 says that the summons is to resemble as nearly as circumstances admit a common law writ (which is certainly not a test of insolvency), and it is to state that if the debtor fails to pay or compound a debt due after a creditor has proved to the satisfaction of the Court that he has used reasonable effort to obtain payment, he is liable to be adjudged bankrupt. The summons itself distinctly calls upon the debtor to pay or compound, and then twice warns him of the consequences of his not so paying or compounding, namely, that he may have a bankruptcy petition presented against him. Rule 21 says that the summons is to be endorsed with the name and place of business of the attorney actually suing it out, or, if no attorney is employed for the purpose, then with a memorandum that it is sued out by the creditor in person. I want to know whether these circumstances do not clearly indicate the intention of the framers of the Act and the rules that this process is to be a "new and convenient" and particularly pressing means for the recovery or prompt payment of a debt due. Why is it to be similar to a "writ issued by one of her Majesty's Superior Courts"? Why is the attorney's name and address to be endorsed? Clearly to enable the debtor to go and pay the debt, if he does not dispute it, to such attorney. And is it because he may be what is called solvent, or because he is not enabled to put in a defence and keep his creditor at arm's length for months, inflicting upon him serious loss and injury, and becomes terrified at the idea of bankruptcy at such short notice, that he is to escape the consequences which follow all legal process issued by an attorney "employed" for such purpose, namely, the payment of the proper costs thus necessarily incurred? Rule 25 sufficiently protects a person from whom a debt is claimed who has any defence from any injury caused by the claimant's negligence or dilatoriness; and here the rule is very precise, and makes the creditor pay costs, if he does not proceed within a limited time; and after the best consideration I can give to the subject, I fail to see how this rule can afford any evidence that it was not intended by the Legislature to place a new and convenient process for obtaining payment of a debt at the disposal of the commercial community, by whose exertions and at whose instance the Act of 1869 was passed. Let me also take the liberty of assuring you that it by no means follows, because the debt is paid, that what you are pleased to call "the real issue, the solvency and insolvency of the debtor" is proved, and that had a writ been issued the debt would have been paid. I had another case, a few weeks before the one in which I applied to the court, in which my client's debt (£180) was paid by a trader within seven days after offering bills at two, three and four months. This gentleman, to my certain knowledge, will be obliged to go into liquidation, or be adjudged a bankrupt for a debt of £2,500. The account was an open one, and had a writ been issued I have no doubt whatever that proceedings would still be pending, and my clients would have the luxury of proving against his estate, of a very unsaleable nature, and in a few months time would have received a dividend of 3s. or 4s., as there are first and second mortgages on the property. The bankruptcy law of 1869 was based upon the evidence taken before the Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1864 and 1865, and after a careful perusal of that very interesting document, I submit it is perfectly clear that it was intended to prevent debtors delaying their creditors by affording to the latter the pressing remedy (if you please) enacted by the 7th section, and that it is clearly an omission of the concoctors of the rules and forms from the form of summons prescribed that the debtor should pay his creditor's costs of such summons; and with the greatest respect for the learned and courteous registrar who decided my case, I am clearly of opinion he had the power under rule 186 to award the costs, and that it is, in the words of that rule, "fit and just" that the defaulting debtor should pay them.

J. SEYMOUR SALAMAN.

St. Swithin's Lane.

THE JUDGE OF THE HEREFORD COUNTY COURT.

Sir,—It must have been a matter for much surprise to the readers of your contemporary, the Law Times, to notice in that paper of the 18th inst. two direct attacks on a county court judge. I refer to Mr. Josiah W. Smith, Q.C., the judge of County Court District No. 27—a judge who stands pre-eminently high in the profession, and who deserves anything but ridicule in the columns of a newspaper.

The first of the attacks in the Law Times is on page 119 of the number of that paper to which I have referred, and reference is there made to a "curious proceeding" at Madeley County Court, this "curious proceeding" being simply an intimation to a debtor who had been ordered to pay a debt, and who had distinctly told the judge in open court that he would not pay it, that he (the debtor) would be fined £1 unless he apologised to the judge before the rising of the Court. Following the narration of this "curious proceeding," the editor of the Law Times refers to section 103 of 9 and 10 Vict. c. 95, in which it is enacted that, "if any person shall wilfully insult the judge" or "otherwise misbehave in court," the judge may give him into custody or impose a fine; and the writer then remarks: "Clearly the defendant intended no insult to the judge, and clearly also there was not what the Legislature contemplated as 'misbehaviour in court.'" To me it does not appear to be so clear as the writer in the Law Times attempts to make it; indeed, if anything be clear, it is the opposite of the Law Times' argument. If it be not an insult to a judge for a person to tell him openly in court that he will not obey that judge's order, I should be glad to know what the editor of the Law Times considers an insult. As for misbehaviour in court, can any conduct be more direct misbehaviour than that I have mentioned? Judge Smith, I contend, Sir, was quite right in what he did; and to fortify this opinion I may mention that only last week Mr. J. M. Herbert, the judge of County Court Circuit No. 24, and a gentleman whose opinions are highly valued, pursued exactly the same course as that adopted by Judge Smith—at least, he threatened to fine a debtor if he again said he would not pay. And yet, in relation to this matter, the Law Times, speaking of Judge Smith, must needs remark:—"Arbitrary measures of the kind above referred to do not add weight or dignity to the proceedings of the county court." Does the Law Times, by pursuing the ungentlemanly course of lending itself to the publication of personal animus, add weight or dignity to its columns or to its standing as a newspaper? But the Law Times, not satisfied with this one unwise attack, must needs indulge in another in the following page (120) of the same newspaper. Without going into detail I may mention that in this instance its arguments and deductions are quite as absurd and inconsistent as those I have mentioned, and in fact it here admits that its "views are open to argument, and different opinions may be entertained as to the meaning of the Act"! How long has the Law Times found out this? But it is not a question, Sir, of whether the course pursued by Judge Smith in these two instances was correct or not. Of what I complain is the discreditable attacks of the Law Times: they are purely personal, and unworthy a paper of respectability. Judge Smith, like all other judges, is not immaculate; but of his desire to act justly and do what is right, and of his great ability, no one who has the pleasure of knowing him has a doubt. His high position as a legal author and the excellence of his many works are, perhaps, only known to those who are connected with the profession; but of his undoubted honour, his kindness to the poor in the city and neighbourhood in which he resides, his unbounded charity, and his readiness at all times to give a helping hand to those who need it—these qualities which "add weight and dignity" to what he does—all who know him can testify, rich and poor alike; and these, Sir, will ensure for him a respect which will long outlive the uncalled-for and ungentlemanly attacks in the Law Times.

AN ARTICLED CLERK.

Hereford, June 29, 1870.

THE LEGAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION AND THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Sir,—Scarcely a member of the legal profession can doubt the advantage which must accrue to it from such a society as the Legal Education Association, if the objects set forth in your journal of 4th June (p. 640) are steadily pursued. The establishment of a law university, as a matter of course, must include the collection of a law library, and much better means of legal education than are at present available; and holding this in view, I am prompted to address you, not so much to point out the obvious beneficial results a law university would achieve as to express an opinion that it would render the existence of the Incorporated Law Society unnecessary, and to recommend the members of my branch of the profession to transfer their support to the new association. The duties supposed to be fulfilled by the Law Society are various and many. I say supposed because few of those duties are performed in a satisfactory manner, except the maintenance of a library and law lectures and classes. That the principal of the other objects of the Law Society are not properly cared for is, I believe, the general feeling of the profession. I particularly refer to the duties assumed by the society of (1.) watching the proceedings of Parliament in the interest of the profession; (2.) taking action with reference to parliamentary and other enactments and rules affecting the profession; (3.) protecting the profession from the encroachments of persons not qualified to practice.

By way of illustrating the first I need hardly remind you, Sir, that a year or two ago the Hon. Geo. Denman carried the second reading in the House of Commons of a bill for the remission of the Attorneys' Certificate Duty, a tax which the Government of the day scarcely attempted to justify in principle, but the sum realised by which they were loth to part with. This year Mr. Lowe disposes of a surplus; yet I look in vain for any action on the part of the Law Society to induce Parliament to remit this duty. The society in its published reports seems to assume some direct or indirect influence with the Legislature, and if that influence be ever so small, it should surely be exercised to get the duty removed. Yet it appears that while the stock-brokers agitate for the removal of exceptional taxation upon them, the society professing to represent the solicitors is content to see them, comparatively speaking, the most highly taxed class in the community.

As to the second point, I will merely ask whether the Law Society has considered rule 15 of the County Court Rules, 1870, and whether it has taken no step by way of remonstrance with the county court judges who framed those rules. I was greatly surprised that such a rule as number 15 should have been approved by the Lord Chancellor, and I cannot but think that a respectful representation of its effect to the judges and his Lordship from the Law Society would result in its abrogation. Of course it would never answer the purpose of a solicitor in respectable practice to do, or employ a clerk to do, all the work mentioned in the rule for the paltry fee of 5s., and the consequence is that solicitors are prevented from practising in the county courts, and suitors are at the tender mercy of the accountants, law agents, or whatever they may call themselves, who hang about those courts. And this brings me to my third point.

There is no doubt that a large proportion of work legitimately belonging to the solicitor is done by this class. Much also is done by uncertificated attorneys. Yet what does the Law Society to protect our interests? Solicitors have drafts returned to them signed as approved on behalf of a vendor or lessee by persons not attorneys, solicitors, or conveyancers. Continually we see persons mentioned in the police reports as appearing for the prosecution or defence, or instructing counsel, or "watching the the case" (by taking part in it), whose names do not appear in the Law List. And a year or two ago were constantly to be seen in the Gazette, as attesting bankruptcy petitions, the names of attorneys without certificates. This last I believe has since been prevented, but not through the means of the Law Society. I do not complain of the society because the certificate duty is imposed, or because the evils I have mentioned exist, but I do complain of it because it does not exert itself (as it might by petitions to Parliament, enforcing penalties, prosecutions, proper representations to magistrates and the like) to obtain the remission of the duty, or (while it is imposed and in justice to those who pay it) to prevent those who do not pay it from practising, or to remedy the other matters I have mentioned affecting the profession. I have been informed that the society will not move against unqualified men unless the evidence is brought to it "cut and dried," but when a prima facie case is obvious to the world it is scarcely fair that one should be expected to spend time in getting up evidence for the good of one's profession when there exists an institution, established, as I have always thought, for (among others) that very purpose.

I think, therefore, that if by the Legal Education Society we get no more than a library and a provision for legal instruction, we shall get all we have in the Incorporated Law Society, and that, as the latter has proved in other respects a failure, no reason will remain for its continued existence.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

June 24.—The Felony Bill was reported as amended in committee.

The Irish Land Bill.—Adjourned committee.—Clause 3 (Compensation).—The Duke of Richmond proposed an amendment providing that in case of any assignment of a tenancy the assignee shall not, unless accepted as a tenant by the landlord, be entitled to compensation for eviction. —Earl Granville proposed a clause which he thought would almost entirely prevent assignments without the landlord's consent, but, the Duke of Richmond declining to accept this clause, the original amendment was discussed, and, having been supported by Earl Grey, Viscount Lifford, Lord Cairns, the Earl of Limerick, the Marquis of Salisbury and others, while Lord Dufferin and others supported Earl Granville's clause, the Duke of Richmond's amendment was carried by a majority of 116 to 82.—The Duke of Richmond proposed to leave out the words which relieve from the penalties of sub-letting the letting of a portion of land not exceeding half an acre to agricultural labourers bona fide required for the cultivation of the holding.—The amendment was opposed by Lord Granville, the Duke of Argyll, and Lord O'Hagan, and supported by Lord Cairns. —Carried by a majority of 138 to 99.—The Duke of Richmond moved to substitute twenty-one years for thirty-one as the length of lease which is to exonerate landlords from paying compensation for eviction.—Lords Granville and Kimberley opposed and Lords Malmesbury and Cairns supported the amendment.—The Lord Chancellor would rather strike out the clause than adopt the amendment.—Carried by a majority of 140 to 111.—Lord Salisbury next moved an amendment taking from all holdings above £50 (instead of £100 as in the bill), the right to claim compensation for disturbance.—Lords De Grey and Bessborough, Earl Granville, and the Duke of Richmond opposed the amendment; the Duke of Cleveland and Lord Clanricarde supported it.—Carried by a majority of 119 to 111.—Clause 3 as amended was then agreed to.

June 27.—The Sequestration Bill.—On the motion for the third reading, Lord Cairns said he should not persist in his amendment for the rejection of the measure, as the Bishop of Winchester had met his greatest objection to it—the forfeiture of a benefice by decision of the bishop, with an appeal to the archbishop—by consenting that the inquiry by the bishop should have a judicial character, and that there should be an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Though still deeming the provisions of the bill too harsh, he would not propose the rejection of a measure which their lordships had received with so much favour.—The Archbishop of York regretted the concession as one altering the principle of the bill. An inquiry by the bishop with an appeal, passing over the archbishop, to the Privy Council, would involve such an enormous expense that many bishops would shrink from putting the measure in force.—Lord Portman objected to the vesting of such authority in the bishop, and to affording so mischievous a power to a spiteful creditor. He trusted that the bill would be rejected in another place.—Lord Westbury approved the provision enabling the bishop to appropriate a larger portion of the revenue of a sequestrated living to the spiritual necessities of the parish, but objected to those clauses which deprived the creditors of their rights, and imposed on an embarrassed clergyman the stigma of passing through the Bankruptcy Court.—The Marquis of Salisbury, admitting that the concession made would materially injure the bill, hoped the measure would be accepted as a decided step in advance, for it declared almost for the first time that the clergyman existed for the parish, and not the parish for the clergyman, and made a breach in that freehold position which had been carried so far as to produce much harm. It would remove the scandal of a clergyman pledging the income of his benefice to his private creditors, which no naval or military officer or civil servant was allowed to do.—The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol could not concur in the concordat of the Bishop of Winchester, for it would not only entail great expense, but, by passing over the archbishop, would reverse the present principle of ecclesiastical jurisdiction.—The Duke of Somerset believed the result of the bill would be that clergymen who borrowed money would have to pay eight or ten per cent., instead of four, the security of the revenue of their present benefices being withdrawn.

The Felony Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Irish Land Bill.—Adjourned Committee.—Clause 4 (Compensation for improvements on holdings not subject to custom).—The Duke of Richmond moved an amendment declaring that in the case of ordinary improvements twenty years' enjoyment shall satisfy and extinguish a tenant's claim to compensation.—Lords Kimberley and Grey supported the amendment.—Lord Cairns raised a question of legal construction, and the consideration of the amendment was postponed to the report.—Clause 4, with verbal amendments, was then added to the bill.—Clause 5 (Presumption in respect of improvements to be in favour of the tenant).—Lord Penzance added the following additional exception:—"Where, from the entire circumstances of the case, the Court shall be induced to draw an opposite presumption."—Lord Clanricarde moved an amendment to the clause, declaring that all claims for improvements, either by landlord or tenant, shall be proved by evidence, whereas the bill created a presumption in favour of the tenant.—Carried by a majority of 122 to 83.—The Duke of Richmond added an amendment giving any landlord or tenant a permissive right to register improvements.—Clause 5 was then added to the bill.—Clause 6 (Compensation in respect of payment to incoming tenant) was agreed to, with verbal amendment.—Clause 7 (Compensation in respect of crops) was agreed to.—Clause 8 (Definition of limitation as to disturbance in holding).—The Duke of Richmond added a provision that ejectment for breach of reasonable covenant should not be deemed disturbance by the act of the landlord.—Clauses 8 and 9 were added to the bill.

The Benefices Resignation Bill passed through committee.

The Turnpike Trusts Arrangement Bill passed through committee.

June 28.—The Irish Land Bill.—Adjourned committee.—Clause 10 (Derivative title of tenant) and clause 11 (Exempting certain lands from the operation of the bill) were agreed to.—Clause 12 (Exemption of certain lands from compensation) was agreed to on the Government undertaking to consider the matter before the report.—Clause 13 (Proceedings to be taken by tenant in respect of claims) and 14 (Proceedings to be taken by the landlord) were agreed to with slight amendments. After clause 15 (Equities between landlord and tenant) had been agreed to, the Duke of Richmond moved a clause, that in cases of dispute between landlord and tenant the Court shall reduce its order into writing, in the form of a decree or award, stating the items of claim allowed and the particulars of any set-off.—Lord Cairns supported the clause, which was agreed to.—Clause 18 (Civil Bill Court to award compensation) was agreed to.—Clause 17 (Restrictions on eviction of tenant) was agreed to with an addition by Lord Penzance, giving a landlord the option of depositing the amount of compensation due from him before going into court.—Clause 19 (Procedure of Civil Bill Court) was agreed to with an amendment by the Duke of Richmond, throwing on the Civil Bill Judges the duty of deciding matters of fact without a jury.—Clause 20 (Appeal) was amended by the Marquis of Clanricarde, by adding "the Lord Justice of Appeal" to the "Court for Land Cases Reserved." On clause 21 (Court of Arbitration), a proviso proposed by Lord Lifford that nothing in the Act should affect or injure the right of the landlord to accept or refuse a proposed incoming tenant, was opposed by Earl Granville and the Duke of Richmond, and negatived by a majority of 59 to 40.—Clause 40 (Advances to tenants for purchase of holdings)—a proviso by Lord Courtown, limiting the size of the holdings to £20 annual value, was negatived.—Clauses 24—39 were agreed to without amendment.—Clause 40 (Advances to tenants for purchase) was, after some debate, agreed to without a division; as also was clause 41.—Clauses 43—52 were agreed to.—Clause 53 was amended by Lord Courtown, so as to make notices to quit apply to holdings defined under the bill.—Clause 54 was amended by the Duke of Richmond by substituting six months as the time for notices to run.—Clauses 55—65 were agreed to.—Clause 66 (Abolishing the landlord's right of distress in the case of tenancies created after the passing of the bill, except where there is an agreement to the contrary) was negatived on the motion of the Duke of Richmond.—Clause 67 (General definitions) was agreed to.—Clause 68 (Special definitions) was agreed to, the definition of a "holding" having been amended by Lord Cairns and the Lord Chancellor.—Clauses 69 and 70 were agreed to, and Tuesday was then fixed for the report.

The Turnpike Trusts Arrangements Bill was read a third time and passed.

June 30.—The Attorneys and Solicitors' Remuneration Bill.—On the motion for the third reading, the Lord Chancellor urged objections to permitting appeals in some cases on questions relating to costs, as contrary to long-established rule, and certain to give rise to much litigation.—Lord Chelmsford concurred.—The bill was then read a third time; and on the motion that it do pass, Lord Chelmsford proposed an amendment providing that contracts as to costs between attorneys and clients with respect to actions at law or suits in equity should be submitted, before payment of the sum agreed on, to a taxing officer, who, if he deemed it unreasonable, should report thereon to the court, which should have power either to reduce the sum or cancel the agreement. He approved the bill so far as it would legalise contracts as to conveyancing business, for at present, the remuneration being according to the length of the documents, there was no inducement to exercise skill, but every inducement to prolixity; and this class of business being generally transacted by the leading members of the profession, the power of making agreements with their clients might be safely entrusted to them. With regard, however, to actions and suits, the policy had been to protect the client against the attorney, a scale of fees being fixed by the judges, a staff of taxing officers being appointed, and the expenses of taxation, in the event of one-sixth of the total sum being taken off, being thrown on the attorney. There was no objection to this system, and though he was sure the alteration proposed would not be unfairly taken advantage of by attorneys engaged in great commercial cases, there were attorneys of a very different stamp who would be glad to withdraw their charges from the scrutinising eye of the Courts by making a private agreement with their clients. Knowing what the probable costs would be under the present system, they would take care to stipulate for something in excess, to which the ignorant client would easily assent. It was true the bill provided that such agreements could not be enforced by action except by petition to the Court, which would cancel them if unreasonable; but the client would not be aware of this protection and would not know whether the agreements were reasonable. Moreover, an attorney, if the action had succeeded, might recover the whole amount of the expenses from the opposite side, and yet exact from his client the sum agreed on.—The Marquis of Salisbury acceded to the amendment with some reluctance, as it proceeded on a principle which noble lords had recently denounced, that of protecting people against the results of their ignorance in making contracts. His noble and learned friend seemed to have as bad an opinion of English attorneys as the Government had of Irish landlords.—Lord Chelmsford said there were some attorneys whom he did not trust.—The Marquis of Salisbury disliked the policy of protecting people against the results of contracts made in ignorance. His belief was that in the long run the best way of protecting them was to make them liable for all the results.—The amendment was agreed to; and clause 19 having been amended, on the motion of the Marquis of Salisbury, by omitting the words, "allowing appeals on questions of costs," the bill passed.

The Wine and Beerhouse Act (1869) Amendment Bill passed through committee.

The Medical Act (1858) Amendment Bill.—Committee.—The bill was reported with amendments.

The Churchwardens Liabilities Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Bill passed through committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

June 24.—The Court of Chancery.—Mr. G. Gregory called attention to the appellate jurisdiction in the Court of Chancery, and moved "That in the opinion of this House it is expedient that all appeals in that court should be heard before three judges. He had sketched the history of the Court down to the time when two Lords Justices were associated with the Lord Chancellor to constitute a Court of Appeal; and was proceeding to quote opinions upon the Court as so constituted, when an hon. member moved that the House be counted, and, there being only twenty-six members present, the House adjourned.

June 27.—The Sligo and Cashel Disfranchisement Bill was read a third time and passed.

The New Law Courts.—In reply to Mr. W. H. Smith, Mr. Ayrton said, as far as he could judge, the excavations for the foundations of the new building would be begun at so early a period that it would be impracticable to open a thoroughfare across the site, in lieu of those which have been closed, from Carey-street to the Strand.

June 28.—Church Government of Parishes.—Lord Sandon moved that the House resolve into committee with the view of obtaining leave in committee to bring in a bill to provide for the constitution of parochial councils in all parishes in England and Wales, and to define and enlarge the powers of parishioners with respect to the conduct of divine worship in their parish churches.—Mr. Cowper Temple seconded the motion.—Mr. T. Hughes and Mr. Gladstone supported it. The motion was agreed to. The House then went into committee, and the proposal to introduce a measure having been agreed to, the House resumed, and leave was given to introduce the bill.

The Dublin City Voters' Disfranchisement Bill (to disfranchise the voters reported as guilty of bribery) was read a first time.

The Charitable Funds Investment Bill was read a second time.

The Rents and Periodical Payments Bill was read a second time.

The Settled Estates Bill was read a second time.

The Liverpool Admiralty District Registrar Bill was read a third time and passed.

June 29.—The Life Assurance Companies Bill. Adjourned committee.—Clause 3 (Cautionary deposit).—An amendment by Mr. Synan, that the £20,000 deposit should not be returned after three years, but retained as a continuing security, was negatived and the clause agreed to.—Clause 4 (Separation of life assurance funds) was agreed to, with a proviso by Mr. Cave that it should not apply to existing companies the whole of the profits of which were paid exclusively to life policyholders.—Clauses 5 and 6 (Statements of account) were verbally amended and agreed to.—Clause 7 (Actuarial report and abstract). An amendment by Mr. Anderson, to the effect that companies established before the passing of the bill should only be required to make returns of their accounts once every ten years, companies hereafter to be established being required to make such returns at intervals of five years, was carried by a majority of 81 to 16.—Clauses 8—10 were agreed to with verbal amendments.—Clause 11 (Copies of statements to be "delivered" to shareholders and policyholders). An amendment by Mr. Cave, to substitute "posted" for "delivered," was rejected by a majority of 119 to 46.—Clause 12 (Amalgamations and transfers of business). Mr. T. Cave said that after what had occurred in the case of the Albert Company a strong feeling had existed against the amalgamation of companies, but he did not think that, on reflection, a prejudice of that kind could continue to prevail, and as he thought that the clause, as at present worded, would render the amalgamation of two companies impossible, as the assent in writing of one-half of the policy-holders could never be secured, he proposed, as an amendment, to leave out the words requiring the written assent of one-half, and to substitute certain words providing that any policyholder and annuitant in the company might, within a month after receiving notice, elect either to agree to such an amalgamation or transfer, or might require the company to purchase his life policy or annuity, the value to be settled by agreement or arbitration. He would not press his amendment to a division, but he wished to obtain an expression of opinion from the committee on the subject. His object was not to interfere unnecessarily with amalgamations and transfers, which in many instances were very proper proceedings. His only wish was that they should be carried on openly and fairly, and that no means for effecting fraudulent amalgamations and transfers should exist in future. With respect to amalgamations, he provided in the bill that no amalgamation should be made without proper notice to the policy-holders in both companies; and in case of transfer he had gone so far as to require notice to be given to each shareholder in the company to be transferred. This provision, combined with the enactment embodied in clause 14, would provide a safeguard against fraud.—Mr. G. Gregory thought there might be a difficulty in giving notice under the 12th clause, and he suggested that the notice should be sent to the persons by whom the last premium was obtained. The amendment was withdrawn, and the clause agreed to.—Clauses 13—23 were agreed to, with verbal amendments.—On the motion of Mr. Bowring, two new clauses were added to the bill requiring companies to furnish to every shareholder and policyholder, on application, a copy of a "shareholders' address-book" and of the deed of settlement, on payment for the same.—Mr. T. Cave moved a clause requiring companies to pay, on request of the holders of any life policy issued by them, the equitable surrender value of policies, which should in no case be less than one-third of the premiums paid in respect of such policies, as was, indeed, the uniform practice of all respectable companies.—Mr. Cave said that, no doubt many cases of hardship had arisen where offices refused a surrender value. But this clause went too far; he himself had prepared an amendment to the 6th schedule which accomplished all that was really practicable.—The clause was negatived without a division.—The remaining clauses were agreed to, Mr. T. Cave postponing several amendments to the report.—The schedules were then agreed to, with the addition to schedule 6 of a paragraph requiring "a table of minimum values allowed for the surrender of policies for the whole term of life and for endowments and endowment assurances."

The Coroners Bill.—The order for committee was discharged.

The Absconding Debtors Bill.—On the order for the second reading of this bill, Mr. Morley said the Attorney-General had consented to the second reading on condition that certain new clauses were introduced into the bill in order to render its meaning more distinct.—The bill was then read a second time, the committee being fixed for the 12th of July.

The Lodgers' Goods Protection Bill passed through committee pro forma.

The Felony Bill.—The Lords' amendments were agreed to.

June 30.—The High Court of Justice Bill.—Mr. Denman gave notice that on the motion for the second reading of the High Court of Justice Bill he should move the following amendment:—"That it is inexpedient to consider the proposals for the alteration of the constitution of the Superior Courts of Common Law and Equity, and the Courts of Appeal therefrom, till Parliament has before it the changes in the mode of procedure which are contemplated in connection with such proposals."

The Charitable Funds Investment Bill passed through committee.

The Rents and Periodical Payments Bill passed through committee.

OBITUARY.

MR. F. P. MAUDE.

Mr. Frederic Philip Maude, barrister-at-law, died at his residence, St. George's-road, Pimlico, on the 13th June, at the age of fifty-three years. He was the son of the late John Gervaise Maude, Esq., of Great George-street, Westminster, by the daughter of George Hartwell, Esq., of Laleham, Middlesex. Mr. Maude was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in January, 1847, and went the Home Circuit. He was the author, in conjunction with Mr. C. E. Pollock, Q.C., of the "Compendium of the Law of Merchant Shipping," which work has reached its third edition. He also edited the lectures of the late Mr. John W. Smith on the "Law of Landlord and Tenant," and assisted the late Mr. Thomas E. Chitty in preparing the last two editions of "Smith's Leading Cases." Mr. Maude married, in 1850, Anne, daughter of the late Mr. Edward Jackson, but has left no issue.

MR. C. J. DAWSON.

Mr. Charles James Dawson, barrister-at-law, died at Melbourne on the 17th March last, aged 46 years. He was the nephew of the late Mr. James Robinson, solicitor, of Queen-street-place, in the City of London, and was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in May, 1848. For a few years he practised on the Oxford Circuit, attending also the Hereford and Stafford Sessions; but proceeded to Melbourne about the year 1853, and became a member of the Victorian bar, at which he practised up to the date of his death.

MR. R. SYMONS.

Mr. Richard Symons, solicitor, of Wadebridge, near Bodmin, Cornwall, died on the 26th of June, at the advanced age of eighty-eight years. He was one of the oldest attorneys in the country, having been placed on the rolls as far back as the year 1806. He filled the local office of clerk to the magistrates of the hundreds of Trigg and Pydar, and was also clerk to the trustees of the Camelford, Wadebridge, and St. Columb Turnpike, and to the trustees of the bridge at Wadebridge. Since 1849, he had carried on business in partnership with his son, Mr. Richard J. E. Symons, under the firm of Symons & Son.

MR. G. A. HERRING.

Mr. George Anthony Herring, solicitor, of Bedale, Yorkshire, died on the 19th of June, aged fifty-eight years. Mr. Herring, who was certificated in 1844, filled the local offices of Clerk to the Guardians of the Poor, Clerk to the Magistrates of the petty sessional division of Hang East, and clerk to the Highway Board.

THE STAMP DUTIES.

Petition of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association to the House of Commons, presented by Mr. Dodds.

The humble petition of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association,

Sheweth,—That your petitioners have considered the very important bill now before your honourable House, intitled “a Bill for granting certain stamp duties in lieu of duties of the same kind now payable under various Acts, and consolidating and amending the provisions relating thereto.”

That your petitioners, though highly approving of the consolidation of the stamp laws and of some of the amendments proposed, beg respectfully to submit their opinion that considerable hardship and inconvenience will result if such bill be enacted without the amendments hereinafter suggested.

That the following provisions (among others) of such bill appear to your petitioners to require amendment in the direction specified.

Clause 8 appears to your petitioners open to objections because it would cause great uncertainty as to whether a deed was properly and sufficiently stamped, and would throw undue responsibility upon the solicitor in preparing many instruments unless he relieved himself of the responsibility by putting his client to the extra expense of an adjudication stamp. For it would be often impossible to decide whether some covenant or trifling proviso might not afterwards be held to be a distinct consideration. It would be also impossible to determine what formed a “distinct operation,” and it would probably be held that a power of attorney in an assignment was liable to separate duty, and the same of a covenant to produce.

Clause 10 appears objectionable, and especially having regard to clause 8, because it would, in numerous instances, subject innocent signers or preparers of instruments to the forfeiture of £50, a prima facie case of an intent to defraud being often very difficult to disprove after a lapse of time, &c. There are many cases in which the whole consideration or circumstances are by universal practice, and for reasons unconnected with stamps, not stated.

There are also many cases in which parties agree to the results and consequences intended to be effected by a deed, though “the facts and circumstances” which induce one of such parties to enter into it are entirely different from “the facts and circumstances” operating in the mind of the other. In such cases such facts or circumstances are not stated in the deed. Your petitioners have only to suggest the following as some of such cases, viz.:—Deeds for carrying into effect family arrangements, deeds for carrying into effect arrangements of disputes, and deeds of separation.

The 48 Geo. 3, mentioned in the reference to the existing law, imposes a penalty on any solicitor wilfully mis-stating in a conveyance on a sale the consideration-money for which the property is sold. The offence for which this penalty is imposed is certain in its nature, and could not be committed unintentionally, but the bill now before your honourable House makes it an offence if any instrument omits fully and truly to set forth therein all the facts and circumstances, and no person could ever know whether he had or had not incurred the penalty imposed.

As to clause 15, the time now allowed for stamping instruments executed abroad is two months. Even this period is frequently insufficient, and your petitioners have no hesitation in stating that, in the majority of such cases, deeds executed abroad could not be stamped within the shorter period of fourteen days. The Commissioners should have power, in cases they consider open to doubt, to stamp any instrument with the duty they deem deficient at any time without penalty. And it would facilitate investigations of titles if questions of stamp duties on documents more than (say) ten years old could be got rid of by the additional duty being impressed without penalty.

Your petitioners submit, as to clause 16, that the imposition of a double penalty in the case of instruments insufficiently stamped produced as evidence is unreasonable and unjust. The existing penalty of £10 in the case of instruments insufficiently stamped is a very severe penalty, and where the matter in dispute is small in value it amounts practically to a denial of justice. To double the penalty would be to increase the hardship and injustice, and there is no reason why the penalty should be doubled in the case of instruments produced in court more than in any other case.

Your petitioners submit, as to clause 17, that to make an unduly stamped instrument not available for any purpose, or upon any occasion, is a great alteration of the present law of real property, and would lead to great difficulties and dangers. If a deed were, through inadvertence, insufficiently stamped, all deeds granted under it would be void. This could never be the intention of the promoters of the bill.

If the clause becomes law it will injuriously affect many titles to real property, and thereby render the property affected unmarketable, or at least materially reduce its selling value. It must not be forgotten that it is often a question of great difficulty what is and what is not the right stamp. The penalty imposed by the existing law affords ample protection to the revenue, and no advantage is to be gained by so unjust a provision.

As to clause 18, the Commissioners should not be permitted to make any regulation authorising them to refuse to adjudicate in any case on being furnished, under clause 20, with all necessary evidence, &c.

As to clause 19 there should be a right of appeal from every decision of the Commissioners to the Court of Exchequer and thence to the Exchequer Chamber. The recent case on building leases illustrates the great importance beyond the amount in the case actually before the Court which may be involved.

Your petitioners submit that the provision in clause 20, authorising the Commissioners to require to be furnished with evidence as to facts and circumstances not stated in the deed, is open to the objections already submitted as to clauses 8 and 10. The Commissioners have to assess the duty upon the deed itself and ought not to be allowed to go behind the deed or to inquire into matters not stated therein. The duty is charged upon an instrument of a stated description having a stated operation and ought not to be affected by any facts or circumstances not stated in it.

Clause 21 is open to objection. It is far too stringent and too inquisitorial. It gives the Commissioners power to enter every man's house and to examine every man's deeds and documents, and to make notes of the nature of his title to his estates. No such power should be given to any commissioners and certainly not when the object is merely to ascertain whether stamp duties have been paid.

Your petitioners would suggest that clauses 24 and 36 require what would often prove an impossibility—viz., for every party to cancel the adhesive stamp. Suppose, for instance, the case of a corporation executing by its common seal, or of the parties on one side being as they often are too numerous to sign on the stamp, an instrument involving thousands of pounds might be valueless because one signa ture was off the stamp. The cancellation of adhesive stamps should be hampered with as few restrictions as possible, and they should be the same in all cases—viz., by the dated signature of any one of the parties to the instrument.

It appears to your petitioners very desirable that in order to avoid mistakes and loss arising from unintentional departure from the rules to be laid down as to the cancellation of adhesive stamps; that these rules should be simple, and plain, and easy to be acquired; that they should be most easy of performance and free from pitfalls. Your petitioners would suggest that the "contemporaneous" cancellation by one party at the time of execution should be sufficient; that they should be all collected under one head in one part of the bill and not scattered in different heads as at present; and that, especially having regard to the fact that adhesive or other stamps are not always obtainable where instruments (and this applies particularly to the class of instruments to be stamped with adhesives) requiring these stamps are prepared, provision should be made for stamping all instruments (except bills of exchange or promissory notes) after execution.

As to clause 40 your petitioners submit that the words "clerk or servant" should be omitted. In every case of hiring, the services of the party hired are given for the benefit of the master, and the clause as it stands requires every contract for hiring to be set forth "in an instrument of apprenticeship," and duty paid upon the value of the services. Every contract for hiring, without limit to its value or nature, not in writing, is declared by the clause to be null and void.

As to clause 49 your petitioners submit that the words "or importing" in the interpretation of the term "promissory note" contained, will have the effect of making many memoranda not now considered as "promissory notes" liable to duty. Almost every memorandum or letter relating to a matter of business may be considered as "importing a promise to pay a certain sum of money," and the words objected to are of very serious importance having regard to the heavy penalty imposed by clause 55.

It appears to your petitioners that the list of persons excepted by clause 62 from liability to the penalty thereby imposed on unqualified paid preparers of instruments should be followed by the words "and duly authorised in that behalf," otherwise a Scotch writer to the signet might act as a conveyancer in England, and English practitioners prepare Scotch deeds. The exception in sub-clause (c) is new and wrong.

Your petitioners submit that clauses 85 and 86 are open to some of the objections already stated by your petitioners. These clauses like many others in the Act seek to charge stamp duties upon the transactions themselves, and not merely upon the instruments in which transactions are recorded. Whereas your petitioners submit that the liability to stamp duty should be limited to the instruments themselves subject to the liability to penalty for a wilfully untrue statement of the amount of consideration on a sale, and that Commissioners should have nothing to do with other facts or circumstances.

Clause 93 (2) appears to your petitioners objectionable. The lease should be required to be made "in pursuance of" instead of "in conformity to" the previous agreement, in order to avoid any question of a second ad valorem stamp, for a want of strict conformity. But the proviso would lead to serious inconvenience as the rough agreement, or heads of terms, if signed would have to bear ad valorem and to be preserved. It would be much more convenient if it were provided that if the lease be actually granted within six months the ad valorem may be put upon the lease itself.

In clause 99 (2) the words "or available for any purpose" should be omitted, for the reasons stated against the similar words in clause 17. If great care is not taken to define the mode of estimating duty on leases many difficulties will arise as universally prevailing as that now being provided for by the Stamps on Leases Bill.

In clause 102 the penalty should only apply where the omission is "wilful" and with intent to defraud, as agreements for taking houses are constantly drawn up and signed in places where no stamps may be obtainable at the time, and yet, though in section 101 the words used are permissive, yet in 102 they are not, and it makes the penalty absolute if the adhesive stamp be not put on before the execution, often an impossibility.

Your petitioners would submit that as to clause 126, no ad valorem duty should be chargeable where the interest of the settlor, though vested and reversionary, is defeasible—viz., a reversionary interest under another settlement subject to be defeated by the exercise of the power of appointment by a third person. The word "defeasible" imposes a new tax in this respect and should be omitted.

Same clause, sub-clause 3, as to settled money temporarily invested in land becoming the subject of a fresh settlement, is only adapted to the simple case of the land remaining intact; if half the land has been sold for say the cost of the whole, how is the duty on a sub-settlement of the remaining half of the land to be estimated?

SCHEDULE.

Award. The ad valorem duty (if any) should be on the sum awarded and not on the sum in dispute, which may be some absurd sum. But the maximum stamp requisite on an award should be the common deed stamp of 10s., often there is no pecuniary sum in dispute. As this item stands, there would be no limit. By the present law the limit is £1 15s., the amount of a common deed stamp.

Title "Contract Note." It appears to your petitioners that the language of this item is too comprehensive. The words "for or relating to" should be omitted, and the words "contracting for" inserted instead. This amendment is especially desirable when the stringent provisions of clause 71 are considered in connection with it.

Under title Copy or Extract your petitioners would suggest that the words "or in any manner authenticated" should be omitted. They might be held to extend the duty charge to copies merely marked with the usual "Xd," or initialled, or mentioned as copies in an accompanying letter.

Under title "Schedule" there should be an additional sub-section of exemptions, numbered 3, to include any instrument otherwise duly stamped.

Your petitioners therefore humbly pray your Honourable House to amend the Stamp Duties Bill in the respects above pointed out; or, failing that, in such manner as to confine the clauses above mentioned to a consolidation of the existing law; or, failing both such modes of amendment, to refer the said bill to a select committee empowered to send for persons, papers, and records, so that the evidence of solicitors and others may be taken on the subject.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS.

We take from the Times the following abstract of the report of the select committee:—

The select committee appointed by the House of Commons on the 11th of April to inquire into the state of the law affecting members of the House who have been reported guilty of corrupt practices by commissions, have made their report. It states that several persons, now members of the House, have at various times been reported guilty of corrupt practices by commissions; they were all reported guilty of such corrupt practices as candidates, and one was, in addition, reported guilty of corrupt practices when not a candidate. But in all cases they received certificates of indemnity from the commissioners, and, consequently, no proceedings by way of information, indictment, or action could be taken against them. The 43rd section of the Act of 1868 imposes the following disabilities on candidates, if the judge on an election petition reports bribery committed by them, or with their knowledge or consent, at such election,—namely, that for the next seven years they cannot sit in Parliament, nor vote at an election, nor hold any municipal or judicial office; but with regard to the members of the House reported by commissioners as guilty of corrupt practices at elections, this clause does not apply, since the fact has not been found by the report of a judge upon an election petition. The 45th section inflicts the same penalties upon every person other than a candidate "found guilty of bribery in any proceedings in which, after notice of the charge, he has had an opportunity of being heard." That does not appear to apply to a person who, not being a candidate, is but a witness before a commission, for such a person has neither "notice" nor "opportunity of being heard" in his defence; even if present, he cannot cross-examine the witnesses, nor call witnesses in his defence. This view is confirmed by the 44th section, voiding the election of a candidate who personally engages a canvasser or agent, who within seven years was "found guilty of any corrupt practice by any competent legal tribunal," or "reported guilty" by a committee of the House, or commissioners, or a judge, a distinction being drawn between being "found guilty" and "reported guilty." It appears, therefore, to this committee, that in the case before them, the person implicated having only appeared as a witness before an election commission cannot be held to have had notice of a "charge," or "an opportunity of being heard." The view is supported by the judgment of Mr. Justice Blackburn in the second Bewdley case in 1869. The committee come to the conclusion, with respect to all the members of the House who have been reported guilty of corrupt practices by commissions, that none of them are now legally disqualified from sitting in the House, and that such reports cannot be regarded as judicial decisions affecting the status of those persons. Nor is it possible that, even had they not received certificates, any legal proceedings could now be taken against them, as the time limited (one year) has expired. It remained to consider whether any proceedings can and ought to be taken against any of the members in question by the inherent authority of the House. In 1700 four members were expelled for corrupt practices at several elections to the Parliament then sitting; and a somewhat similar case, arising out of a corrupt compromise of an election petition, occurred in 1724. The committee do not find that the House has ever exercised this species of authority on charges of corrupt practices at an election to any Parliament except that actually sitting; and since 1724, it does not appear to have been exercised at all. None of the members to whom the present inquiry relates are alleged to have been guilty of any corrupt practice in connection with any election to the present Parliament; and some of them have sat without question as members in more than one former Parliament since the reports of the commissions affecting them were made. Under these circumstances, and considering that Parliament has thought fit to define the course to be adopted in such cases by express legislation, the committee are unable to recommend that any proceeding should be taken by the House against any of these members. With regard to the question whether any alteration ought to be made in the law, the committee do not think it would be desirable, either to give to the reports of the commissioners conducting their inquiries in the manner hitherto practised the effect of judicial sentences, attended with statutory disqualifications, against persons reported guilty of bribery, or to introduce such changes in the character of, and the manner of, conducting those inquiries as would arm the commissioners with legal authority to try the guilt or innocence of such persons upon charges regularly made against them, with proper notice and with all necessary means of answer and defence. The former course would involve grave departure from the principles hitherto recognised essential to the due administration of justice, and might in practice inflict serious wrong on individuals who, with the usual opportunities of defence, might have been able to establish their innocence. The latter course would complicate and prolong, by a multitude of new personal issues, inquiries which experience has already proved to be sufficiently intricate and prolix; and it could hardly be reconciled with the continued use of those inquisitorial powers, guarded by certificates of indemnity, without which the primary object of these Commissions—viz, bringing to light extensive corruption in Parliamentary constituencies where it exists, might probably not be attainable. It could scarcely be satisfactory that the exercise of so important and highly penal a jurisdiction should be confided to any persons less experienced in the administration of justice than the ordinary judges of the land. While, however, the committee are not prepared to recommend a change of the law in either of these directions, they are of opinion that the present state of the law is far from satisfactory. They see no good reason for the distinction between those who are and those who are not candidates at an election which is to be found in the 43d and 45th sections of 31 and 32 Vic. cap. 125. Candidates under the 43d section are liable to be disqualified only for such bribery, as upon the trial of an election petition under the Act, may affect the election then in controversy; and even such bribery will only disqualify, if it is established at the trial by the report of the judge. A conviction upon a criminal prosecution in a court of law for bribery as a candidate at any election whatever would not disqualify, though, if the offender had not been a candidate, he would have been disqualified upon such conviction under the 45th section. The committee think it clear that this distinction ought not to continue. They recommend the amendment of the 45th section by omitting the words "other than a candidate," and describing in definite terms the legal proceedings in which the person accused shall be found guilty. They also recommend that the 14th section of the Act 17 and 18 Vict., cap. 102, should be amended, so as to enable a prosecution for corrupt practices (in any case in which lapse of time is not already, before the change of law, a conclusive bar) to be commenced; not only within one year after the commission of the offence, but also within three months after the alleged offender shall have been reported guilty by any judge upon an election petition, under 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, or by any commission issued in accordance with 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125. In this manner the mischief arising from reports of this nature not being followed up by proceedings against the parties inculpated may for the future be avoided, or at least materially diminished.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The funds were strong this week, until the demand for money which always attends the close of the half-year occasioned them to droop. The railway market is heavy. Metropolitanans have sustained a fall in consequence of the decision of Vice-Chancellor James in the suit of Salisbury v. The Metropolitan Railway Company. Great Northern's are high, in consequence of the favourable traffic report. The Indian Guaranteed Railway Stocks have fallen heavily in price, although the new Great Indian Peninsula Stock was eagerly taken up.

Mr. J. F. Wileman has been elected Chief Bailiff of Fenton in Staffordshire.

Mr. Alderman Owden and Mr. Robert Jones have been elected sheriffs of London for the ensuing year.

BIRTHS, MARRIAGES, AND DEATHS.

London. Dinners (from the joint), vegetables, &c., 1s. 6d.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT.

Amsterdam Exhibition, 1869. First Prize, being above the Gold Medal. Supplied to the British, French, Prussian, Russian, Italian, Dutch, and other Governments. Dr. Lankester writes regarding Extract of Meat:—"But there is a difference in flavour, and here, as in all other kinds of food, it is the flavour that makes the quality." It is essentially on account of the fine meaty flavour, as distinguished from the burnt taste of other Extracts, the LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT defeated all Australian and other sorts at Paris, Havre and Amsterdam, and is so universally preferred in all European markets.

One pint of fine-flavoured Beef-tea at 2½d. Most convenient and economic "stock."

CAUTION.—Require Baron Liebig's, the inventor's, signature on every Jar, and ask distinctly for LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT.

ROYAL POLYTECHNIC.—"SAND and the HEART OF STONE, at Four and Nine.

Open 12 to 5 and 7 to 10.

PROVIDENT LIFE OFFICE, No. 50, REGENT-STREET, LONDON, W.

ESTABLISHED 1806.

The Directors of the PROVIDENT LIFE OFFICE feel it to be their duty at the present time to place before their policy-holders and the public such a statement of the affairs of the Office as shall be intelligible to every reader; they have therefore prepared Tables in which are produced in detail the sums insured at each age by all their policies now in existence, and the annual premiums payable to the Office. These show an ULTIMATE LIABILITY of £5,025,310 6s. 1d., and a PRESENT ANNUAL INCOME from premiums of £146,560 13s. 3d.

A third Table shows that in addition to THIS ANNUAL INCOME the assets realized and invested amount to £1,772,363 19s., producing in like manner an ANNUAL INCOME in the shape of interest.

So far this is a simple statement of an ordinary account. The question now to be determined by an actuarial operation is how far will these assets and incomes serve to realize this five millions of liability. The answer is given—a surplus of £367,459 being shown as the result.

The solemn declaration which accompanies the original statement, and the fact that the accounts are open to the criticism of the whole Society of Actuaries and of all the Managers of the Life Offices of the United Kingdom, must be held a sufficient proof of their correctness until the reverse be shown.

The Tables referred to may be obtained upon application at the Head Office of the Society, No. 50, Regent-street, W.; or at the City Office, No. 14, Cornhill, E.C.

JOHN HODDINOTT, Secretary.

SOVEREIGN LIFE OFFICE, 48, St. James's-street, and 110, Cannon-street, London.

New Policies were issued in 1869 for £311,250, at an average of £680 each. The Life and Annuity Funds connected with the Office exceed £600,000. Advances are made on Freeholds, &c.; also, to a limited extent, on first-class Personal Security.

The Right Hon. Lord Chelmsford.
The Right Hon. Lord Truro.
The Right Hon. Sir William Bovill, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.
The Right Hon. Lord Brougham.
The Right Hon. Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart.
The Right Hon. John Robert Mowbray, M.P.
The Hon. Vice-Chancellor Malins.

Insurances expiring at Midsummer should be renewed within 15 days thereafter, at the Offices of the Society, or with any of its Agents throughout the country.

The Directors beg to suggest to their Policyholders that a favourable opportunity is now afforded, by the Abolition of the Duty, for insuring property hitherto uninsured, and for increasing the amount of those Policies where the property is only partially protected.

N.B.—Fire Policies which expire at Midsummer must be renewed at the Head Office, or with the Agents, on or before the 9th of July.

Prospectus and Forms of Proposal, with the Actuary's Valuation and Statement of the Assets and Liabilities in the Life Branch, free on application to the Company's Agents, or to the Secretary.

COUNTY FIRE OFFICE, 50, REGENT STREET, and 14, CORNHILL, LONDON.

The COUNTY FIRE OFFICE was Established in the year 1846, upon the principle that the interests of its Policy-holders and its own should be identical. A system of strict economy and caution has enabled the Directors to return to their Policy-holders a considerable portion of the Premiums found to be in excess of the risks. These Returns, which originally varied with the profits of the year, are now fixed at the rate of 25 per cent. They are paid out of a fund specially provided for the purpose, and take precedence of the Dividends to the Shareholders. The Insured are exempt from all personal liability.

The following Table contains the Names of some of the Policy-holders who have participated in these Returns:—

Policy No.	Name and Residence of Insured.	Bonus.
138,142	William Felix Riley, Esq., Forest-hill	596 7 0
156,308	Messrs. Broadwood, Golden-square-W.	194 1 1

LONDON, JULY 9, 1870.

A MEETING OF SOLICITORS was held at the Guildhall Coffee-house, on Thursday, convened by members of this branch of the profession, who, to use their own phrase, are desirous of "infusing new blood into the council of the Incorporated Law Society." We report the proceedings in another column. The sense of the meeting appeared to be that the council of the society had been censurably inactive as regards measures before the Legislature, and also as regards their duty of repressing, by all possible means, improper practices by members of the profession and unqualified practitioners. After some discussion a resolution was carried in favour of the "infusion."

We believe that among solicitors a feeling has been lately gaining ground that the Incorporated Law Society are somewhat remiss in the discharge of the above-mentioned duties. We own ourselves to thinking that a more efficient check might have been kept upon the "unqualified practitioners," and the "black sheep of the profession." But we desire not to forget that it is easier to say—"so and so ought to be stopped," or—"such and such a one ought to be proceeded against"—than to carry the idea into execution. There are probably numerous instances in which the council of the Incorporated Law Society, with every desire to lay a heavy hand on some man or some practice, are reluctantly compelled to do nothing, because an investigation shows that the offender has been cunning or lucky enough to keep on the safe side of the law, or that no "case" can be proved. With regard to the pending measures of legislation too, the profession should not overlook the fact that the Incorporated Law Society would be unworthy of their position, did they lose sight of the principle that the interests of the public are the true interests of the profession. We have sometimes heard complaints made against the council because they have abstained from agitating for principles conceived only in the narrow interest of the lawyer's pocket. Still, we certainly think that the council will be all the better for the little "jog" which the conveners of this meeting would give them. If there is a belief extant that the council have been too inactive, it is very desirable that the matter should be ventilated, and the mere ventilation of the matter will probably produce the effect aimed at by the proceedings which we report to-day.

IN THE COURSE OF THE ARGUMENT on Friday of an appeal motion in the winding up of the Agriculturist Cattle Insurance Company, which involved an important question on the construction of the company's deed of settlement, Lord Justice James said:—"This is one of the cases of which I think it is very unfortunate that they are not determined by the Full Court. It is far more important than half the causes." We are glad to see that his Lordship gives the weight of his opinion to the view which we have frequently expressed of the ill-advised Act of 1867, which enabled a single Lord Justice to hear and decide all appeal motions without distinction. If this provision had been confined to merely interlocutory motions, it might have been unobjectionable; but as, under the statutory jurisdiction, matters of the greatest importance are brought before the Court in a summary way, and the decision of the primary judge is appealed from by way of motion, the result is that, in cases of this kind, if the decision is reversed, there is nothing but the opinion of one judge to set against that of another, a state of things which, we venture to think, is eminently unsatisfactory. Our only expectation at present that this state of things may be put an end to lies in the hope that the illness of Lord Justice Giffard may not be of long duration; a hope which, independently of this reason, we should most sincerely entertain.

A FEW WORDS UPON THE DUTIES of overseers in making out the list of voters for counties, may not be out of season at the present time. The various provisions of the statutes which have reference to the lists of £12 occupiers are far from consistent, and may well puzzle experienced vestry clerks, much less the overseers in country parishes, who usually have to perform the duties themselves without the assistance of a vestry clerk.

On the 10th of June, it was the duty of the clerks of the various counties to send to the overseers of each parish, with other documents, "a sufficient number of copies of the part or parts of the register relating to such parish" (vide 28 Vict. c. 36 s. 3), and the overseers had on the 20th of June, to publish a copy of the register then in force relating to their parish. Now the list of £12 occupiers of the previous year is undoubtedly a part of the register in force, and it therefore comes within the words of the enactment which we have quoted. Inasmuch, however, as the object of the publication of a copy of the old register is to enable persons not on the register to claim to be put on, and as £12 occupiers need not claim, but ought to be put on by the overseers without a claim, there is no object in publishing that part of the old register which relates only to £12 occupiers. Great confusion was caused last year in many places by the clerks of the peace sending the old £12 list to the overseers for publication, and we fancy it will be found that this year the great majority of clerks of the peace have not sent this part of the register to the overseers. The overseers have to make out on the 31st of July, and publish on the 1st of August, a list of the persons entitled on the 31st of July to vote as £12 occupiers. This is the part of their duty in the performance of which they usually make most mistakes. If the clerk of the peace has previously sent them the old list of £12 occupiers, they often confine themselves to re-publishing the old list, so that their list will contain the names of the occupiers during the wrong year. This mistake when made is capable of being rectified, because all the persons in the list who have become disqualified may be objected to, and all the new occupiers who have been improperly omitted may claim. It is, however, very clear that this is never likely to be done, and therefore when this mistake is made, the practical result will be that many unqualified persons will be left on the register, and many qualified ones will be omitted. On the other hand, when the overseer has not the list of the previous year to assist him, he is as likely as not to make as many mistakes in the form of his list as were made in the first year the duty was imposed on the overseers. In some cases the result of the clerk of the peace not sending a copy of the old £12 list has been that the overseer omits to publish any £12 list at all. Of course this arises from mere carelessness and inattention to the instructions that he receives, and no remarks of ours are likely to prevent its recurrence. Difficulties will, however, present themselves even to attentive overseers. Our advice to overseers about to make out their £12 lists, is that they should procure, if possible, a copy of the old list of the former year, as it appears on the register after being settled by the revising barrister, and use this as a model for their new list. If the revising barrister has taken the trouble to amend the list of the previous year in all respects, of course the model will be a perfect one; but even if he should not have done so, the overseer will probably escape any blame if he follows the form of the old list. The new list for the present year should include all persons who have been in the occupation of premises rated at £12 or upwards between the 31st of July, 1869, and the 30th of July, 1870, and have been rated to all rates "allowed" between those days. The overseer will be justified, in the absence of knowledge on his part to the contrary, in taking rating during the period as evidence of occupation; but wherever he is aware that the occupation began too late or had ceased, he should omit the name, and he also should be careful not to insert the names of owners of cottage property or the like, who are often rated though not in occupation. As regards the form of the list, the first column contains the name only; the second ought to contain a full postal address, so that a letter so addressed, without any further addition, and posted in any part of the kingdom, would be certain to reach the voter, and so also that any stranger coming to inquire for him on the spot might at once find him out by the address given. As to the third column there is some difference of opinion, but we have no doubt that it ought to give simply the subject-matter which the person occupies, and for which he is rated, as "house," "house and garden," "house and shop," and the like. There can be no harm if the subject-matter is given in adding other words such as "occupier of," or "rated occupier of," but in our judgment this is unnecessary. If the subject-matter is omitted, and only "rating to poor rate" or "poor rate," or the like given, there can be no doubt the description is erroneous, and though we think it clearly a case for the revising barrister to amend, we believe there are some who refuse to do so. As regards the fourth column, it should give the shortest name or local description of the subject-matter of the qualification sufficient to identify it, such as "Stallard's farm," "The King's Arm Inn," "13, High-street," "fields on the London-road," or the like. It is unnecessary in this column to add the name of the parish or county, as the qualification must be in the parish for which the list is made. One other matter troubles overseers in making out this list, and that is whether they should include or omit persons qualified to be on it, but who are also on the register for other qualifications. As the law stands at present, they ought to include them, although in cases where they themselves so well know of the existence of the other qualification, that in case of an objection they could prove the qualification before the revising barrister, they cannot do much harm if they omit the name. If, however, an objection should be afterwards served, and the qualification not proved, the result of the overseer's having omitted the name on the £12 list will be that the vote is lost altogether. Inasmuch, however, as the duplicates have ultimately to be struck out by the revising barrister, it is a great convenience if the overseer will note on his £12 list the names which appear also on the other lists. This will enable him to give the revising barrister readily the information which he requires, and will save a tedious comparison of lists and inquiries into the identity of parties of similar names. We fancy that any overseer who takes this trouble, will find favour with the revising barrister when he presents his bill of expenses for taxation.

THE EXTRADITION BILL passed rapidly through committee on Monday last. Two alterations only were made. The Attorney-General, to meet the views of Mr. McCullagh Barrons, and to promote greater security against the delivering up of political offenders, moved, as an amendment to clause 3, that not only shall a foreign criminal not be surrendered for an offence of a political character, but he shall not be surrendered if he satisfy the proper authorities that the object of the requisition for his surrender is to try him for such an offence. Secondly, piracy by municipal law was struck out of the list of crimes in the first schedule, and the Attorney-General undertook to consider whether "crimes of bankrupts against the bankruptcy law" should be retained. Our present extradition treaty with France extends to crimes against the bankruptcy law, but our treaty with the United States does not. It would seem more desirable to follow the French precedent than the American one, especially at the present time, when we are opening our eyes to the necessity of regarding bankrupts in a more unfavourable light than heretofore.

IN THE STATISTICAL RETURN of county court business for 1869 there is a column of figures which gives the number of orders for protection of the earnings and property of deserted married women registered in each of the county court circuits during the year. In two circuits there was only one order in each, but at the other end of the scale two circuits had respectively thirty-nine and thirty-two. The two former circuits are a Welsh and a Somersetshire one, neither including any large establishments employing female labour. Of the two latter, one consists chiefly of the towns of Salford, Rochdale, and Oldham, and the other of Bolton, Bury, and Wigan, all of them noted for their large numbers of what may be called wage-earning women. Fourteen circuits, consisting largely of these wage-earning women, account for more than one-half of the 738 orders granted during the year, while the other half, or less, are spread over the remaining forty-five circuits. The return is so got up that it is impossible to get at more than vague generalities, the numbers being given by circuits. If they were given by courts, as the registrars send them to the Treasury, a much more interesting, because more accurate, result might be arrived at.

APPROPOS OF SOME JUDICIAL STATISTICS recently published in the Times the British Medical Journal has the following:—

"Reference is often made by public writers to the conflict of opinion which is commonly found amongst medical witnesses. Lawyers are most apt to refer to this diversity of judgment—rarely in complimentary terms—most often to suggest or point the conclusion that judgments so divided in their course and so little consistent are of slight weight and deserve little consideration. A barrister furnishes us this week with facts that should modify that opinion, if strict analogy can serve to afford an illustration or to point an argument. The analysis of the decisions of Lord Justice Giffard, sitting alone in appeal cases from January to June, 1870, shows that of forty-one appeals from various courts the decisions of those courts were affirmed in seventeen cases, reversed in nineteen cases, and varied in five cases. In applying this illustration to the cases of difference of opinion amongst medical experts in courts of justice, it must be remembered that in the great majority of cases to be decided—say ninety per cent. of railway compensation cases—medical opinion is unanimous. And such cases do not come into court. It is only where doubts and difficulties arise that a judicial decision in court is ordinarily asked. The cases of agreement, which are most numerous, are settled out of sight. Moreover, it is only fair to take into account the essential elements of mystery, individual vital differences, and special combinations which surround each medical case, and obstruct the arrival at certainty. In legal decisions all the conditions are known, and the principles to be applied are ascertainable. The process is one of pure reasoning, free from conjecture. Yet it does not seem to be productive of complete unanimity in the end."

The "conditions" and the "principles" are the facts and the law. The former can hardly be said to be known when they are determinable only from the mass of testimony, which is often entirely contradictory, very often partially so. How, again, is the law ascertainable? That is law which the ultimate judge pronounces to be so: there may be an obscure statute at the construction of which the Court can only guess; or a network of Acts may have crossed each other, qualifying, repealing, and re-enacting, till a confusion is produced so gross that the same judgment would scarcely take the same view of it twice running; or perhaps an ancient doctrine of law has to be applied to a state of modern circumstances totally foreign to its origin and nature. If by pure reasoning our contemporary intends that deductive reasoning which, as in mathematics, can conduct only to one conclusion, the case does not admit of it.

But this is of minor importance, the fact of such a tu quoque being attempted shows completely our contemporary has misunderstood the situation. We are sorry to see the conflict of medical evidence in railway cases, not because we regard it as proving medical opinions to be of small value, but because we regret to see medical witnesses allowing themselves to be retained as medical partisans. Adopting the words of Dr. Charles Hall, in a paper published a few years ago by our contemporary itself, a medical man "forgets what is due to himself and the public, when he undertakes to become an advocate instead of a witness."

WE ARE GLAD TO LEARN that the Law Amendment Society have issued a circular in opposition to the motion of which Mr. Denman has given notice, with a view of impeding the further progress of the High Court of Justice Bill. The practical effect of that motion, if successful, would be to introduce the "vicious circle" pointed out by the Society. It would be said, first, "Don't consolidate your courts till you have the new procedure cut and dried and agreed upon;" and then, "You cannot possibly tell what rules of procedure ought to be adopted till you have a court in existence capable of working them;" and thus the reform, which all admit to be desirable, might by a little adroit manipulation be postponed ad Græcos Calendas. It is true that, having regard to the form in which the bill was originally introduced, we felt constrained to suggest that it ought to be referred to a select committee, a course which would have probably thrown it over for the present session; but the bill has been twice substantially re-drawn since then, each fresh phase being, on the whole, an improvement on its immediate predecessor; and in the shape in which it has been sent down to the Commons our original objections have all but entirely disappeared, the provisions now proposed concerning the new Rules and Orders being in effect tantamount to a compliance with our suggestions. As the bill now stands it simply commits the country to a most desirable measure of reform, whilst it postpones the practical operation of that measure until Parliament shall have approved of the principles of the proposed new procedure. The plan proposed by the bill, with the approbation of all parties in the House of Lords, is, moreover, free from the defect of introducing a stereotyped rule which nothing short of an Act of Parliament, or a case of open usurpation of authority, can get rid of. The original Rules are, indeed, to have Parliamentary sanction, and so far Parliament can secure that any principles it desires may be made unalterable; but the Court is to have power to vary these Rules from time to time, and therefore, so far as Parliament shall not have forbidden it, can alter or modify any regulation which may not have worked satisfactorily. How expedient such a power is may be easily gathered from the success which has attended Lord Cranworth's order of 13th January, 1855, which deliberately abrogated the provisions of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, ss. 29, 30, and substituted other provisions in lieu thereof, which substituted powers have continued for the last fifteen years to regulate the practice of the Court in several important points as to evidence, without any Parliamentary sanction whatever. The usurpation—for such it clearly was—was so beneficial that it has for so far succeeded; and yet—for it has not been established so long as the practice temporarily set aside by the celebrated decision in Cookney v. Anderson—it may even now be determined, to the discomfiture of some unfortunate plaintiff, that in every case in which mixed evidence has been taken the affidavit portion of the evidence was strictly inadmissible, because the rule authorising its use was—as it clearly was—ultra vires. We sincerely trust that this opposition, which we are unwilling to attribute to a desire for mere delay, may fail, and that this session of Parliament—which has not, so far as we know, as yet produced any very valuable addition to the Statute-book—will not come to a close before it has conclusively affirmed the proposition that there ought no longer to exist a multiplicity of superior courts, each of which is confessedly unable to do complete justice in every case which may come before it.

THE JUDICATURE COMMISSION have been asking questions of county court registrars on a subject to which we called attention some time ago (vide ante 587), namely, the extraordinary difference in the numbers of the nonsuits and judgments for defendants, in proportion to plaints issued, in some courts as compared with others. One registrar said he instructed his issuing clerk to refuse to issue a summons if the case presented to him was clearly a bad one; and this he did in the interest of ignorant persons who often sought to spend money in cases which any intelligent person, to say nothing of a lawyer, would at once pronounce to be hopeless. Refusing to issue summonses in such cases, no doubt, has the effect of diminishing the number of nonsuits and judgments for defendants; but another registrar put the case in a very different light. It was not fair, he said, to throw such a responsibility on the issuing clerk, it was making him a sort of judge to decide on an ex parte statement. He therefore instructed his clerk not to refuse a summons, however bad the case might appear to be, the judge being the only person to decide whether it was bad or not. These two different modes of practice will, no doubt, account to a considerable extent for the discrepancies pointed out in the article referred to; but the question arises, which of the two courses is the proper one? It may be hard upon a poor man to take his money for a process which obviously must prove abortive, and must, in addition, entail more expense; but, on the other hand, the applicant is not likely to be content with the decision of a clerk who tells him he has no case, and, therefore, cannot have a summons. A refusal of process is a decision on the claim by the clerk refusing the process, and it is hardly expedient that intending plaintiffs, however ignorantly obstinate, should be compelled to accept the decision of anyone short of the judge, or, at least, the registrar. Recently, in one of the London courts, a plaintiff having stated his case, the judge at once said there was no cause of action whatever, and gave judgment for the defendant, telling the plaintiff he was a very foolish man for bringing the case into court. The issuing clerk explained to the judge that he had told the plaintiff, when he applied for the summons, that he had no case, and had better keep his money in his pocket. The plaintiff refused to take the clerk's advice, and insisted on proceeding. The clerk said he should decline to issue then, but if plaintiff returned after having taken an hour to consider the matter, as he then appeared somewhat excited, the summons should issue. The plaintiff returned and issued the summons, with the result before mentioned, the judge remarking that the clerk could hardly have done more than he did to protect the plaintiff from his own folly.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS have this week decided the question in the Duke of Newcastle's case—viz., whether, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, a peer of Parliament and non-trader could be adjudicated bankrupt. It will be remembered that Mr. Commissioner Winslow decided the question in the negative, his decision being reversed by Lord Justice Giffard. We pointed out, when the question first arose, that the answer must be in the affirmative, and the House of Lords' decision finally settles the matter.

so; the solution, however, was, to our mind, too plain to admit of any doubt.

WE HAVE ALREADY HAD OCCASION to notice Mr. Dodd's Revestment of Mortgages Bills, which, though both of them impracticable, were directed to a useful object. Apres of these measures, a Canadian legal journal remarks that in that colony the revestment of mortgages has for many years been effected by a certificate of discharge under Local Registry Acts.

IN ANOTHER COLUMN will be found our reporter's account of the meeting of the Legal Education Association, held at Lincoln's-inn this week, and the speech of Sir Roundell Palmer, as chairman. The association is now formally started, and with such unanimity as to its objects we may look for excellent results as a certainty.

THE JUDICIAL COMMITTEE.

Now that the future constitution of the superior courts of this country is, as we sincerely hope, practically settled, the attention of law reformers is naturally directed to the working of that important tribunal which now forms the principal connecting link between the mother country and its numerous colonies. We need not in this journal insist on the value of anything which binds Great Britain and her colonies together. The appellate jurisdiction of the Crown, exercised through the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, is one of the most important links which connect them all with this country and with one another. It is therefore of no slight moment that this jurisdiction should be exercised in a manner which may command the confidence and preserve the good-will of the colonies at large, and this it will be very unlikely to do if a large and increasing arrear indefinitely delays the hearing of appeals, and so practically destroys the control of the superior tribunal; or if, from want of judicial power, or any other cause, the appellate Court should fail to command the respect as well as the obedience of the local populations. As the Judicial Committee is at present constituted, the latter of these contingencies is not very likely to occur. Recruited as it is from the front ranks of all departments of the judiciary at home, and with the further services of persons specially adapted for dealing with the most peculiar of the local systems of law which come under its cognizance, it is scarcely possible that any change can be made in the constitution of the Court which would not tend rather to diminish than to increase its judicial excellence. On the other hand, the accumulation of arrears is a serious evil, which seems imperatively to demand a remedy, if only one could be devised which would not aggravate the mischief by lowering the character of the Court.

To this end it has lately been proposed to attach this appellate jurisdiction to the appeal division of the High Court of Justice, but this plan seems to us to involve several serious disadvantages without any compensating advantage whatever. It in no way increases the judicial strength of the Court, for all the Lords Justices of Appeal are already to be members of the Judicial Committee; and if their time is not fully taken up by their more immediate duties, there is nothing to prevent them from taking—nay more, it is their duty to take—their turn at the sittings of the Privy Council, and it certainly would not tend to increase the efficacy of the Court, whilst it equally certainly would diminish its prestige, to transfer its sittings from the Privy Council Chamber to one of the ordinary courts of this country. And this objection applies yet more forcibly to the substance of the proposal. It is far from clear that such peoples as those of Canada and the Australian colonies would be willing to allow the decisions of their supreme courts to be subjected to the review of a purely English court, and one, moreover, which is itself to be a subordinate both in form and substance. If the proposition merely means that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, unchanged in constitution, is to hold its sittings along with those of the Divisional Court of Appeal, occupying such time as can be spared, or may be allocated to it, out of the sittings of that Court, it merely degrades the status of the Court without increasing its efficiency; if, on the other hand, it is meant to transfer the jurisdiction from one body to the other, it wantonly throws away the services of the retired judges for no purpose that we can see, except to heap upon a local court—which, if successful, will certainly have no lack of business of its own, and if unsuccessful ought not to have any extension of its jurisdiction—a mass of extraneous matters, depending upon a variety of systems of law of which the Court is judicially ignorant, whatever the personal knowledge of any of its members may be, to the detriment as well of its ordinary functions as of the dignity and prestige of our colonial administration.

Nor can we see any ground whatever for a violent remedy, at least until the effect of an obvious and simple one has been tried. Let the Committee be empowered to form any number of sub-committees sitting simultaneously, so long only as there is a quorum present at each, and provide for the presence there of all privy councillors who are in the receipt of judicial pensions, whether from any part of the United Kingdom, or any of our colonies or dependencies, as well as of the judges who now form a part of this Committee, and there will be no lack of judicial power of the highest order, sufficient, not only to keep down the appeals, but, at no very distant period, to work off the arrear. And as it may possibly be the case, though we are far from admitting it, that as these judges are unpaid it will be difficult to secure their services with the regularity which would be essential to the sitting of a permanent court, the difficulty might be avoided by making the receipt of a pension on the full scale conditional on a fixed minimum number of attendances at the sittings of the Committee, unless relieved therefrom by the order of the Committee itself for cause to be mentioned in the order. A judge who for any reason whatever wished to retire without being liable to serve on this Committee might do so by accepting a pension on a reduced scale.

If the idea that the new Court of Appeal will have time to spare from its regular work should turn out well founded, of course all the judges of that court will be available for the Committee, and these added to the members already mentioned will be amply sufficient for the requirements of the case; but should that not prove to be so, and should no more assistance be available from that quarter than is now to be obtained from the Court of Appeal in Chancery, still we do not see any reason to doubt that a Court which would consist of some thirty members could easily sit (in three committees) for one hundred days in the year; and this would, we think, be sufficient to keep down the work.

Of all the propositions which have come to our notice that of a regular staff of paid judges for this service only seems to us the worst, not only as so unnecessarily wasting the available services of the ex-chancellors and retired judges, but as necessarily throwing the court into the hands of men who, whatever their personal merits may happen to be, cannot hope to vie in weight or influence with a court which necessarily comprehends the most tried and distinguished lawyers which the empire can furnish. If the paid judges are promoted from the ranks of the judiciary the result is merely an expensive system of forced and premature retirement; if they are appointed direct from the ranks of the bar they cannot, as a body, command the deference now awarded to the present Committee. At any rate, it will be time enough to create a totally new staff of judges, at a greatly increased expense, when the simpler, cheaper, and more obvious remedy we have suggested has been tried and failed.

ON THE REMEDIES OF UNPAID VENDORS OF LAND TO RAILWAY COMPANIES.

It is only of late years that cases on this subject have come into the reports. They are now numerous enough, as any one would expect who was acquainted with the history of railway enterprise in this country during the last seven years. It is well settled what are the means at the disposal of a vendor for enforcing his lien, in an ordinary case; but where the purchaser was a railway company, buying under the powers and for the objects of their Act, there used to be an impression that the Act conferred on the public a sort of right of user of the land, so that the vendor, in default of payment, was debarred from enforcing his lien upon the land thus dedicated to the public in any way that could impair their right. In a former volume we commented on the decisions then bearing upon the subject; as cases of this description are continually recurring, it will not be amiss to renew the subject again by the aid of new lights. In Walker v. Ware, Hadham, and Buntingford Railway Company (14 W. R. 158, L. R. 1 Eq. 195), which was a landowner's suit for specific performance, declaration of lien, and sale in default of payment, it was contended that the Legislature, by providing special remedies for landowners, had deprived them of the lien which arises by implication out of ordinary contracts for the sale of land as distinguished from chattels; and that the purpose for which the land was required, with the vendor's knowledge, was inconsistent with the enforcement of his lien in any way that would affect the rights of the public. The Master of the Rolls held, and his decision in this, one of the earliest cases of the class, has always been followed—that the vendor's statutory remedy by action brought upon the bond which under section 85 of the Lands Clauses Act the company gives on taking possession, if they do not pay the purchase-money at once, did not impliedly deprive the landowner of his lien, but that such lien was an inherent equitable right, common to him and to vendors in general. As the Lord Justice put it in Munn v. Isle of Wight Railway Company (18 W. R. 781, L. R. 5 Ch. 414), the latest case upon the subject, the company could only give to the public such rights of user as the company itself possessed, so that, if the vendor happened to have rights against the company, the rights of the public could only be subservient to his rights.

In Wood v. Charing Cross Railway Company (33 Beav. 290, 13 W. R. Ch. Dig. 38), where the works were almost or altogether completed on land of which the company had taken possession by some mistake, and the Master of the Rolls refused to stay the progress of the works on an interlocutory application, for that to do so would be to cause inconvenience to the company and injury to the public, without any corresponding benefit to the plaintiff, the ratio decidendi was, that the plaintiff had stood by during the progress of the works, and could obtain a settlement without driving the company to accept more onerous terms by the method of an injunction. Where the conduct of the parties allows it, the Court is bound to, and will, consider public convenience; but where a vendor has an inherent equitable right to enforce his lien, the Court will not refuse to give him its aid, because a line of railway would be shut up, which the preamble of an Act has stated to be of public advantage.

It was some time, however, before this was definitely ruled. In the Bishops Waltham Railway case (15 W. R. 96, L. R. 2 Ch. 384) Lord Cairns and Lord Justice Turner rather hinted that the land covered by the railway could not be sold; while in Raphael v. Thames Valley Railway Company (15 W. R. 322, L. R. 2 Ch. 151), decided about the same time, Lord Chelmsford observed, obiter, "that it was at least questionable whether, in a case where there had been a determined and wilful breach of an agreement by a railway company, the element of public convenience ought to be introduced, so as to prevent a decree for specific performance." It is now settled that the unpaid vendor is entitled to a sale. The decision in Walker v. Ware, Hadham, and Buntingford Railway Company was followed in Wing v. Tottenham and Hampstead Junction Railway Company (16 W. R. 1898, L. R. 3 Ch. 740). In this case the Court of Appeal decided that, in default of payment, the vendor was entitled to a sale of the land, although the railway made over it was actually completed and ready for traffic; adding (per Lord Justice Selwyn) that a vendor of land to a railway company is, with respect to his lien, in no different position from a vendor of land to any other purchaser.

Where, however, land is sold to a railway company in consideration of a yearly rent-charge, in manner provided by section 10 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, the vendor is not entitled to a lien for the unpaid arrears on the principle of Winter v. Lord Anson (3 Russ. 488), and, therefore, is not entitled to a sale in default of payment. "A man conveys a piece of land," said Vice-Chancellor James, in Earl of Jersey v. Briton Ferry Floating Dock Company (L. R. 7 Eq. 409), "for the construction of a public work in consideration of an annual payment. It appears to me that it would be quite contrary to the intention of the parties to suppose the vendor was reserving to himself a right at any future time to enter and destroy the public work if the annual rent should fall into arrear. Hence, in my opinion, there is no lien in such a case for unpaid purchase-money." This conclusion should be borne in mind. But it is, after all, foreign to our present purpose, which is to consider how the lien may be enforced, rather than in what cases it arises.

We have seen that where the consideration was a gross sum the vendor, in default of payment, is entitled to a declaration of lien. But what are his remedies for enforcing it? We have seen that he is entitled to an order for sale: and it seems that the land, if sold, will be sold free from the rights of the company and from all claims of the public to use it as a highway (Munn v. Isle of Wight Railway Company, ubi sup.) The application for this order should be by petition, not motion (Williams v. Great Eastern Railway Company, 16 W. R. 821), and will be granted irrespective of the fact of the railway being completed and opened for traffic (Vyner v. Hoylake Railway Company, 17 W. R. 92). But the sale is often bootless, for who will buy a section of a railway? A receiver is often appointed until sale. The Court will not, however, now restrain the company from using the land until payment. In Cosens v. Bognor Railway Company, (14 W. R. 1002, L. R. 1 Ch. 594), the purchasers had leased their undertaking to another company, and the money remaining unpaid, the vendor filed his bill against both companies, praying for payment of the purchase-money, and an injunction to restrain the company from using the land until payment. Upon a motion to restrain both companies in default of payment from running any engine over or otherwise using the land, until the hearing, the Court held (disc. Lord Justice Turner, who thought that the proper course was to appoint a receiver of the tolls) that the case not being an ordinary one, the motion ought to be granted. Subsequent decisions have shown that the opinion of Lord Justice Turner was correct.

The case of Bishop of Winchester v. Mid Hants Railway Company (16 W. R. 72, L. R. 5 Eq. 17) was, like the last, a bill by an unpaid vendor against two railway companies—the purchasers and their lessees—in possession of the land. Whether the land has been taken by consent or not, be it observed in passing, has no bearing upon the present question. The prayer was for specific performance of the contract, for payment of the purchase-money, for an injunction against both companies, for a declaration of lien to be enforced by a sale, and that a receiver might be appointed over the estate of the purchasers. The prayer went farther than it ought to have gone, inasmuch as the Court could not appoint a receiver of more than the land which was the subject of the unperformed contract. Vice-Chancellor Stuart—and this is a point of importance—held that the lessees were properly made parties; and, after a declaration of lien in the usual way, gave leave to apply for an injunction, as well as for the appointment of a receiver of the profits of the land in question. It does not appear what were the subsequent proceedings in this suit, or whether the injunction was actually awarded. Suits of this class are instituted to compel payment by indirect means, and an injunction against using the railway must be the most potent weapon in the repertory of the unpaid vendor. Unluckily for him, it is a weapon which he is no longer entitled to use. In Pell v. The Northampton Railway Company (15 W. R. 27, L. R. 2 Ch. 100), where the company were let into possession on giving the usual bond, and default was made, the Lords Justices decided that the landowner was not entitled to restrain the company from using the land, it appearing inconsistent, in the words of Lord Cairns (loc. cit.), in a suit for specific performance, to apply to turn the purchaser out of possession.

In Munns v. The Isle of Wight Railway Company (17 W. R. 1081, L. R. 8 Eq. 653) nevertheless, the injunction was awarded by Vice-Chancellor James, with the usual suspension of the order being enforced, against running any engine over or otherwise using or continuing in possession of the land. This order has been discharged by Lord Justice Giffard (18 W. R. 781), who holds that to grant an injunction was not the right course to pursue, because it precluded all use of the land, and amounted to a discontinuance of possession. But the Lord Justice appointed a receiver, whom he directed the company to put into possession forthwith.

We regard the decision on appeal in Munns v. Isle of Wight Railway Company, supported, as it is, by the dictum of Lord Cairns in Pell v. Northampton Railway Company, as decisive of the vexed question whether an unpaid landowner is entitled to restrain the company from using the land. We have seen that he is entitled to a sale, and to a receiver until sale of the rents and profits of the land, like an ordinary vendor, irrespective of the so-called rights of the public. Even then he is much better off than the mortgagee or debenture-holder who is only entitled to a receiver; while it must be remembered that an injunction, if actually awarded, will deprive the company of the only means by which they can possibly discharge the landowner's claim. The reader will observe that the order in Munns v. Isle of Wight Railway Company was made notwithstanding the filing of the scheme of arrangement. Schemes of arrangement are not, it will be remembered (Re Cambrian Railway Company's Scheme, 16 W. R. 346, L. R. 3 Ch. 278), made binding by section 18 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, upon unpaid landowners, though the Court has jurisdiction to restrain their proceedings during the maturing of the scheme.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

CASES WHERE DEBTORS ARE NOT PROTECTED FROM IMPRISONMENT—DEBTORS ACT, 1869, s. 4.

Young v. Dallimore, V.C.S., 18 W. R. 445.

This was a decision upon section 4, sub-section 3 of the Act, to the effect that a trustee who had made default in payment of a sum of money into Court, in pursuance of an order to that effect, was not protected from imprisonment.

In Re Rush (18 W. R. 331) the Master of the Rolls held, in the case of a solicitor, that default in payment of a balance found due from him to his client upon taxation, under the common order, was within the exception of sub-section 4, and rendered him liable to an attachment.

In The Queen v. Pratt (L. R. 5 Q. B. 176) default in payment of costs which had been awarded by quarter sessions against one of the parties to an appeal, and which by Jarvis' Act may be enforced by distress, and in default of distress by warrant of commitment, was held the "default in payment of any sum recoverable summarily before a justice or justices of the peace" within the meaning of sub-section 2.

Hewitson v. Sherwin, V.C.J. (18 W. R. 802), was a case of default in payment of costs under an order for payment of costs only, and the case was held to come within section 5 of the Act, as "default in payment of a debt due in pursuance of an order of the Court." Costs ordered to be paid are then a debt due from the person ordered to pay them, for non-payment of which he may be committed. In this particular case an order was made for payment of the costs by instalments under the 4th clause of sub-section 2, section 5, together with the costs of the motion. In default, the penalty is imprisonment for any term not exceeding six weeks or until payment of the sum due (section 5). This section, it will be remembered, varies the power of county courts under the County Court Act, 1846, ss. 98, 99, and the Acts amending the same.

SALE OF OFFICER'S COMMISSION—PRIORITY OF INCUMBRANCERS.

Boos v. Hopkinson, M.R., 18 W. R. 725.

Although an officer of the army cannot mortgage his pay, he may assign or encumber beforehand the proceeds of the sale of his commission; though no equitable charge is created by a deposit of the document which constitutes the "commission" itself (Collyer v. Fallon, T. & R. 438). Several cases, of which the present is one, have recently come before the Master of the Rolls, in which there has been a race for priority between such incumbrancers on the proceeds of the sale. No assignment of an incumbrance, or a choses in action, is complete until the holder or trustee is affected by notice of it. We use the term "affected by notice" advisedly, in order to avoid touching the manner of notice, because the Court of Chancery has of late years shown some disposition to change its attitude as regards that topic. In Dearle v. Hall (3 Russ. 1), Foster v. Cookernall (3 Cl. & F. 456), and other cases, this doctrine is put rather as a matter of policy, as a system of reward and punishment for those who do and do not bestir themselves to give notice. In some later cases, culminating in Lloyd v. Banks, (Lord Cairns, 16 W. R. 988), the judges seem to have disregarded this consideration of policy, and regarded the question as purely one of actual knowledge, not asking, "Did or did not the incumbrancer give notice?"—but "Had or had not the trustee as a fact an actual knowledge of the charge?" The reader, who desires to examine the decisions more minutely, is referred to our remarks on the case of Lloyd v. Banks (12 S. J. 803). In Earl of Suffolk v. Cox (15 W. R. 782), the Master of the Rolls held that when an officer sells his commission, his army agents become trustees of the purchase money for him, as soon "as it became their duty to carry out the distribution of the funds derived from the sale of the commission—that is, as soon as notice appeared in the Gazette of the retirement," &c.

In Yates v. Cox (17 W. R. 20) the Master of the Rolls held that notices given before the agents had become trustees, do not affect them when they have become trustees—that such notices are in fact useless; the notice to be effective must be given afterwards. Thus when one incumbrancer gave notice just before, and several others just after, all the latter came in first, and the former would have to give a fresh notice. Now, as we have just observed, Lord Cairns, in Lloyd v. Banks, seemed to regard the question as one of actual knowledge; it might then be argued that, on this view, a notice received by agents just before they became trustees of an officer's money, might be presumed to be retained in their minds afterwards, so as to affect them with notice of the incumbrance. In the present case, Lord Romilly repeats his decision in Yates v. Cox, but the point we raise does not seem to have been taken. The argument is not so ready in the case of a firm of army agents as of a single trustee, because in the latter case you might be able to prove as a fact that the man did remember after he became trustee what he heard before—a consideration wholly inapplicable of course to the machinery of an army agent's and banker's office. At any rate, Lord Romilly's rule is a practically convenient one.

When a quantity of notices are given simultaneously, the court places those incumbrancers inter se in the order of their incumbrances.

RECEIVER UNDER AN INSPECTORSHIP DEED THE AGENT OF THE DEBTORS.

Hobson v. Jones, M. R., 18 W. R. 477.

This was a decision that the receiver under an ordinary deed of inspectorship, where there was no cessio bonorum, was the agent of the debtor, not of the inspectors who appointed him; the question being whether the debtor or the inspectors were to be the losers by the default of the receiver. The case must not be regarded as having been decided otherwise than upon its particular circumstances, but as the point does not appear to have come before the Court before, it may be worth noticing.

The Master of the Rolls compared the receiver in such a case to the receiver of a mortgaged estate, who is now (23 & 24 Vict. c. 145 s. 17) the agent of the mortgagor, not of the mortgagee, and laid some stress on the analogy between the two cases; also pointing out that where there is no cessio bonorum, inspectors are simply what their name denotes, persons to inspect and control, if necessary, the debtor in his management of the estate, without taking any estate or interest therein. Apt words might have been introduced to make the inspectors liable for moneys received by the inspectors, but the question here was solely as to the construction of the particular deed.

The duties of inspectors under a creditor's deed were considered in Chaplin v. Young (83 Beav. 330, 12 W. R. Ch. Dig. 29).

COMMON LAW.

RAILWAY COMPANY—NEGLIGENCE—CONVEYANCE OVER LINE NOT BELONGING TO CONTRACTING COMPANY.

Thomas v. Rhymney Railway Company, Q. B., 18 W. R. 668.

The Court of Queen's Bench in this case expressed a doubt as to the correctness of the principle laid down and acted upon in Great Western Railway Company v. Blake (10 W. R. 388) and Buxton v. North Eastern Railway Company (16 W. R. 1124), but at the same time they followed these two cases as they thought they were bound by them. The principle of The Great Western Railway Company v. Blake, as explained in Buxton v. The North Eastern Railway Company, is, "That where a railway company contracts with a passenger to carry him from one terminus to another, and on the journey the train has to pass over the line of another railway company, the company issuing the ticket incurs the same responsibility as that other company over whose line the train runs, and by whose default the accident happens, would incur if the contract to carry had been entered into with them."

In Thomas v. Rhymney Railway Company the plaintiff took a ticket from the defendants for a journey from A. to B. Part of the journey had to be performed on the line of the T. Railway Company, over which the defendants had running powers. The entire management of that portion of the line was in the hands of the T. company. An accident, by which the plaintiff was injured, occurred on this portion of the line, solely in consequence of the negligence of the T. company. The defendants were not negligent. The Court held the defendants liable on the authority of the two cases we have mentioned, but they expressed a dissent from the principle of those cases. This case therefore throws a doubt upon the law on this subject, without in any way altering it. The point of law itself is of much importance now that long journeys over the lines of several different railways are so frequently made. The law, as settled by the authorities on which this case is decided, is on the whole reasonable, and it relieves persons who may have been injured in a railway accident from the difficulty of having to search for the persons who are legally responsible to them for the damage caused. If a company contract to carry passengers from one point to another, it is more reasonable that the passenger should have a remedy against the company with whom he contracted than that he should have to discover the persons who were the immediate cause of the accident.

To hold the contracting company thus liable will render them more careful than they might otherwise be to provide for the safety of their trains, and it would be always in their power to recover damages from other companies whose lines they use if such companies are guilty of negligence by which the contracting company suffers loss.

Besides this reason for holding the contracting company liable, there are others, as, for instance, that, in cases which might be suggested, a passenger might have no remedy against a company with whom he made no contract although their acts caused him injury. It might be impossible to show that there had been any negligence as towards him. All these difficulties are avoided if the company which contracts to carry is primarily liable for the whole journey to those whom it so contracts to carry, and there seems to be no legal rule which need prevent the establishment of the principle.

SIXTY YEARS' TITLE—LEASEHOLD TITLE.

Frend v. Buckley, Ex. Ch., 18 W. R. 680.

On the sale of a fee simple estate without any special conditions the vendee is entitled to demand a sixty years' title, and the same rule applies to the sale of a leasehold estate. Frend v. Buckley has now decided that, on the sale of a leasehold estate, the vendor must not only give the usual sixty years' title, but he must also produce the original lease even if it is more than sixty years old, or, if it is lost, prove its contents by copy or otherwise.

The argument against thus holding was that in no case whatever could a vendor of land on an unconditional sale be called on to give more than a sixty years' title. The Court decided against this view, and held that if there is any difficulty in giving such proof the vendor should protect himself against the necessity of so doing by inserting a condition to that effect in his contract of sale. If there is no such condition the lease must be produced. This decision is, we believe, quite in accordance with what has hitherto been the practice of conveyancers in these cases, although no decision was cited which directly settled the point.

EVIDENCE—INTERROGATORIES—LIBEL.

Bowden v. Allen, C. P., 18 W. R. 695.

This decision is the result of the gross carelessness that is habitually displayed in the drawing of statutes. As we noticed the case immediately after it was decided (ante 524) we will now only briefly state the point involved.

6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76, contained various provisions by which it was rendered easy to ascertain who were the printers, publishers and proprietors of any newspaper, &c.; and by section 19 it was also provided that anyone should be compelled to answer a bill of discovery in chancery in aid of an action for libel, for the purpose of ascertaining the name of the printers, publishers, &c., of any newspaper, &c. All these provisions are repealed by the Newspapers, &c., Repeal Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 24), and section 19 is re-enacted.

The consequence of this is that a plaintiff in an action for libel in a newspaper may be unable to prove who are the printers, &c., of the paper, except by incurring the expense and delay of filing a bill in chancery. The means for ascertaining this information (except by a bill of discovery) are repealed, and a defendant in an action of libel cannot be interrogated under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 51, as to whether he published the libel, &c., because his answer might criminate him and expose him to an indictment. This result of the Act of 1869 is obvious to anyone reading the statute with any care, and we noticed this consequence in the legislation of last year (13 S. J. 919) when commenting upon the statute then just passed.

Bowden v. Allen has now decided that the law is as we have above stated it to be, and the inconvenience must remain until there is fresh legislation on the subject. All this might have been spared by a provision requiring answers to interrogatories at common law in the same way, and subject to the same conditions, that answers are required by the re-enacted section of 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 76, to a bill of discovery in chancery. The plaintiff is entitled to the information from the defendant, but he cannot obtain it in the court in which his action is brought.

LIABILITY OF ASSIGNEE OF LEASE TO LESSEE—PRIORITY.

Moule v. Garrett, Ex., 18 W. R. 697.

This case decides that a lessee who has been successfully sued for breaches of covenant committed while the lease was vested in an assignee of his assignee can recover from such second assignee the amount which the lessee has thus had to pay, and this liability of the second assignee is not affected by the fact that the first assignee covenanted with the lessee to keep all the covenants in the lease, and that the second assignee made a similar covenant with the first.

This point has never before been decided, although there were some dicta to this effect in two or three reported cases. In Burnett v. Lynch (5 B. & C. 589) a lessee assigned his lease, and the assignee broke some of the covenants of the lease for which the lessee had to pay, and the lessee was held entitled to recover the amount so paid from his assignee, although there was no express contract between the parties to this effect. In this case there was direct privity between the plaintiff and defendant, and it seems no stretch of principle to imply a contract by the assignee to indemnify the lessee against the consequence of a breach of the covenants by the assignee, their contract containing no direct stipulations on that matter. Moule v. Garrett has, however, extended this principle so as to render the assignee of the assignee liable to indemnify the lessee. The only authorities for thus extending the assignee's liability are dicta in two cases in which the decisions were upon other points. In Humble v. Langston (7 M. & W. 536) there is a dictum that "the assignee of the lease becomes liable to the lessor for the performance of all the covenants which run with the land, and the lessee is also liable in the nature of a surety, as between himself and the assignee, for the performance of the same covenants." This principle has been expanded in a further dictum in Wolveridge v. Steward (1 C. & M. 644), where it is said that a lessee who has been compelled to pay for breaches of covenants in a lease committed by assignees "would in all probability have the same remedy over against each subsequent assignee in respect of breaches committed during the continuance of the interest of each of them, for the lessee is in effect a surety for each of them to the lessor."

The Court of Exchequer, adopting the principle expressed in this last dictum, decided as above stated. Cleasby, B., dissented from this decision on the ground "that between such remote parties there is an entire absence of that privity which is required to raise any implied contract between them, or any duty in respect of which an action can be brought." The arguments in favour of and against the decision are fully stated in the judgment of Cleasby, B., on one side, and of Channell, B., delivering the judgment of the majority of the Court, on the other side.

This case is an instance of an unusually wide extension of the principle by which contracts are "implied," as it is called in law. There is no agreement whatever in fact between the parties in a case like Moule v. Garrett, and the judgment of the majority of the Court seems to have been much influenced by the fact that the lessee in similar cases had been called a "surety" for the due performance by the respective assignees of the covenants of the lease. Cleasby, B., suggests that the contract between the lessee and assignee, if implied at all, is one of indemnity and not of suretyship. In fact, the relation between a lessee and an assignee is without the elements which are essential to create a contract of suretyship. A surety is liable when the principal has broken his contract. Until there is such breach he is not under any liability. In the case of the lessee, however, who has been called surety, there is no right of action at all until the lessee's own contract is broken. That is, until the lessee is liable to an action for breach of contract no one is liable. Whether or not there is any liability has to be ascertained by reference to the lessee's original contract with the lessor; if that is broken the lessor may sue either the lessee or the assignee, but the assignee's liability is dependent on the lessee's liability. This places the lessee rather in the position of principal than of surety. Again, in Moule v. Garrett it seems to have been assumed that the person primarily liable to observe the covenants in the lease is always the assignee for the time being. But this is not necessarily so. In an assignment the assignor may covenant that he and not the assignee shall repair, &c., and perform the covenants in the lease. In such an assignment the assignee would doubtless be liable to the lessor for breaches during the period of his interest, but there would be no reason for saying that he was primarily liable any more than for saying that the lessee was primarily liable. For these and other reasons noticed by Cleasby, B., this case will probably hardly be received as an undoubted authority until it is either recognised in subsequent decisions or affirmed in a higher court.

It seems, although not stated in so many words, that the principle of Moule v. Garrett applies only to breaches of covenants running with the land, as the assignee would not be liable to the lessor on any but these covenants.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—RIGHT TO SUE—BROKER—BOUGHT AND SOLD NOTES.

Fairlie v. Fenton, Ex., 18 W. R. 700.

A contract made by agents who disclose their principals at the time of the contract has the same legal effect as a contract made directly between the principals. The principals, and the principals alone, are the proper parties to sue and to be sued for a breach of the contract. If, however, an agent really contracting for a principal, nevertheless does not disclose that he is an agent, and contracts as if he himself were principal, he may be held liable upon the contract as if he were in fact principal. In such cases the other party to the contract, unless the contract is under seal, has an option to sue either the principal or the agent, and the agent or the principal may sue the other party. So, also, an agent may, if he chooses to do so, bind himself by the contract, although he discloses the name of his principal.

In Fairlie v. Fenton the plaintiff sold, as broker for a disclosed principal, some cotton to the defendants. The sale note was in the usual form, and commenced "I have this day sold you on account of" the principal (naming him), and it then described the cotton, and was directed to the defendants, and signed by the plaintiff, who wrote the word "broker" after his signature. The defendants refused to accept the cotton, and the plaintiff sued them for breach of contract, and the only question of law was whether the plaintiff was entitled to sue in his own name. The Court held that he was not entitled to sue, as they thought that the contract was with the principals only, and the broker could not have been sued upon the contract, and, therefore, of course could not sue upon it.

The decision, therefore, is that a broker selling goods by bought and sold notes in the usual form, signed, "So-and-so, 'broker,'" cannot sue or be sued upon that contract. The principle of the decision is, as we stated, that when duly authorised agents contract for disclosed principals, the contract is between the principals only, and the agents therefore cannot sue or be sued upon it, unless there is something in the contract to show that it was intended that the agent should be personally liable. This principle is clear, although its application is often difficult, and this case is of importance on account of the application of that principle to a large class of contracts which are almost always made in the same form, and therefore a decision on one of such contracts is likely often to be referred to as an authority.

There was no question in this case as to the plaintiff's having any personal interest in the goods as a factor or auctioneer may have. When an agent selling goods has such a personal interest a somewhat different rule of law is applied, and the agent may sometimes sue in his own name, when without such interest he would have no right of action.

REVIEWS.

Reports of Cases Determined in the Supreme Courts of the State of California in the January, April, and July Terms, 1869. J. E. HALE, Reporter. Vol. 37. San Francisco: Sumner Whitney.

The specimens which come before us compel us to pronounce American law reporting as exceedingly badly done. The reporters appear to report cases indiscriminately, and the reports are crowded with decisions depending wholly on facts and utterly useless for citation purposes, besides innumerable other cases in which the points involved are incontestible propositions of law, to report which is a mere waste of paper. It seems as though no reporter ever gave himself time to consider what are the attributes of a reportable decision. So much for the selection of cases. Then the manner of execution is equally slovenly, the headnotes are wretchedly digested, and the statements of facts, if possible, worse; the latter are generally overloaded with the grossest irrelevancies. Indeed in the case of Wallace's Supreme Court Reports, the irrelevancies grew so grossly and ridiculously intolerable that the American Law Review printed an article on the matter, in which some of the strangest instances were recapitulated. Many of these expatiations were so utterly incredible that "we would not have believed them had we not seen them in print" (the reader will find the article in question in the first volume of the American Law Review). In other instances the reporters adopt the lazy and miserable shift of taking their statements of cases verbatim from the pleadings or evidence filed in the case. Mr. Hale, the reporter of the volume before us, appears to prefer that method of rendering his reports inconvenient to the reader. We open the volume at random at the case of Nevada County & Sacramento Canal Company v. Kidd, et al. (p. 282). What is the use of a statement like this?—"The following was the complaint in this cause—'Now comes the plaintiff above named and, by leave of the Court first had and obtained, files thus its amended complaint in the above entitled cause, and alleges that plaintiff is and has,'" &c., &c., the statement being copied verbatim from the pleadings, in consequence of which six pages are occupied with what might and ought to have been digested into a twelfth of the space. Or what again is the use of a headnote like this—Martin v. Wade (p. 169)? "There is a distinction between contracts which are matum in se and those which are merely matum prohibitum. In certain cases remedies are afforded to one of the parties in the latter class of contracts?" The reporter's object seems to be to earn his money at the expense of as little labour as possible; but the result is a volume very inconvenient for all the purposes for which reports are useful. We make our remarks in no captious spirit; it may ordinarily be no business of ours to find fault with American law reporting, but as this volume has been forwarded to us for review, we are constrained to point out its deficiencies. We must add that the execution of the publisher's share of the work is as good as that of the reporter's is bad.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

(Before Vice-Chancellor STUART.)

July 6.—His Honour, at the sitting of the Court, said that he intended for the remainder of the sitting, up to the last seal, to have any consent petitions put in the paper every morning.

Greene, Q.C., said that would be a very convenient arrangement.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Duties of Trustees.

July 4.—In a case of Re W. Bennett, this day, the CHIEF JUDGE took occasion to observe, in reference to the position of trustees under the new law, that it was not for the trustee to wait until the sitting for public examination and then to say that he was not satisfied with the bankrupt's statements. It was his duty to send for the bankrupt, and require his verbal explanation as to the position of his affairs, and, if not satisfactory, then to tender requisitions which the bankrupt was bound to answer. If the answers were not satisfactory, that would be a reason for adjourning, or, perhaps, for prosecuting the bankrupt for not having complied with the law. The present case, no doubt, required investigation, but the trustee need not have waited until the registrar gave him an appointment for an examination sitting. The trustee could have his own examination, and, if that was not satisfactory, he could insist upon the bankrupt furnishing written answers to written questions. In this respect the practice under the old law was not to be regarded. The trustee had the power to call upon the bankrupt to give all proper information, and he ought to exercise it; and if the bankrupt failed to comply with the requirements of the trustee he rendered himself liable to punishment.

Re Ferguson and Ferguson.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 125 & 126, rule 260.

Under this petition for liquidation an interim injunction had been granted, restraining the landlord of the premises where the debtors had carried on business from proceeding with an action of ejectment brought against the debtors.

It appeared that the debtors, who were slate merchants, had taken the premises under a lease, one of the covenants being that they should lay out a sum of £1,800 upon the premises, and in consideration of that outlay the landlord granted a lease for a term of years. The deed contained a proviso that, in the event of the debtors becoming bankrupt or insolvent, "or by any other means with parting with, or depriving themselves of, possession without the leave of the lessor," the lease should become forfeited; and an action of ejectment had been brought to recover possession. Reed, for the debtors, now applied for a continuance of an injunction granted on the 14th ult., stating that a trustee had very recently been appointed, and it was probable that negotiations would be carried out for a continuance of the tenancy.

Bevir, for the landlord, said it was perfectly clear that the debtors had broken the covenant, and he submitted that the Court would not allow the landlord to be kept at arm's length. At all events, the plaintiff should have leave to sign judgment.

The CHIEF JUDGE thought the signing judgment would be an idle proceeding, because, if the landlord was entitled to possession, he could obtain it under the adjudication. His Lordship could dispose of the whole question at issue; but, as the landlord insisted upon his strict right of possession, by way, as it were, of penalty, he did not think it unreasonable that the trustees should have a little more time to see his way. Let the injunction be continued for another week.

The business of the Chief Judge.

July 6.—The REGISTRAR, on taking his seat, mentioned that the Chief Judge would not sit there that day, but he had signed an order by which he delegated to the registrars of the London Bankruptcy Court, or each or any of them, the several powers vested in him by the Act of 1869, and the general orders—except the power to commit persons for contempt of court; to hear appeals from the county and other courts under section 71 of the Act, or to hear cases where a trial by jury was asked for under section 72. With those exceptions his Lordship had empowered the registrars to dispose of the whole of his business.

Reed.—I presume that questions of law will still be determined here.

The REGISTRAR.—Yes.

R. Griffiths said that he had a notice of motion under the 72nd section for a trial by jury, and he wished to know before whom it would be argued.

The REGISTRAR said that it would come before the Chief Judge.

Bagley.—I presume that appeals from the county courts, and other matters which are reserved for his Lordship's decision, will be taken on some appointed day in the week when it may be convenient for the Chief Judge to sit here.

The REGISTRAR said he presumed some such arrangement would be made. He had come down that morning without knowing that his Lordship would not be present; and the order had only just been placed in his hands.

It is understood that the registrars will continue to attend the court in rotation as hitherto.

In re James Hardman Cotterill.

This was a proceeding under a liquidation petition presented on the 27th ult. The debtor is the brother and partner of the Mr. W. H. Cotterill, of 33, Throgmorton-street, who recently absconded, and has since been made bankrupt.

Reed, on behalf of a creditor, asked for the appointment of a receiver of the estate, with a view to an interim injunction being granted to restrain the proceedings of hostile creditors until after the meeting of creditors which was appointed for the 27th inst. The debtor's brother, W. H. Cotterill, had absconded; and a petition for adjudication had been filed against him, under which Mr. Waddell, accountant, of the Poultry, had been appointed trustee, and was now engaged in investigating the affairs of the firm. The debts owing to the firm were very considerable; the clerks were now making out the bills of costs; but as proceedings had been taken against the debtor, it was asked, for the protection of the property, that Mr. Waddell, the trustee under the bankruptcy of W. H. Cotterill, who was thoroughly conversant with the affairs of the firm, should be appointed receiver under this petition.

Mr. Herbert, the solicitor for the debtor, concurred, and the appointment was made.

The liabilities of the debtor are the same as those of the firm, which have been stated at upwards of £100,000.

COUNTY COURTS.

FROME.

(Before C. F. D. CAILLARD, Esq., Judge.)

June 21.

Ancient Society of Foresters—Dissolution—Acquiescence.

In this case, which was heard in April last, Mr. Caillard now gave judgment as follows:—

The substantial object of this application is to set aside a dissolution, or attempted dissolution, of the society, and a consequent distribution of a large part of the funds amongst its members, and the transfer of the surplus to a new society. Court 1960 is a registered friendly society under the Act of 1860 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 115), and as such entitled to the privileges of the Act of 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 63), under the provisions of which the present proceedings were taken within a period excluding the effect of the 3rd section of the Act of 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 58). The enactment, therefore, directly bearing upon the dissolution in question is the 13th section of the Act of 1855. [His Honour read the section.] The reference contained in the last few words is to the 41st section. The first rule of Court 1960 provides

"That it shall form a court, or branch, in conformity with, and amenable to, the general laws of the above order, as registered under the Friendly Societies Act, and have for its objects the establishment of a fund, as provided in this code of laws, for relieving its sick members, burying its dead, relieving the members of the order compelled to travel in search of employment, and assist in the management of the general body of the above-named order, as provided in and subject to the general laws registered under the Friendly Societies Act."

The rules themselves do not provide for dissolution, beyond this that the 2nd rule requires "if a dissolution of a court takes place" that notice shall be sent to the Registrar of Friendly Societies within seven days, etc. Of the general laws of the A.O.F. the only one to which my attention has been called, and the only one, I believe, which it is necessary to take into consideration, is the 49th It provides—

"That each court shall make its own rules for the government thereof, provided always such rules are in accordance with the general laws of the order, and if in district, with the rules of the district to which it belongs; but it shall be imperative upon every court to establish sick and funeral and management funds. Any court neglecting so to do shall be fined £1 ls., to be paid to the funeral fund if in district, if not in district to the high court fund, and suspended from the order until the fine be paid. Nor shall any such court be eligible to any assistance from either district or high court fund, in the event of its falling into decay. They shall fix (in their rules) the amount to be paid by members as contributions to each fund, and the amount to be allowed as benefits. The account of each fund shall be kept separate and distinct; and any court appropriating any portion of the sick and funeral fund for any other purpose than paying the sick or burying the dead, shall be expelled the order. It shall not be lawful for a court to divide its funds, or any part thereof, which shall be devoted solely to carry out the objects of the society. Any court doing so shall be expelled the order."

Such are the principal enactments and rules which affect the present question.

The facts are these:—A meeting of Court 1960, "for the purpose of special business," was convened by circular letter for the 5th July, 1869. At the time the capital of the society was about £1,300. The meeting was held. The number of members was then 152, of whom 90 were present. What took place is expressed by the following circular letter sent by the secretary, the defendant G. Cross, in pursuance of a resolution to that effect, to those members who did not live within a certain distance of the meeting-place of the court:—

"At a special meeting on Monday the 5th day of July it was decided by 83 for it, 7 against, majority 76 "to give a bonus of 10s. per year to every member of this court for every year he has been a member, and that would leave in hand £550 and upwards to carry on the society."

The plaintiff was present on this occasion and voted with the minority. According to Mr. Cross's evidence, he, as secretary, received answers from all the members to whom he wrote, and of whom (he says) only one dissented. As he received the answers he signed the "Paper for signature" for those who answered in the affirmative. He says further: "Members who lived within an easy distance came in and signed. I afterwards sent to Mr. Tidd Pratt an agreement signed by nearly nineteen-twentieths of the members in value on the whole votes of all the members." Now, as I understand the matter, the "agreement" which was sent to Mr. Tidd Pratt, is the one dated the 28th October, 1869, to which I shall presently refer, and is not the "Paper for signature" referred to by Mr. Cross. That paper is dated July 5th, 1869, and is in these words:—

"We, the undersigned members of the above society, believing there is a surplus of capital and that it would be for the good of all the members for the trustees to give a bonus of 5s. per half-year to every member for every half-year or part of a half-year he shall have been a member, we hereby give them full power to take what measure is necessary to carry out the same in accordance with the special meeting and the Friendly Societies Act, s. 13 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63."

This "paper" appears to have been written on the "other side" of the following document:—

"For the bonus or the division or appropriation of the funds the measure for the trustees and officers to pursue is to dissolve this society by giving every member according to the agreement on the other side, and to make adequate provision for every member by forming a new society with a capital of not less than £550, and each and every member shall have equal share and benefit both with regard to contributions and sick and funeral pay as if this society had not been dissolved."

Subsequently, meetings of the society took place in September and October, 1869, at which, or some of them, the framing of the rules of the new society was discussed and a resolution was passed for payment of £800 out of the savings bank, by means of a cheque, in order to the distribution of that sum. Upon the evidence before me I am of opinion the plaintiff took no such part in them as that he can be said to have acquiesced in what was done or resolved. I have no hesitation in saying that even if he had taken a very different course from that which I believe he took, and had up to the 26th, or even to the 28th October concurred in the proposed dissolution and division, it was competent to him as well on the latter, as it was on the former day, to protest against what he believed to be illegal, and to refuse accepting his allotted share of the £800, and signing the agreement. On the 26th, at all events, he had come to the conclusion that the paying away the money was illegal, and he so stated to the secretary.

I may as well here dispose at once of the whole question of that alleged "acquiescence" by the plaintiff, which it has been urged by the defendants is a bar to the relief now sought by him. He was not present at the so-called meeting of the 28th October, he has never accepted his "bonus money," or share of the distributed fund, he never signed the agreement. On the 10th November, 1869, a meeting of the trustees was held, and a resolution passed to send by post a written notice of the first meeting of the "new society" to the "dissentients," of whom the plaintiff was one, and was treated as one. He received this notice. He attended what has since been designated as "the first meeting of the new society" on the 15th of November, a regular meeting night of the "old" society, but on that very occasion the bonus money was tendered to the plaintiff and he refused to accept it. True it is the plaintiff has paid either one or two subscriptions since then, but to say he did so to the new society is begging the question. The defendants would place the plaintiff in this dilemma. If he did not pay any subscription, then it might be said he had forfeited his membership even in Court 1960, or at least all benefit accruing to him as one of its members; and if he did pay, then that he paid to the "new society." It is consistent with his case to have treated Court 1960 as subsisting, since it was never (he says) legally dissolved, and so have paid his subscriptions. Furthermore, the plaintiff has signed no list of members of the "new society," and cannot be bound by the insertion of his name on the list without his concurrence; and the receipts from him for his payments since October, 1869, are signed by the defendant, G. Cross, the secretary of the "new society," on the same "member's contribution card," and precisely in the same manner as the receipts given by him to the plaintiff for payment before that time. On the whole, I am of opinion that the defendants have failed to make out against the plaintiff a case of acquiescence by him. The 28th October was the day for the annual dinner of Court 1960, and the "special meeting" on that day was convened by an endorsement on the dinner ticket. The endorsement is this:—

"The bonus or the division or appropriation of the funds will be given the same day between 10 and 2 o'clock."

"Dissolution" is not mentioned, nor "surplus."

The dinner took place. The trustees divided the money, reserving the shares of the three dissentients. The resolution for dissolution was passed at ten in the morning, and the paper (the one sent to Mr. Tidd Pratt as an agreement) was signed afterwards.

This is the agreement in question:—

"Ancient Order of Foresters. Court Selwood Forest, No. 1960.

"We, the undersigned members of the above society, believing that it would be for the benefit of all members for the the court to be dissolved, and a division of the funds made, by giving to every member at the rate of 5s. for every half-year, or part of a half-year, he shall have been a member, and the same having been carried at a special meeting, hereby agree to and vote for the dissolution of the said court and the appropriation of the funds thereof, at the above rate, and empower and request the trustees and other officers to take the necessary steps for carrying out the same in accordance with the Friendly Societies Act.—October 28th, 1869."

On the 15th November, as already mentioned, the so-called first meeting of the "new society" took place,—the new rules were passed, a resolution for handing over the documents, etc., was put and carried, a new account was opened, but, says Mr. Cross, "the new accounts were written on the old books for economy's sake." The dissentients having been tendered and having refused the amount of their shares under the distribution, this amount was put into bags and sealed up, and handed over to the secretary. The surplus of about £550 has, I understand, been transferred to the trustees of the "new society." Then, according to the evidence of the defendant Charles Payne:—

"We provided for the sick from the funds of the new society. He is entitled under the new rules to the same benefits as he would under the old. There is a sick and management fund. I cannot say the amount. This applies only to those members of the old society who pay their contributions to the new. All the sick members have come into the new society."

The rules of the "new society" were certified by the Registrar on the 20th November, 1869. No certificate of membership in the new has been issued to those of its members who were such in the old society. Court 1960 has been expelled from the Ancient Order of Foresters.

Upon a careful review and consideration of the facts and of the enactments, laws, and rules bearing upon them. I come to the following conclusions:—The plaintiff is entitled to apply to the judge of this court for relief under the Act of 1855, and would have been entitled, but of course with a modification of the relief to be obtained, even assuming "Court Selwood Forest 1960" to have been legally dissolved. It cannot be imposed upon any member of a society that in order to become entitled to an adequate provision out of its funds he shall enter into a new or other society. The plaintiff's claim, then, has not been satisfied, nor has adequate provision been made for satisfying it. I hold, moreover, that the omission to provide for the claims of dissentients otherwise than by means of the new society is fatal to the whole of the proceedings for the division of the funds of Court 1960. The words and meaning of the 13th section in this respect are clear:—

"It shall not be lawful in any society to direct a division or appropriation of any part of the stock thereof, except for the purpose of carrying into effect the general interests and objects declared in the rules as originally certified, unless the claim of every member is first duly satisfied, or adequate provision be made for satisfying such claims."

The distribution of the bonus of 10s. amongst the members is assuredly not, nor is the appropriation of the £550 surplus to the new Society, a carrying into effect of the general objects of the rules as originally certified. The effect of the first rule of Court 1960 was to incorporate with its own rules the general laws of the Ancient Order. The distribution of a large or any part of the funds amongst the members was a direct violation of the 49th general law, such as would expel the subordinate court committing it from the order, and would deprive the former of the benefit of its association with the latter, and thus also lead to the breach in the letter and in the spirit of the first constituting rule of the subordinate court itself. Of such results any member of Court 1960 might well complain, and he might well think that his claims were not duly satisfied, and that no adequate provision was made for them, if all this was to be effected by his having to enter against his will into a society formed from the débâris of the original society, and ipso facto debarred from association with the Ancient Order of Foresters. It is unnecessary in the present case to say whether a society may by its rules restrict the enabling effect of the 13th section of the Act of 1855 as to dissolution and division of funds. It may be, and I incline to think that additional restrictions not clashing with the intent and drift of that section, might be imposed. I think, however, that in the face of that section, no society could by its rules make itself indissoluble, or consequently prescribe that there should be no division of its funds even if the special provisions of the 13th section on this subject were complied with. To my apprehension, these provisions are for all beneficial purposes very similar to those of the 49th rule of the Ancient Order. It follows, then, that (so to put it) the conditions necessary for rendering illegal the division exist—First, it has been directed and made not “for the purpose of carrying into effect the general interests and objects declared in the rules as originally certified;” secondly, neither has the claim of every member been first duly satisfied, nor has adequate provision been made for satisfying such claims. I am further of opinion that Court 1960 has not been dissolved under section 13 of the Act of 1855, for these reasons—1st. The power to be dissolved is to be exercised at some meeting thereof to be specially called in that behalf. The endorsement on the dinner ticket intimating that the bonus would be distributed can scarcely be called a proper notice of such a meeting, but points to a foregone conclusion. I am inclined also to think (but I think it unnecessary expressly to determine) that the Act might reasonably be taken to mean the special meeting should be announced in accordance with such provisions as those might be in that behalf in the rules of the society. It does not appear that any one of the meetings touching the dissolution was convened in compliance with the 9th rule of Court 1960. Not only are the votes of consent of five-sixths in value of the members to be obtained for a dissolution but also the consent of all persons then receiving or entitled to receive any benefit from the funds of the society, unless the claim of every such person be first duly satisfied, or adequate provision made for satisfying such claim. The observations which I have made in this respect as to the division of the stock apply to the dissolution. No person entitled to be so satisfied, or provided for, is to be compelled for that purpose to enter into a new society. The intended appropriation or division of the funds is not fairly and distinctly stated in the agreement of the 28th October, 1869. That is the agreement to which the votes of consent were given, and which was transmitted to the Registrar of Friendly Societies; it is the agreement upon which the defendants rely. It mentions only that a division of the funds is to be made by giving to every member at the rate of five shillings for every half or part of a half-year he shall have been a member, and is wholly silent as to any surplus and its appropriation, thus suppressing the fact that the surplus of £550 was to be carried to the credit of the new society, and leaving that sum, so far as the agreement is concerned, wholly unappropriated. I must here observe that the plan adopted for obtaining the votes of consent is not to be approved of. On giving his vote and a receipt, every member consenting had the bonus placed in his hand, well knowing that thus it would be if he consented. The only wonder is that any one member was found who resisted the temptation of so immediate a benefit. The obtaining votes in this way (even taking into account for what they are worth the antecedent meetings and proceedings) is contrary to the true spirit of the 13th section. I am clearly of opinion that the agreement in question is no agreement for dissolution within the section, from the omission to state upon the face of it the intended appropriation of the surplus of £550, and therefore did not operate as a statutory discharge or release to the defendants. This omission is not “a slight informality;” and I am of opinion that unless an agreement transmitted to the Registrar, and deposited by him with the rules of the society be such an agreement as is otherwise directed by the 13th section, neither the production of the agreement, nor the statutory declaration prescribed by the Act, nor the deposit with the Registrar, nor the insertion and production of the advertisement in the Gazette, can render that valid which is otherwise invalid both in form and in substance, or be (as was contended by the learned counsel for the defendants) “indisputable proof that the society has been dissolved.” To borrow the words of the clerk from the Registry Office who produced the Gazette and other documents, “there is no means for the Registrar to ascertain whether the requisitions of the Act have been complied with. If there is anything wrong on the face of them, the papers are refused.” In this particular instance the intended appropriation of the £550 does not appear upon the agreement. Whilst to my mind the reasons already stated against the validity of the dissolution and distribution are neither technical nor narrow, there is one, I think, which is wider, and to which I attach most weight. It is this—the whole scheme in furtherance of which the alleged dissolution was brought about was a mere contrivance to keep the society practically still together, but to elude and break the 49th of the General Laws, and in spite of it to obtain a partial distribution of the funds, under cover of the 13th section; and in equity this is a “fraud” upon that enactment of the statute. Under that statute the judge has the most ample powers for dealing with a case of this kind. There has been no valid dissolution of Court 1960, and no valid division or appropriation of its funds. The Court, then, is still subsisting, and the whole of the funds improperly distributed and appropriated belong to it. These funds must be restored. The defendants must be restrained from dealing with any part of the funds, and be removed from their post in Court 1960. New trustees of that society must be appointed, in whom its funds must be duly vested, and all necessary and proper accounts must be taken. The plaintiff must have his costs on the equity scale, all other directions as to costs must be reserved. The best plan will be for the registrar to draw up the minutes of an order in accordance with my judgment, and that the parties should have an opportunity of speaking to me upon the minutes.

APPOINTMENTS.

MR. EDGAR J. MEYNELL, barrister-at-law, of the Northern Circuit, has been appointed, by the Home Secretary, recorder of Doncaster, in the room of Mr. W. Blanshard, judge of the Newcastle County Court, who has resigned the recordership. Mr. Meynell was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in May, 1853.

MR. FRANCIS WILLOWES TOPHAM, solicitor, of West Bromwich, Staffordshire, has been appointed deputy coroner by Mr. Edwin Hooper, solicitor, of Tamworth, one of the coroners for Staffordshire, in the place of Mr. Charles Bayley, resigned, and the appointment has been confirmed by the Lord Chancellor. Mr. Topham was admitted in 1865, and is a member of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association.

MR. THOMAS BENYON FERGUSON, barrister-at-law, of the Bombay bar, has been appointed clerk and sealer of the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors at Bombay, in the room of Dr. R. B. Barton, barrister-at-law, who has resigned the office. Mr. Ferguson was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in April, 1863, and formerly practised on the Midland Circuit.

MR. CHARLES PEILE, solicitor, of Bombay, (firm, Hearn, Cleveland, & Peile), has been appointed to act as Government solicitor and Public Prosecutor at that presidency during the absence of Mr. R. V. Hearn, who has obtained leave of absence to Europe for six months. Mr. Peile was admitted an attorney in 1858, and holds the office of assistant-registrar of the diocese of Bombay.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

July 1.—The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and its Arrangements of Business.—Lord Westbury moved an address praying her Majesty to make immediate provision for the more rapid despatch of business by the Judicial Committee. The ordinary courts of justice in the kingdom, though some of them had power under Acts of Parliament of serving process abroad, had no jurisdiction beyond the limits of the United Kingdom, not even over the Channel Islands, all our possessions abroad falling for the administration of justice under the prerogative of the Crown. Thus for India, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, our South American settlements, and every foreign possession, even down to our consular ports, the final determination of causes rested with the Queen in Council. The importance of the constitution of a tribunal exercising jurisdiction over such immense territories and so many millions of people could not be over-estimated. Within the last twenty years the amount of business coming before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had been augmented tenfold, and the appeals were likely to increase with the increase of wealth and commercial relations. Through the whole of our colonial empire the inhabitants felt great confidence in this final tribunal, and the necessity of resorting to it formed a bond of union with the mother country. The appeals now waiting to be heard before the Judicial Committee numbered 350, and in Bengal alone 150 additional appeals were in preparation. These Indian appeals raised questions of the most intricate character, the law itself being very difficult to understand. There were two great codes or divisions of the law, the Hindoo and the Mussulman, the former having at least five different schools, and the mastery and certain administration of the latter being likewise extremely difficult. Both, moreover, were in a great measure founded on religion and religious usages, which the people adhered to with much pertinacity. Hence, the administration of a law founded upon these religious institutions and observances was a most difficult duty, the neglect of which, or the entrusting it to incompetent or inexperienced hands, might influence the people in a manner the consequences of which would be most momentous, and the people would have no confidence in our tribunal if it consisted solely of judges taken from our own courts. They desired to have judges who had been among them, controlled and guided by the most eminent judicial authorities at home. Of these 350 appeals, 267 were from India. Deducting one-fourth, both of the 267 and of the 150 others in preparation, as the proportion likely to be dropped or abandoned, 300 appeals were waiting to be heard from India alone. One appeal seldom lasted less than an entire day, many occupying longer; so that India alone would find occupation for a court sitting throughout the judicial year of 140 days for more than two years to come. The appeals from our other possessions up to the same date were 90, including those from the Admiralty and Ecclesiastical Courts, and, though some would require no great time, their shortness would be abundantly counterbalanced by the time required for the ecclesiastical appeals, which had greatly increased in number. To this business, therefore, less than another year could not be assigned. Thus there were materials for the occupation of the Court for more than three years. The consequence of this block, and of the inability of the Court to deal with new appeals as promptly as the proper administration of justice would require was that a premium was given to every litigant who could afford to give security for £400 to enter an appeal in any case in which he might have been defeated, for the purpose of delaying or wearing-out his adversary through the time and expense consumed in the litigation. This state of things, which was surely a national disgrace, had partly arisen from circumstances beyond control. Illness had deprived the Judicial Committee of many efficient members, and death had lately deprived it of probably its most efficient member—Lord Kingsdown. It was necessary to supply these losses by the appointment of judges who would command the respect and willing submission of the various communities who looked up to them for final decisions. It would be impossible to invoke the aid of this House in disposing of any of these arrears, for the colonies would regard it as unconstitutional to have their cases heard before this House, desiring to adhere to the prerogative of the Crown, to which they had been in the habit of looking. The Lord Chancellor had proposed the creation of a new appellate jurisdiction in connection with the High Court of Justice, but he feared the bill might not be successful in another place. It proposed a new court, consisting of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, four Justices of Appeals, four Lords Justices, and an addition from time to time of three puisne judges from the other courts. He would press the Government to create at once those additional Judges of Appeals and add them to the Judicial Committee, which could then be divided into two sections, one sitting every day throughout the legal year and attending exclusively to Indian business, the other devoting itself to the remaining business. This was the only way he saw of clearing off the arrears—he hoped, in two years. But he warned the Lord Chancellor that to find efficient men he must offer much larger salaries than he proposed in the bill. It would not do to have a “cheap and nasty” article for this purpose. The Court must consist of men commanding general respect and submission. He found by a former return that the Judicial Committee had now before it an untouched arrear of cases for at least four years, one appeal only having been heard from a decree delivered in 1866, and none from decrees delivered in 1867, 1868, or 1869. On a question so closely affecting the national honour and the welfare of our colonial empire, he hoped the Government would take prompt measures to meet an evil which was universally admitted. He had endeavoured to ascertain whether it was possible to meet it by redressing any mismanagement or maladministration in the local courts, especially in India, but he saw no possibility of making any change there which would diminish the amount of appellate business. The courts in India underwent a great change in 1862; but at Calcutta alone there were at least sixteen courts in the full discharge of their duty, from whose decrees appeals might be brought. Of late years, undoubtedly, care had been taken to improve the position of the judges in India, and we might hope that hereafter there would be a greater disposition to be satisfied with their decisions; but this would be more than counterbalanced by the progress of commercial activity and wealth, especially in the central provinces, Oude and the Punjab, and the north-western provinces, which would entail a corresponding amount of litigation. He saw no means of fulfilling our obligations in this matter, except by constituting two divisions, and enabling them to sit throughout the legal year. At present the Judicial Committee sat only a portion of the legal year, through its not being provided with a regular staff of judges, and these arrears had consequently arisen.—The Lord Chancellor said he had already given instructions for the preparation of a bill which he proposed shortly to introduce. The same idea occurred to him of strengthening the existing Judicial Committee, and dividing it into two sections. The constitution of the Judicial Committee was not altogether that which practice had shown to be most desirable. It consisted of the Lord Chancellor and all the judges of our higher Courts who were Privy Councillors, these being usually the chiefs of the three common law courts, the Lords Justices of Appeal, the Master of the Rolls, and the judges of the Divorce and Admiralty Courts if, as was usual, they were Privy Councillors. Most of these persons being engaged in other judicial duties requiring all but their constant attendance, they had little leisure for attendance on the Judicial Committee, and it was therefore by no means easy to secure a quorum. To that section of Lord Brougham's Act which provided that retired English judges, being Privy Councillors, should be members of the Committee we had been indebted for some of its regular and able attendants. Of late years, however, more than one had retired from age or infirmity. The only means provided by the Act of reinforcing the Committee was the power given to the Crown by sign-manual to appoint two members, and the two thus appointed had been very assiduous members. Sir James Colville, formerly Chief Justice of Calcutta, last year sat seventy-four days—Sir Joseph Napier attended fifty-five times. The limitation in the number of members to be appointed by the Crown was most uncalled for, and he proposed to make this power unlimited with regard to any persons who had held judicial positions in the colonies or this country, or to any barrister of a certain number of years' standing who might be a Privy Councillor. To this he looked forward as likely to furnish several eminent members. Perhaps the most eminent man who had sat on the Committee since its formation was Lord Kingsdown, who had never theretofore held any judicial position, and by abolishing the restriction both as to number and as to the having previously filled a judicial position, he saw no difficulty in constituting a Committee which could divide itself into two sections. Without desiring to deny or palliate the arrears in Indian cases, they were largely attributable to the necessity of translations of all the evidence and documents used in the case being sent over from India prior to the hearing of an appeal. He was informed that the non-arrival of the transcripts was one great cause of no appeal later than 1866 having been heard. The transcripts for the last two years had not yet arrived, and even when they did arrive there was considerable difficulty in forcing the cases on for hearing, for out of the 250 provided with transcripts only thirty-seven were set down to be heard, eleven of these being set down ex parte. He was bound, however, to add that a larger number would have been set down had not these thirty-seven been already down, which seemed as many as were likely to be got through in the current year. Still, there was wonderful dilatoriness in bringing these matters to a hearing, and still greater delay occurred in India with regard to the transcripts. Considering that only thirty-seven Indian and twenty other cases were down for hearing, the arrears, though considerable, were not alarming. He hoped steps would be taken in India which would diminish the appeals. He had learnt from Sir Barnes Peacock, an eminent judge just returned from India, that at Calcutta only such passages of the evidence given and documents used in the lower courts as the parties might desire to interpret came before the Supreme Court, so that with such partial information one could not wonder at appeals being numerous, and at the decisions of the court being sometimes reversed. (The Vacant Lord Justiceship.) His Lordship proceeded to explain that in November last he did not recommend the Government to fill up the vacant Lord Justiceship, on account of the contemplated changes in the constitution of the courts, there being, moreover, thirty-three appeals waiting to be heard, all of very recent date. Lord Cairns, when appointed Lord Justice in 1868, found ninety appeals awaiting hearing, the oldest being eighteen months; but before the Long Vacation he disposed of 133 appeals, including all the new ones which had arisen, leaving only thirty-three at the following Michaelmas Term. Considering how eighteen months' arrears had been thus disposed of, it appeared to him that with the assistance of Lord Justice Giffard he should be able to keep the appeals down to the present time, in which expectation he had not been deceived; for, notwithstanding the recent illness of Lord Justice Giffard, and notwithstanding that one case had lasted eleven days, there were now only forty-six cases, the oldest being not quite four months old. Of course, now that Lord Justice Giffard was unable to attend it was necessary to fill up the vacancy, which would result in an accession to the Judicial Committee likewise, and he trusted that the bill about to be introduced would enable that body to keep down arrears which, though discreditable, were not quite so discreditable as Lord Westbury supposed. Under these circumstances, he hoped the House would not think it necessary to agree to the address.—Lord Romilly regretted that the Lord Chancellor proposed merely to patch up the present system. The Judicial Committee discharged most important functions, affecting the interests of communities in all parts of the world, yet not a single penny had ever been paid to one of those judges. There could not be an efficient tribunal without fixed judges, fixed duties, and liberal salaries. It was not desirable to appoint judges who had retired from their own courts through infirmity, but to secure new and young men, and to pay them accordingly. The Supreme Court at Calcutta, moreover, not having the entire evidence before it, had no fair opportunity of reviewing the original decision. That it had not the confidence of the public there was shown by the fact that since 1862 the appeals from it had increased enormously, upwards of 600 having come from that Court alone in seven and a-half years, while in the rest of India and in our other dependencies there had been no material increase. This was not the fault of the Court or of the judges, but because it had no opportunity of discharging its functions properly. Additional judges were wanted there, and a greater power of obtaining documents. He concurred in the recommendations of Lord Westbury that a court should be constituted specially for these appeals, with proper salaries, with the addition of as many retired judges as might be thought fit. Appeals were at present limited, on account of the delay and expense involved, to cases where the property in dispute exceeded £1,000 in value, so that whatever injustice might be done in minor cases there was no appeal. Security for costs to the extent of £400 had also to be given. With regard to thirty-seven having been set down for hearing, if these were disposed of to-morrow, the remaining 195 in which the transcripts had been sent over would rapidly be brought on; but it was not thought necessary to employ counsel and deliver the brief until there was a prospect of an early hearing. He trusted that the Government would grapple with the evil in an energetic manner.—Lord Halifax had been Secretary of State for India at the time the Act constituting that court was passed, and all he could say was that the judges of the High Court ought to have the power of sending for any documents which he might require.—Lord Cairns said were our own courts in the same state as those in which Indian cases were determined the force of public opinion would be so great as to compel the Government to take steps within twenty-four hours to remedy the evils that existed. One of the most real and tangible points of connection between the mother country and the colonies remaining unanswered was the right of the colonies to bring their judicial proceedings by way of review before her Majesty in Council, and that was a right which was deeply appreciated by the colonies at present, and which they would be sorry to surrender, but which they would be bound to surrender if they believed that it had become a mockery and a delusion. He had not the least doubt that the bare statistical fact as to the number of appeals in arrear, as stated, was strictly accurate, but the House must not be deceived about the matter. The mischief was that when the number of appeals in the Judicial Committee amounted to 100 or 150, the arrears could not be wiped out in less than a year or two, no matter by whose fault those arrears had accumulated, and therefore there was a solid barrier interposed to the progress of further cases which might be coming forward. When once a certainty existed that no fresh appeal could be heard for some years a premium was offered to unsuccessful suitors in the Indian courts to appeal, because, taking into consideration the high rate of interest in India, it became worth while, as a mere commercial speculation, to delay the payment of the money for two or three years by appealing to the Privy Council, even if it had to be paid eventually. With the amount of arrears that at present existed there was practically no appeal whatever from the Indian courts to the Privy Council, and therefore some of those who might think that they had good grounds for appealing chose to suffer wrong rather than subject themselves for so long to uncertainty. He hoped the Lord Chancellor would consider well, before he attempted to carry his suggestion into effect, whether the division into two courts was the best that could be proposed. There was great danger of creating by that means two weak courts in the place of one strong tribunal. Moreover, the number of counsel who had devoted themselves to the study of Indian law before the Privy Council was extremely limited, and therefore great mischief would result from the division of the business, because counsel could not be in two places at once. Would it not be a more desirable course to strengthen the existing tribunal as much as they could by making it worth the while of those who now formed it to sit constantly like any other Court, instead of merely sitting as they now did for a few weeks in each year.—Lord Westbury wished for a distinct promise that immediate action would be taken in this matter. It had been said there were only thirty-seven appeals waiting for hearing; but there were 260 appeals from India alone, the transcripts of the records of which had been already transmitted. The number on the paper was thirty-seven; but solicitors would not enter for hearing appeals which there was no probability of getting heard, because when they did so large sums of money had to be paid with briefs, and so forth. The parties to no fewer than 260 appeals were at present debarred from obtaining justice. The evil was a crying one, and it ought not to be trifled with or delayed. His own suggestion for a division of the court was only a temporary expedient, intended to last until the arrears were cleared off. He proposed that there should be a sub-division, and that the Indian appeals should be taken by one sub-division. For that there was at present sufficient judicial power, and there was also a sufficient number of barristers ready and willing to attend the court.—The Lord Chancellor said his bill was in course of preparation, and it would hardly be necessary for him to enter into the details of the measure at present. In the division of business, his idea was to have one division hearing appeals from India, the other appeals from the Admiralty and Ecclesiastical Courts. The same set of counsel did not usually attend to those two classes of cases.—The Duke of Argyll believed that steps might be taken which would have the effect of limiting the number of appeals from India. He believed the only difficulty in the way of supplying the supreme court with all the documents arose from the expense of translating documents used before the district courts.—Lord Westbury said that after the statement of the Lord Chancellor he would not press his motion.

The Ecclesiastical Titles Act Repeal Bill.—Committee.—Lord Cairns said that if they were to repeal the whole of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, without carefully explaining that the declaration as to the state of the common and general law of England, was not meant to be departed from, they might give rise to serious misapprehension out of doors, where it might be thought that Parliament had changed its mind with regard to the truth and propriety of those declarations. In repealing the penalty clauses of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, therefore, they ought to be very cautious not to fall into that danger, and to show on the face of their legislation that the declaration which accompanied those penalties in that Act were well founded and still continued in full force. He wished to preserve all that was valuable in the substance of the declaration embodied in that Act, and while removing penalties imposed on the use of ecclesiastical titles, which were intended merely as titles of office, and not as titles of authority, honour, or dignity, still to maintain that established law of this country, which was to the effect that all titles of dignity, honour, and authority flowed from the Sovereign alone, and that it was not in the power of any person other than the Sovereign of these realms to confer such titles. He moved an amendment to the preamble and to clause 1, which was accepted by the Earl of Kimberley and agreed to.

The Benefices Bill.—The Duke of Marlborough proposed the second reading. He did not deny that the bill would interfere with what was called a right of property. Lay patronage was desirable, but it was not possible that a clergyman who bought his benefice should stand in the same relation to his parishioners, as one presented from no pecuniary consideration.—Lord Cairns said his doubts were not removed. If ever the time arrived when, by proper means, and without violating any rights, the whole system as to the sale of advowsons and next presentations could be done away with, nobody would rejoice more than himself; but before the House assented to the second reading they ought to be clear as to the difference between advowsons and next presentations. The latter seemed to him the most valuable part of the former, and to take away from the owner that which, if he wished to realise his property, would be one of its most valuable portions, was like cutting off three-fourths of a loaf of bread and insisting that it was no interference with the ownership of the loaf. The House should give a little more consideration to the matter before it agreed to the principle of the measure.—The Archbishop of York approved lay patronage. He looked, however, on the possession of an advowson as rather an ornament to property than property itself, and though an advowson was necessarily liable to be sold, it did not follow that the sale of next presentations should be permitted. He strongly approved the principle of the bill, as it left intact the right of the laity to present, and prevented presentations from being bought and sold.—The Marquis of Salisbury did not approve of speculation in livings, but queried the justice of their interference with property.—The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol approved the bill.—Lord Romilly said if under the bill the sale of an advowson would carry with it the next presentation, the only effect would be that advowsons would be sold instead of next presentations, if otherwise the bill was simply taking away property.—The Bishop of Winchester supported the bill.—The bill was read a second time.

The Sequestration Bill.—The Bishop of Winchester said that rather than that the bill should not pass he would, though reluctantly, accept Lord Cairns' amendments under which an appeal was given from the Archbishop to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. He accordingly introduced amendments, which having been assented to, the bill was read a third time and passed.

The Resignations of Benefices Bill.—Report of amendments.—The Bishop of Winchester added a clause providing for cases of lunacy.

The Married Women's Property Bill was, on the motion of Lord Cairns, referred to a select committee.

July 6.—Earl Shaftesbury withdrew the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill.

The Irish Land Bill.—Report of amendments.—The Duke of Richmond added an amendment rendering it illegal for the tenant to let in conacre after prohibition.—Earl Granville moved to annul a previous amendment preventing the tenant's assignee from claiming improvement compensation unless he had been accepted by the landlord, and proposing to insert a clause subsequently defining the tenant's rights in case of assignment. Agreed to.—Lord Bessborough carried, by a majority of 130 to 48, an amendment restoring the £100 limit (instead of £50) as the limit above which disturbance compensation is not to be claimed. In the clause which originally provided that all improvements should be deemed to have been made by the tenant, and which Lord Clanricarde subsequently amended so that claims, whether made by landlord or tenant, must be proved in evidence, Earl Granville added an amendment, declaring that improvements should be deemed to have been made by the tenant except in certain cases defined by the Government in six new sub-sections. The report of amendments was received.

The Medical Act (1858) Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed.

July 7.—The Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

July 4.—The Extradition Bill passed through committee, the Attorney-General having added a clause to meet the view of Mr. McC. Torrens, providing against the delivery up of political offenders.

The Charitable Funds Investment Bill and the Rents and Periodical Payments Bill were read a third time and passed. The Benefit Building Societies Bill was read a second time.

July 5.—The Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration Bill—The Lords' amendments were agreed to.

July 6.—The Poaching Prevention Act Repeal Bill was thrown out on the second reading, by a majority of 140 to 62.

The Sunday Trading Bill.—The second reading was proposed by Mr. T. Hughes and opposed by Mr. F. A. Taylor.—Carried by a majority of 109 to 64.

July 7.—The Real Estate Succession Bill, the Married Women's Acknowledgment of Deeds Bill, and the Mortgage (No. 2) Stamp Duty Bill, were withdrawn.

The Clerical Disabilities Bill passed through committee.

Liability of Telegraph Companies for Errors in Transmission of Messages.

The New York Daily Transcript, of 13th June, prints a lengthy report of an appeal case of Leonard and Burton v. The New York, Albany, and Buffalo Electro-Magnetic Telegraph Company, in which the plaintiffs, manufacturers of salt at Salina, had an agent at Chicago and another at Oswego, the shipping port for their salt. Their agent at Chicago telegraphed their agent at Oswego, to send 5,000 sacks of salt to Chicago immediately. The defendants, a telegraph company, over whose line the telegram came, and who delivered it to the plaintiffs' agent at Oswego, by the carelessness of their servant, wrote casks for "sacks," the cask containing more than 20 times as much as the sack. On the arrival of the salt at Chicago, there was no market for it, and it was stored by the plaintiffs' agents at their expense, and was finally sold at less than the market price at Oswego. In an action by the plaintiffs, to recover damages of the defendants, arising from their mistake in delivering the telegram, it was held, that the difference between the market-value of the salt at Oswego, and what it sold for at Chicago, together with the expense of transportation from Oswego to Chicago, was not an improper measure of damages; and further, that the omission of the plaintiffs' agent at Oswego when he learned the mistake, to attempt a stoppage of the vessel, then in port, and thus to prevent a great part of the loss, was not legal negligence and did not impair the plaintiffs' right of recovery.

In the course of his judgment, Earl C.J., said—"I can find no authority, and can discover no principle upon which to charge such a company with the absolute liability of a common carrier. That liability was founded upon the necessities of the case, real or fancied, and has never been applied to any person or to any occupation, except those of carriers of goods and inn-keepers. The carrier had the exclusive possession and control of the goods, often in secret, away from the supervision of any other person, with opportunity for embezzlement and collusion with evil-minded persons, and without means of discovery by the owner. Especially was this so in the ruder stages of civilisation, and before the present modes of communication, rapid and easy, were in existence. It was upon this view, early adopted as a rule of safety to the community, that the carrier should always be prima facie liable, in case of non-delivery of the goods, and that he should not be excused for any causes, except those occurring by the act of God or of the public enemies, and these were to be shown by himself.

Whether his liability is based upon the contract he makes, or upon his public duty, the telegrapher does not come within any of these principles. He has no property entrusted to his care. He has nothing which he can steal, or which can be taken from him. There is no subject of concealment or conspiracy. He has in his possession nothing which in its nature and of itself, is valuable. It is an idea, a thought, a sentiment, impalpable, invisible, not the subject of theft or sale, and as property, quite destitute of value. He cannot, himself, see, or hear, or feel the subject of his charge. He submits an idea to a mysterious agency, which carries it to its destination, and delivers it to one there at hand to receive it. He is bound to conduct the business appertaining to this pursuit, with skill, with care, and with attention. He holds himself out as possessing the ability to transmit these communications, and he undertakes that he can and will transmit and deliver them with the expected despatch. There may be circumstances in the nature of the instrumentality employed, and the effects to be produced, which, in a particular case, will prevent the proper accomplishment of the undertaking. A thunder-storm, which prevents or renders dangerous the operation of electrical currents or machines; a tempest, which prostrates poles and breaks the wires; or unusual pressure of prior business; the sudden sickness of an operator, or many other causes, might prove a sufficient excuse for the want of a prompt delivery of a message. A message is taken to an office in Buffalo to be sent to the city of New York, a distance of about 500 miles, and is accepted. This acceptance implies that the message is to be sent immediately, or certainly within a few hours. The sender can communicate by letter or go in person, within the space of twelve or fourteen hours, and the object of a telegraphic message is to gain the advantage over the time that would thus elapse. This is understood by all parties, and the sender has the right to rely upon it.

In the present case the message, as received, contained an order for 5,000 sacks of salt, a sack containing about fourteen pounds of fine salt. As sent by the defendants' agent, it contained an order for the same number of casks of salt—a cask containing 320 pounds of coarse salt. No excuse is given for this error, and no explanation, unless it be only that the characters by which these words are designated, nearly resemble each other. No doubt this would furnish a reason why a person ignorant of telegraphic characters, or unskilled in their reading, should misunderstand them. Such are not the persons that the defendants are permitted to employ in this business. Those engaged in it profess to understand the hieroglyphics. They have, themselves, invented or adapted them. They are bound, also, to use the machinery which will in the best and safest manner deliver to them the expected messages. Careless reading or ignorant management of the machinery is no excuse; it is simply an aggravation of the offence. The negligence was quite enough to justify the action.

Where plaintiff's attorney, by agreement with his client, is to be paid out of the proceeds of the judgment, a settlement by stipulation between the parties to the suit will not be set aside as fraudulent without proof of a fraudulent intent in the defendant, although such intent on plaintiff's part is shown, and he is insolvent. The attorney in such case should notify defendant of the agreement between himself and his client, after which such a settlement would be held fraudulent. Where the action is for unliquidated damages, the attorney has no lien for his services before judgment nor (it seems) any lien on the judgment when rendered, without due notice to the defendant. Otherwise, where the action is on a written instrument in the attorney's possession.—Courtney v. McGavock (23 & 24 Wisconsin Rep.)—New York Daily Transcript.

THE RECORDER OF PRESTON.—On the 1st of July, at the Preston sessions, Mr. Knowles, barrister, congratulated the Recorder (T. B. Addison, Esq.), on the sixty-second anniversary of his call to the bar. In reply to an interrogatory from Mr. Knowles, the learned gentleman stated that he was appointed recorder of Preston and Chairman of the Preston Quarter Sessions at the midsummer sessions in the year 1821, having thus occupied those offices for the space of forty-nine years.

OBITUARY.

MR. E. L. HESP.

This gentleman, a member of the firm of Hesp, Fenton, & Owen, solicitors, of Huddersfield, died suddenly at Spring Grove, Huddersfield, on June 18 last. We extract the following from the Huddersfield Examiner:—"Mr. Hesp was admitted into the profession in Easter Term, 1824, and came to Huddersfield in the spring of 1825. When Dobson's bank suspended payment he was introduced to the business, and by unremitting labour he contrived, though it was a work of considerable magnitude and difficulty, to make it afterwards an unmistakeable success. Afterwards he entered into partnership with Mr. John Battye, which was continued until that gentleman's death in 1837, when Mr. T. H. Battye went into the firm, and the two gentlemen worked together until the summer of 1842 or 1843. From that time to January 1859 he carried on business alone, when Mr. Owen went into partnership with him, and on the 1st July, 1866, the businesses of Messrs. Hesp and Owen and that of Mr. Edgar Fenton were amalgamated. Mr. Hesp was hon. sec. of the Chamber of Commerce when it was first established, and he always took an active interest in all that affected the character and well-being of that institution. We believe that Mr. Hesp was president for two or three years of the Huddersfield Mechanics' Institution; and in many other ways he unostentatiously, but most effectively, promoted the well-being of his fellow-townsmen. As a lawyer, Mr. Hesp was remarkable for the readiness with which he saw the principles involved in the cases submitted to him, and the firmness with which he grasped difficult details. We have reason for stating that his knowledge of commercial law was most extensive and accurate, and was frequently most valuable to the Chamber of Commerce. The cases which he took up professionally were conducted by him with firmness and tenacity, but, it gives us pleasure to be able to state, with due regard to the regulations of society in matters of courtesy, never sinking the gentleman in the solicitor. Deceased was seventy-two years old, and was the oldest lawyer in the town with the exception of Mr. R. T. Robinson and Mr. J. C. Laycock. Mr. Hesp was a Whig and a Churchman, and although not taking a conspicuous part in political movements, his convictions were decided, and his support of what he believed right was unwavering. He was a man to be relied upon. A man of sterling integrity in his public relations and his private life, he has passed away, leaving that most precious of all legacies, a good name." Mr. Hesp spent some time as a young man with his brother, Mr. John Hesp, who practised at Scarborough and was three times mayor of that town.

MR. T. MANN.

Mr. Thomas Mann, solicitor, of Burford, Oxfordshire, died at that place on the 22nd June. Mr. Mann, who was admitted in 1830, was for upwards of forty-five years managing clerk to Mr. J. S. Price, clerk to the magistrates of Burford.

MR. R. C. BETTS.

Mr. Richard Christian Betts, barrister-at-law, died at South-square, Gray's-inn, on the 2nd July. The late Mr. Betts, who was in his fortieth year, was educated at Wesley College, Sheffield, and matriculated at the University of London in 1847. He was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in June, 1864.

MR. J. PHILLIPS.

Mr. John Phillips, formerly town clerk of Faversham, in Kent, and clerk of the peace for that borough, died at Grove-terrace, Highgate, on the 26th of June.

Sir William Milbourne James, the newly-appointed Lord Justice of Appeal, was sworn in a member of Her Majesty's Privy Council, on the 6th July, at Windsor.

The University of Dublin has conferred the degree of LL.D. on the Lord Chief Baron Pigot; Baron Fitzgerald, of the Court of Exchequer; and the Right Hon. J. D. Fitzgerald, Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench.

The Lord Chancellor of Ireland has appointed Mr. Robert H. Milward (Alcock & Milward), a special commissioner for administering oaths in Chancery for Ireland, for the district of Birmingham.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

LEGAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION.

The meeting of this association was held on Wednesday evening at Lincoln's-inn Hall, under the presidency of Sir Roundell Palmer.

Amongst those present were the Right Hon. Sir E. Ryan, the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, Mr. Manisty, Q.C., Mr. Webster, Q.C., Mr. Minde Palmer, Q.C., Mr. Joshua Williams, Q.C., Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., Mr. Amphlett, Q.C., Mr. Pollock, Q.C., Mr. Eddis, Q.C., Mr. Fry, Q.C., Mr. Quain, Q.C., Mr. Pearson, Q.C., Mr. Anderson, Q.C., Mr. Prendergast, Q.C., Mr. T. Hughes, Q.C., Mr. Osborne Morgan, Q.C., Mr. H. F. Bristowe, Q.C., Mr. Roebuck, Q.C., Mr. Pooks, Q.C., Mr. Wickens, Mr. Serjeant Simon, Honourable G. Denman, Q.C., Professor Bernard, Mr. A. Ryland, Mr. A. Wills, Mr. W. Ford, Mr. Marten, Mr. J. C. Mathew, Mr. A. G. Marten, Professor Amos, Professor Abdy, Professor Bryce, Mr. Westlake, Mr. Jevons, Mr. T. C. Saunders, Mr. J. Hollams, Mr. E. W. Field, and Mr. Dixon.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER, in commencing the proceedings, said he was very happy that it was in his power to attend and take part in a movement, which, if it should be successful, he believed would take no inconsiderable place in the important claim of legal and other improvements for which the present time bid fair to be distinguished. They were met together for the purpose of giving some effectual impulse to a movement for supplying one of the greatest wants of the country, a worthy place of legal education, a great legal University; and the first question which might naturally be asked on such an occasion was, what had already been done in that direction? Perhaps some might say, the first question rather would be, what was the need for such an institution. But he hardly thought he need deal with that question in speaking to those who had already answered it to a considerable extent by their presence on that occasion. It would be sufficient to say that he believed that the Anglo-Saxon was the only civilised race in the world which at the present time did not found the practice and knowledge of jurisprudence upon systematic and scientific education. In France, Germany, and Italy there had been at all times a careful system of complete academical education for the profession of the law, not confined to the members of that profession, but extended with great benefit to members of other liberal and learned professions and persons intending to devote themselves to the public service. In all these countries, as far as his information went, it had been held necessary that the important office filled by gentlemen following the legal profession should be fitly prepared for by a systematic and scientific knowledge of the law; and he could not but think that the evidence was in favour of our own forefathers in this country being of the same opinion with other civilised nations. If he were asked for evidence of that, he might well answer in such an assembly, circumspice, what was the meaning of the great institution to whose courtesy they were indebted for an opportunity of meeting, and what was the meaning of the sister institutions of the Inner and Middle Temples, and Gray's-inn. What was the reason for their existence? Surely the proper answer would be in substance, for the same purpose which the present meeting had in view, and if they had hitherto not fulfilled their object that was surely very extraordinary, but their past neglect was no reason for further delay. In ancient times he found that to the aggregate of these institutions was ascribed that character which they now wished to see filled by them, but not by them alone, for in ancient times Fortescue and Lord Coke both called the aggregate of these institutions a legal university, and thought that they were founded to promote and fulfil that end. Indeed, their very existence was evidence that they were meant to be a legal university, and really he should feel very much at a loss to answer if he were asked to say for what other cause they existed. Of course he did not mean to say that they were not very pleasant societies to belong to, and that they did not in fact fulfil by delegation from the judges other useful functions with respect to the profession of the law; but he did venture to think that the true and principal reason of their existence was connected, and ought still to be connected, with legal education. With regard to the two Temples, the charter of King James I. expressly created, what it was not too much to call, a trust of the property granted to them for the maintenance and education of students in the profession of the law. With regard to what had been done of late years in furtherance of the object which they desired to promote, he would briefly state what it had been attempted, how far it had succeeded, what were its shortcomings, and by what means those shortcomings required to be remedied. The praise of making the first beginning in the shape of any effectual towards instruction in the study of the law belonged not to the bar, or to any one of the Inns of Court, but to the Incorporated Law Society, and if any apology were needed for the course taken by the association in not confining this movement to one branch of the profession, the circumstance he had just mentioned would go far to justify that course, that the first effectual beginning in the direction in which they were now moving was made by the Incorporated Law Society; for soon after they received their present charter, in the year 1833, they established lectures for the instruction of students intended for their own branch of the profession. Not content with that, two years afterwards, in 1835, they addressed a memorial to the judges, asking them to give their authority to a system of education which should be made compulsory upon all persons intending being admitted as attorneys or solicitors, and which should therefore give the only effectual and complete stimulus possible to a complete and sound system of instruction. The judges, with great wisdom, acceded to that representation, and in 1836 a system of compulsory examination was established, which had since been in force, and he had looked in vain for the slightest trace in any quarter whatever for any difference of opinion in the profession, on the part either of judges, of barristers, or of attorneys or solicitors, as to the excellent effect of that regulation, or as to its success as far as it had gone. The next thing was an attempt to establish voluntary lectures, which were given by two eminent men—Mr. Austin, who was a master of his subject in the principles of jurisprudence and international law, and by Mr. Starkie in common law and equity—in the Inner Temple. That was in the year 1833; and if, in subsequent movements, it might appear that the Inner Temple had not been quite so forward and active as some of the other societies, it might perhaps be accounted for on the ground that they were a little discouraged by the want of success of their first experiment, these lectures having languished and died out in the course of two years. The reason of this was not difficult to see, because there was no organised system of which they were a part, there was no stimulus applied to compel the students to go to them, there was nothing tangible to be got from them, and no system of examination dependent upon them. About ten years afterwards, in the year 1845, the Middle Temple took up the subject, under the auspices of a very eminent man, whose great ability and zeal in the cause of legal reform all must acknowledge—Lord Westbury. Seeing that everybody acknowledged the deficiency and want of method in legal education, and particularly the almost entire neglect of the study of general jurisprudence, and the branches of knowledge immediately connected with it, they took action in the matter, and through their influence committees were appointed by other of the Inns of Court to see if something could be done in the matter. They thought at the time collectively that they could do nothing. The Middle Temple, however, was not entirely discouraged, and they then established lectures on jurisprudence and civil law, and very much under the influence of the reasons which they put forward, Gray's-inn, in 1847, also established a lecture. The lecturer was a very eminent man now gone—the late Mr. William David Lewis, who conducted the lectures with great success and usefulness till 1852. In 1851 the Inns of Court at that time came to an agreement that they would co-operate in this matter. They made liberal contributions, and established a Council of Legal Education, and he could not but recognise in the right hon. gentleman on his right hand (Sir E. Ryan) one of those to whom they were in no small degree indebted for that step being taken at that time. It was impossible not to recognise with great thankfulness the importance of the movement then made. It did a great deal, and no wise man who was concerned in doing so much but must have been conscious that it would probably lead to much more, for in this world it is impossible to do at once all things which it is desirable to have done, and great praise was due to those who made a practical beginning in the right direction. The system was established upon a basis which, if not perfect, was certainly calculated to lead to something better. It had been in operation ever since, and it had already borne fruits of various useful kinds.

He did not speak now so much of the benefits obtained by the young men who attended the lectures, although he had no doubt, from the evidence given before the Parliamentary Commissioners in 1854, that the result of these succeeding examinations showed great and progressive improvement, and he saw no reason to suppose that that had not continued up to the present time, but he ventured to think that amongst the most important of the fruit of that movement was the next step which was adopted, viz., the issue of the Royal Commission of 1854 to inquire—not into the whole subject which was comprehended in the present scheme, because the Inns of Court and the Inns of Chancery were the only subjects of that particular inquiry—nevertheless, it was an inquiry of great importance and usefulness, and it brought out most valuable opinions in the evidence, and at the same time resulted in a most valuable and important report. With regard to the evidence, the opinion expressed by Mr. Maine, at that time one of the readers, with regard to the examination established in 1851, was this. He said that that system had been successful as far as its inherent defects had allowed it to succeed, and the defects he stated to be in his opinion, first, its want of systematic character; and secondly, the absence of compulsory examination. All defects might be traced to one or other of these causes, and he confessed he very much agreed with this view, for he thought that no possible system without supplying these deficiencies could have that degree of success which would make it really satisfactory. The opinion of Mr. Maine was, he believed, shared by every one of his colleagues, as readers or lecturers, unless exception were made in the case of Mr. Lewis, the eminent man he had before referred to. The same opinion was expressed by Mr. Brougham, Mr. Birbeck, Mr. Walpole, and by the late Mr. Phillimore; and Lord Cairns, although not one of the lecturers, and although giving evidence rather strongly in favour of the ordinary way of acquiring knowledge by reading in the chambers of a barrister or conveyancer, still expressed his concurrence very strongly in the opinion that to make the system what it ought to be, compulsory examination was absolutely necessary. There was one other point given by another man before that committee, from which he had made a short extract which he should like to read. The witness to whom he referred said this:—"My own impression is that the Inns of Court are, as at present constituted, a university in a stage of decay. They are in the same position, as I understand it, as the University of Oxford was at the end of the last century, when the university had virtually delegated the power of conferring degrees to the colleges, the consequence of which was that the colleges, whether from competition amongst themselves, or having no sufficient motive, had brought the thing down to the very lowest point. Then, in the beginning of this century the university was as a whole reconstituted and the examinations were taken by her, and from that moment the standard of education has arisen. "Applying that," he said, "to the Inns of Court what is needed is some central authority to confer the degree of barrister, something answering to the Senate of the University of London, or to the governing body in Oxford or Cambridge. I would not," he added, "allow colleges, analogous to which I consider the Inns of Court to be, to have the power of conferring a degree. The power ought to be given to some central body composed out of them, but not identified with any one of them." In adopting the sentiments of that passage, he must not be supposed to confer the degree which was there spoken of with the authority to call to practice at the bar. That was a matter admitting of different considerations, with which it would not be wise at present to confound education or its results. Education might well be made the test of fitness to be called to practice, but it by no means followed that we should do anything which would seem to intrude upon the authority or function of those to whom the judge might from time to time commit the power of calling to practice in either branch of the profession. He had not named the gentleman from whom these opinions proceeded, but they were the opinions of a man of almost universal accomplishment, who was at the present moment of very great power in the country, and one who upon the subject of academic instruction was considered a first-rate authority, one who had knowledge of this profession both in this country and some of our most important colonies; a man to whose opinions, by the almost universal consent of this country, upon any subject requiring knowledge and power of intellect, as much weight would be attributed as perhaps to any other man, and not the less so because he was not merely a professional man who had lived only for the practice of either branch of the profession, but he was a man who at this moment lived for the country and for the world—he referred to the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. These opinions having been given, it was well known what were the recommendations of the Royal Commission. They stated with great force, and, apparently, with irresistible reasons, that some effect of the test of qualifications of all those who were called to the bar was required. They had nothing to do with the other branch of the profession, which was not within the scope of their inquiry, and that other branch had already obtained compulsory examination before admission. But they pointed out not only that practice was a thing which required knowledge, and that those who entered into a profession of this sort with a view to practice would, at all events, be the better for being taught how to study wisely and well, but still more, that in this country the position of a barrister entitled persons to fill various offices in connection with the administration of the law throughout the country, and that for this class of persons, even more than for practising barristers, it was important that if they had by public authority that stamp which was implied by the designation barrister-at-law, it should mean something, and that there should be some security taken that at least they had some knowledge of their profession. In reality, it had always seemed to him that the argument for a compulsory examination and a proper education of those who did not mean to practice at the bar were still stronger than the argument for such an education of those who were to practice. It had been truly said that a barrister would not get business at all, or at any rate he would not keep it, without some knowledge of law. He feared that even that proposition must be taken cum grano salis, for he had known in the course of his life some men of no inconsiderable practice and no small emolument, of whom if he were compelled to give evidence on oath he could not positively say that he believed they knew any law whatever. However, as a general rule, it must be admitted that a person must know something of law and probably so much as could be secured at a pass degree by any system of examination, in order to succeed in practice; and, therefore, it might be said that those who employed them might take care of themselves. But that was a very inadequate view of the subject, though the time at his disposal was not sufficient to make it needful or desirable that he should endeavour to convert his auditors to an opinion which he had no doubt they already entertained. With regard to those who were not practitioners it seemed to him that if they were to be magistrates, or to fill those offices which were given by law to barristers of a certain number of years standing, it was of the greatest importance that they should have some knowledge of the law, and there was no way of securing that so effectually as to say that they should not get the degree of barrister unless they were fairly entitled to it. It had been sometimes said that there were many country gentlemen who, without a view to these appointments, liked to be called to the bar, as it gave a certain degree of dignity, and was also an advantage to the profession and to the Inns of Court that they should be called. He thought it would be of very great advantage to such persons to know something of the law, and his belief was that they would rather come where they could learn something, and that their parents and guardians, who generally had some practical object in sending them, would be better pleased if they could send them where they could get some knowledge which would be useful to them in life, and if some test were applied to answer that end. He was convinced, therefore, that all persons who aspired to the character of barristers would be the better for a system of compulsory examination and systematic legal education. The commissioners recommended exactly what was now aimed at, the formation of a regular legal university in the proper sense of the word, though it was true they did not carry their views beyond the Inns of Court, because nothing beyond that was within the scope of their commissions, but the principles of that recommendation had not been carried into effect down to the present hour. That occurred in the year 1855, the most eminent men signed and agreed to it, and now fifteen years afterwards not a single practical step had been taken in the direction they recommended. He did not think the subject could remain asleep for ever, nor was it for want of some practical steps being taken in the interval. Lord Cairns, in Lincoln's-inn in 1863, proposed a resolution which was adopted by the benchers in favour of the principle of the establishment of a regular legal university, and that resolution remained on record unto the present hour never reversed. He could not but suppose that they would still adhere to it, but they wanted some assistance in the way of impulse from without, some manifestation of intelligent public opinion to show that the time had come for practical movement in the direction of that principle which they had already approved. He himself, when he had the honour of serving under the Crown, had proposed, at a combined meeting of the representatives of the Inns of Court, the adoption of a system of compulsory examination which was carried by a majority, not indeed very large, and it subsequently fell through, in consequence of the separate dissents of, he believed, the Inner Temple and Lincoln's-inn. He believed the other two Inns of Court were at that time prepared to have agreed to it, and he supposed their opinion had not been changed by subsequent events. But if nothing effectual had been done in the matter of legal education since that time, other people had not been idle in the interval. The Faculty of Advocates in Scotland, in 1854, appointed a committee which unanimously reported that there ought to be a universal course of legal study for all persons who were to practice at the bar. Their funds would not admit of establishing so extensive a curriculum as existed in other countries, but they said that whatever the means at their disposal would admit of ought to be done, and there was no reason to doubt that that resolution had been acted upon, and was now being acted upon in Scotland. At Cambridge and Oxford the same efforts had been made to organise efficient law schools. At Cambridge, in 1854, and since at Oxford, very eminent men had been appointed professors of civil law; but, of course, there was much which they could not do. They might very usefully go into the general philosophy of the subject, and he was by no means sure they might do that even more effectively than could be done in London, but certainly they could do nothing to supersede the necessity for the profession itself taking the lead in this movement, and anything which they did at Oxford or Cambridge would be of little value comparatively, unless a system were created which would make it practically useful as an introduction to the two branches of the profession. In fact, all experience showed that attempts to supply a want without that sanction and that value failed. Only the other day he had received information from a member of the profession who had been a very energetic teacher of law at King's College (Mr. Cutler), who told him that the classes there had languished and were languishing, and were not likely to be permanently maintained unless there were something which could give them the value they ought to have in those institutions which had the power of granting admission to practice; and therefore it might, he thought, be taken for granted that all these collateral efforts, which might grow to be of great importance if properly utilised, would be wasted and turn out inefficient, if their duty in that respect were neglected.

In concluding his observations he might say that the present meeting was not called for the purpose of discussing details or of anticipating the results of the consultations of those to whom the working out of the scheme might be confided, and no doubt there were many things as to which their first suggestion would be but tentative and liable to revision and co-operation; but the meeting was called for the purpose of sanctioning what had been already done towards the formation of this association, and of adopting a brief statement of its objects, which committed those so doing as little as possible. All present had probably seen the circular which had been issued, at the head of which two particular objects were named—the establishment of a law university for the education of students intended for the profession of the law; and, secondly, the placing of the education of both branches of the profession on the basis of a combined test of a collegiate education and examination by a public board of examiners. No one could possibly take exception to the first mentioned object unless on the ground that the words were too narrow; but it was not intended by any means to deny the advantage of the university, which might be extended to any who might desire to avail themselves thereof. Nothing exclusive was by any means intended, on the contrary he quite agreed with Mr. Lowe, who in another passage of his evidence said he thought it very desirable that every English gentleman whose time was at his own disposal should be educated in the law to a much greater extent than was at present the case. The wording of the second object might possibly be open to some verbal criticism, but it certainly was not intended in any way to prejudice the question as to the education of those intended for the two branches of the profession being in all respects identical. In a later part of the same circular it would be seen that while no reason was supposed to exist why instruction in the general branches of jurisprudence should not be given to students of both classes, yet the word "combined" there had nothing whatever to do with combination in the system of instruction, but referred simply to the idea that both barristers and solicitors should undergo the double test as to a collegiate education and also an examination by a public board. Lastly, to avoid any misconception, he might briefly mention one or two things which were not intended. Some people were under the impression that a fusion of both branches of the profession was contemplated by the association, but nothing could be more groundless. Neither did they desire in any way to interfere with the internal organisation or proceedings of the Inns of Court. For himself he could not conceive of any institution which had less right to exist for any other purpose than the public good, and, therefore he hoped and believed that any changes which might be necessary in the course of time, to adapt them to the exigencies of the present day, would be undertaken and carried out; but this was not the object of the association. If they did not interfere with these objects they should not meddle with the Inns of Court, but if they met with opposition on their part no one could say what might be necessary to be done. At present, however, the association had no desire to interfere in any way with their internal arrangements. Again, he might say, it was not the object of the association to dictate in any way to the judges whom they might admit to practice at the bar, or to whom they should delegate their power of calling to the bar. What they did say was that this power ought not to be exercised without qualification, and that the university which they were seeking to establish would supply the means of ensuring the existence of those qualifications. In conclusion, they did not propose to meddle in the least degree with the discipline either of barristers, or attorneys, or solicitors, after they had been admitted, but stopped short at the admission. The report which had been prepared, and the adoption of which he had now to move, stated what had been done. Communications had been entered into with the Inns of Court, the result of which was that the Middle Temple had recorded its approval of the objects of the association, and had appointed a committee to communicate with the Council; Gray's-inn had appointed a committee for the promotion of these objects, and Lincoln's-inn had passed a resolution—"That the bench, recognising the importance of securing a sound system of legal education and satisfactory test of the qualification of those who are admitted to the profession of the law, are willing to enter into communication with any committee appointed by the other Inns of Court for the purpose of considering the subject." They had also the courtesy to lend the use of their hall for that meeting. Of course, without intending by so doing to express any opinion as to their future proceedings, but believing as he did that the movement would go forward and that those who desired to promote the cause of legal education would be unable ultimately to stand aloof from the Association, he fully reckoned on the hearty concurrence of Lincoln's Inn. The Incorporated Law Society had cautiously reserved any expression of opinion until they had had more communication with the members of the profession in general, but the Provincial Law Society had expressed great confidence in the movement. He hoped those who followed him would endeavour to avoid introducing any doubtful matters of detail on which differences of opinion might arise, because he considered it of the greatest importance that the assistance and co-operation of all who could join in the principle sought to be introduced should be secured, and that no opposition might be needlessly evoked on the part of those who might perhaps throw serious obstacles in their way.

After moving the adoption of the report, the Chairman, who had important engagements elsewhere, vacated the chair in favour of the Attorney-General.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL then seconded the motion, saying he cordially agreed in almost every word which had fallen from Sir Roundell Palmer.

Mr. W. FORD (Vice President of the Incorporated Law Society), supported the resolution, and spoke of the advantages which had followed the introduction of compulsory examinations, final, preliminary and intermediate, in the case of attorneys and solicitors. Whatever might be the qualification laid down for admission hereafter, he hoped that in his branch of the profession no material abridgment at any rate would be made in the term which was now required to be spent in practical office-work.

Mr. JEVONS (Liverpool), said he was most happy to support the resolution as a country attorney, in order to testify to the public that this movement for the establishment of a legal university was strongly supported both in town and country. In fact the movement originated amongst provincial attorneys, and, therefore, it might be presumed that it would have their support. He took that opportunity of entirely disclaiming the idea which some persons seemed to entertain that this university was to be supported out of the funds of any existing institutions; on the contrary he believed it would be self-supporting in every sense of the word, for on taking the average of admissions and calls during the last few years, and assuming each barrister would spend two sessions at the university and each attorney one, and that the fees would be on a similar scale to those charged in kindred institutions, they would have an average yearly attendance of 1,100 students, and an income of at least £30,000 a year. He hoped that when such a revenue was in the hands of the future managers of this university such a portion of it would be devoted to the salaries of the professors, that the calling of a professor of law might in itself become an adequate object of ambition to the profession.

The motion was then put and carried.

Mr. AMPHLETT, Q.C., moved that Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., M.P., be elected president of the association.

Mr. FORSYTH, Q.C., had much pleasure in seconding the motion, and in expressing his general concurrence in the objects of the association which, however, were not of such peremptory importance now as a few years ago, when the only requisite for a call to the bar was the eating of a certain number of dinners. The present time, however, when a broad scheme of education was about being established for the country at large, seemed very favourable for such a movement. The only possible objection was that the independence of the Inns of Court would be interfered with, but this was entirely groundless. He only wished to add, as Sir R. Palmer had made no allusion to the action of the Inner Temple in the matter, that a resolution had been passed appointing a committee, as had been done in the case of the other Inns for the purpose of communicating on this matter.

The resolution having been carried,

Mr. MANISTY, Q.C., moved the next resolution, that the gentlemen, a list of whose names was handed round, representing all branches of the profession, be elected the committee of the association. He said he was one of the committee who sat ten years ago to consider the propriety of instituting a compulsory examination previous to a call to the bar, and had then voted against such a proposition, namely, on the ground that it was not founded on a systematic legal education. It ought also to be mentioned that that same committee unanimously came to the conclusion that there should be a preliminary examination before anyone was admitted a member of the Inn, with a view to being called to the bar, and that, he believed, had been productive of great good.

Mr. WICKENS, in seconding the motion, said he hoped that the result of the association's labours would be the abolition of the numerous sub-divisions of legal work which at present obtained, but whilst this was the case it was important that they should all be represented, and this, he was happy to see, was the case.

The resolution was put and carried unanimously.

Mr. QUAIN, Q.C., moved the next resolution:—"That the president and council be authorised to communicate on behalf of the association with the committees appointed by the honourable societies of the Middle Temple and Gray's Inn, and with the Incorporated Law Society, the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, and the provincial law societies, with reference to the objects of the association, and the measures proper to be adopted for their attainment; and also to take such other steps as may appear to them expedient for the purpose of obtaining the concurrence and co-operation in such measures of the other Inns of Court, and of such other persons and public authorities as to them may seem advisable." He was glad to see the two universities of Oxford and Cambridge represented by his friends Professor Bernard, Professor Bryce, and Professor Abdy, and he suggested that "the universities of the United Kingdom" should be added to the resolution. There was one thing in the history of this subject which Sir Roundell Palmer had omitted, probably by accident, and that was the report of the select committee of the House of Commons in 1846. That committee presented a most elaborate report, which recommended a scheme not very dissimilar from the one now before the meeting, after having examined Lord Brougham, Lord Campbell, and the present Lord Westbury, who was then, as now, one of the strongest supporters of the educational movement. It is quite remarkable that, although there was the concurrence of all the leading men in the country at that time, no effective measures had yet been taken to carry that report into effect. Surely the time has now arrived for doing something. England ought no longer to occupy the humiliating position which she now did in comparison with the great countries of the Continent. It was impossible to take up even a catalogue of foreign law books without being ashamed of the state of legal education in this country. He could not help thinking that the reason nothing had been done hitherto was that there was no such organisation as they were now met to establish for the purpose of carrying out what was required, and keeping it constantly before the public. He hoped this would now be done, and, if necessary, attention would be called in Parliament to what was certainly a great and crying want of the age, as far as the legal profession was concerned.

Mr. RYLAND had great pleasure in seconding the motion, and, on behalf of the provincial attorneys whom he represented, he desired to give his cordial concurrence to the movement.

Mr. MATTHEW supported the resolution, saying he had for some time foreseen that something of this sort must take place. It had been his fortune to come frequently in contact with those who were applying themselves to the study of the law, and he had told them over and over again that they must by some means endeavour to obtain some education preliminary to their profession, other than that which they could obtain in chambers.

The resolution, as amended by Mr. Quain, was carried unanimously.

Professor ABDY moved the election of the executive committee of the council. He said the University of Cambridge, which he represented, was thoroughly in earnest in its desire to promote the study of the law, and he had no doubt the efforts which had already been made in that direction would hereafter bear good fruits.

Professor BRYCE, in seconding the resolution, said the University of Oxford, like the sister institution at Cambridge, was desirous, by every means in her power, to forward the objects which the association had in view.

The SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. Williams), having read the list of names proposed, the resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. CHARLES POLLOCK, Q.C., moved the sixth resolution, "That subscriptions and donations be invited to the funds of the association," which was seconded by Mr. JOSHUA WILLIAMS, Q.C., and carried unanimously.

The meeting concluded with votes of thanks to the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn for their kindness in granting the use of the hall, and to Sir Roundell Palmer and the Attorney-General for presiding.

MEETING OF SOLICITORS.

A meeting, convened by circular, was held on Thursday, at the Guildhall Coffee House, at which the following gentlemen, amongst others, were present:—Messrs. F. H. Rooks, C. H. Sadler, S. Woolf, E. F. B. Harston, G. Kenrick, E. Bayley, J. L. Ovans, T. M. Woodbridge, Bolton, C. E. Wilson, G. W. Crook, Phelps, A. J. Bowen, E. Kimber, H. Montagu, D. Stocks, D. C. Halse, T. H. Bartlett, D. Woolf, B. E. Greenfield, F. R. Parker, G. S. Warmington, J. J. Merriman, T. C. Russell, W. H. Farnfield, and E. P. Flux.

Mr. KENRICK (Rooks, Kenrick, & Harston), having been unanimously voted to the chair, said the object of the meeting was stated in the circular which had been issued to be, "To infuse new blood into the council of the Incorporated Law Society at the ensuing election." There was a very wide-spread feeling that solicitors, as a body, were not so actively and so well represented in the Houses of Parliament, and in the legal world generally, as they ought to be. That was evidenced by the fact that Acts of Parliament were constantly passed, without any step being taken to oppose them, when the tendency of those Acts was to lessen the influence of the profession with the public, and diminish professional emoluments. To the Incorporated Law Society, the profession had hitherto been content to look for an expression in public of its opinions, its feelings, and its sentiments. But in recent Acts of Parliament there had been omissions and additions which had had serious consequences with reference, at all events, to the business of the younger branches of the profession. Under these circumstances, he thought it might be said of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society that they were, as they had been recently described before a Committee of the House of Commons, an irresponsible body, not expressing the opinions of the general body of the profession. Such was the evidence given by a member of the firm of Baxter, Rose, & Norton, before the select committee sitting upon the question of the law courts. He thought the time had come when it was necessary to have upon the Council of the Incorporated Law Society younger, more energetic, more practical, and more business-like men, who would take a different view of the question, whether a large slice of business should be left in their hands or be taken from them. They were not without precedent in the course now proposed to be followed. In Dublin, after a protracted struggle, the younger members of the profession had succeeded in getting their representatives upon the Council of the Incorporated Law Society; and the interests of the profession had certainly not suffered from such a step. To give another instance of inactivity, it was well known that there were a large number of unqualified persons who practised in the profession of the law—law stationers, accountants, and others—without any active steps being taken to oppose them by the Incorporated Law Society. The great evil of this state of things was, that the qualified members of the profession were dragged, as it were, into the mire, and had to extricate the persons who had been foolish enough to be led by unqualified practitioners out of the difficulties in which they found themselves placed. They might not succeed at once, but they would by repeated efforts; and, if necessary, they must form a league, like that for the severance of Church and State, because, having come to a conviction of what they believed to be right, they should carry it out without fear of contradiction, without fear of trouble, and without fear of expense. With this object, the gentlemen present would be asked to nominate a committee; and he begged to state explicitly that the members of his firm who had moved in the matter had no desire whatever to derive any benefit personally, and their only object was to promote the interests of the profession at large.

Mr. KIMBER coincided in the remarks which had been made by the Chairman, and alluded to the fact that when Mr. Gregory, a member of the council, put upon the paper of the House a notice that he would call the attention of the Legislature to the undesirable state of the Lords Justices' court, [it being presided over by one judge only, no activity was shown by the members of the council of the Incorporated Law Society to ensure the success of Mr. Gregory's motion, and the result was, that the House was counted out. He considered it highly desirable that there should be some younger members of the profession upon the council of the society, in order that the views of the profession generally might be more thoroughly represented.

Mr. MONTAGU thought no one could deny that the council of the Incorporated Law Society was a most inactive and sluggish body, which needed to be awakened by the infusion of new blood into it; and he concluded by moving a resolution to the effect that it was expedient that the younger and more energetic members of the profession should be represented upon the council.

Mr. HARSTON seconded the motion, stating that he had asked Mr. Watkin Williams, M.P., to discover what had been done by the Incorporated Law Society by way of advancing the interests of the profession during the last two sessions, and after a very careful search had been made by the gentlemen who had charge of the papers of the House of Commons, it was found that during that period the society had done nothing whatever. He also referred to the fact that when any bill was before Parliament affecting the well-being of the profession, the council of the Incorporated Law Society were not by any means active in the matter; so that things were left to take pretty well their own course. One of the rules of the society was that no gentleman could be a member of the council who had not been in practice ten years. He thought that rule should be abrogated.

Mr. PARKER (Sharpe, Parkers, & Pritchard) disapproved of some remarks which had been made by Mr. Kimber with reference to the members of the council of the Incorporated Law Society. If the younger members of the profession were to be represented on the council, he thought they had better seek that representation as matter of right rather than by abuse. If a resolution having that object were brought forward at the annual meeting, he did not see any reason in the world why it should not succeed; and he would suggest omitting from the resolution the words "more energetic."

Mr. MONTAGU expressed his willingness, with the consent of his seconder, to adopt Mr. Parker's suggestion.

Mr. JOSIAH J. MERRIMAN expressed a hope that the meeting would pause before it proceeded to adopt a resolution such as that now before it, for he could not help characterising it as absurd, seeking as it did the representation of juvenility. He thought the adoption of the suggestion to strike out the words "more energetic" made the resolution much more objectionable than it was even in its original form. He had always thought that the charges of inefficiency brought against the council of the Incorporated Law Society had been, to a large extent, the result of pure imagination. He had had occasion to correspond with, and make suggestions to the council of the Incorporated Law Society, and it was only just for him to say he had ever found his communications and suggestions treated with respect, and in a thorough business-like manner. No doubt the council of the Incorporated Law Society had done, and left undone, many things with which fault might perhaps reasonably be found; but that was only the natural consequence of representation, and it would ever be the case, no matter whomsoever might be elected. He, therefore, hoped the resolution would be withdrawn, and that there would be placed before them something like a policy which he had failed to discover, to which they should be pledged.

Mr. DAVID WOOLF said the object which they all ought to have in view was not the representation of any particular section of the profession; but they should seek to get their views represented, by soliciting gentlemen in whom they had every confidence to fill the vacancies which occurred in the council.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE said he had a great deal of business in the county courts, and he was of opinion that the council of the Incorporated Law Society had not paid the attention which they ought to the interests of those members of the profession whose business lay in the county courts; and he was prepared to lend his aid, in order to secure the infusion of new blood into that council.

Mr. SIDNEY WOOLF thought it did not behove them as a meeting to make disrespectful comments upon the council of the Incorporated Law Society as now constituted; but he could not help calling attention to the absence of regard for the interests of the profession in the case of the extension of the admiralty jurisdiction to the county courts. When that bill was passing through the House of Commons in 1869, the council of the Incorporated Law Society issued a report stating that they had given the matter their serious consideration and that the bill had been withdrawn. It so happened that a very short time afterwards the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act was passed, and the council seemed to be thoroughly inactive about it. Under these circumstances he should be ready to move as an amendment that it was desirable that new blood should be infused into the council of the Incorporated Law Society.

Mr. DANIEL STOCK urged the importance of passing a resolution unanimously, otherwise, it would have very little influence out of that room. He should not be disposed to agree wholly with the observations which had been made either by the Chairman or Mr. Kimber, but he considered there could be no doubt that the Incorporated Law Society had not done all that could have been wished.

Mr. BARTLETT seconded the amendment, and expressed himself sorry to hear some of the observations which had fallen from Mr. Kimber. He thought the amendment embodied all that was desired, because they were of opinion that they were not sufficiently represented by the council, and that the council did not look well after their interests in Parliament. He should be glad to see some of those who were known as mercantile lawyers upon the council, because in that respect he thought the council was singularly deficient.

Mr. HARSTON suggested that the original resolution should be amended, stating that it was expedient that the profession should be more adequately represented upon the council of the Incorporated Law Society.

Mr. JOSIAH J. MERRIMAN took exception to the word "adequately," and, in his view, there was a general concurrence.

After an animated discussion, in which various gentlemen engaged, the following resolutions were unanimously carried:—That it is desirable to infuse new blood into the Council of the Incorporated Law Society; and That Messrs. Halse & Trustram, Harston (Rooks, Kendrick & Harston), Montagu, Wheeler and Bayly do form a committee to carry out the objects of the meeting.

Upon the motion of Mr. WOODBRIDGE, a vote of thanks was accorded to the Chairman, and the proceedings terminated.

THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE BILL.

On Wednesday last, a deputation from the Law Amendment Society waited on Mr. Gladstone at his official residence in Downing-street, in support of the High Court of Justice Bill now before the House of Commons. Among the deputation were Mr. G. W. Hastings, chairman of the council of the society, Sir Christopher Rawlinson, Mr. Joshua Williams, Q.C., and other well-known members of the bar, and a number of M.P.s. The Chancellor of the Exchequer accompanied the Premier, who apologised for the unavoidable absence of the Attorney-General. Mr. Hastings, addressing Mr. Gladstone, said that the Law Amendment Society had a good right to be heard on the High Court of Justice Bill, for the society had now been in existence for more than a quarter of a century lending its aid to the improvement of the law, and that solely in the public interest. So long since as the year 1851 they had published a report on the expense, delay and failure of justice arising from the separation of our courts of law and equity. He was glad to see his right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer present on that occasion, for he would know something of that report having had not a little to do with its production.

The report had concluded with four resolutions which he would read:—

(1.) That justice, whether it relate to matters of legal or equitable cognisance, may advantageously be administered by the same tribunal.

(2.) That where the principles of law conflict with those of equity, the latter shall prevail, to the exclusion of the former.

(3.) That all litigation, whether it relate to matters of legal or of equitable cognisance, may advantageously be subjected to the same form of procedure.

(4.) That the rules of procedure be embodied in a code.

He ventured to say that these resolutions, passed by the society nineteen years ago, contained the pith and kernel of the High Court of Justice Bill. What they had contended for throughout, was that, instead of sending a suitor from one court to another, owing to the incompetency of any to do full justice in the suit, there should be one High Court armed with plenary powers. The society had therefore rejoiced when the bill was introduced into the House of Lords, and at one of the largest meetings it had ever held, attended by many of the most distinguished members of the bar, had passed a resolution in its favour. The bill at that time had contained several provisions of which the society could not approve, but he was bound to admit that all the modifications, which were numerous and important, made during its passage through the Upper House had been in the direction advised by the society, which was now well satisfied with the measure. There might still be defects and shortcomings, but he refused to weigh them in the scale against the great principle embodied in the bill. The society observed with regret that two pleas for delay had been put in. They amounted to nothing more, and even as such they were untenable. It had been urged by personages high in position and authority that the union of the courts of law and equity ought to be deferred until the whole substantive law of England, written and unwritten, had been embodied in a code. Now, it did not lie in the mouth of the Law Amendment Society to object to the preparation of a code, for they had constantly advocated that undertaking; but he failed to understand why the courts should not previously be consolidated. He believed, on the contrary, that the passing of this bill would greatly facilitate the construction of a code. It had been so in India, where a High Court of Justice had been established with the best results, and an Indian code was now in course of preparation. It had been so also in the State of New York, where they created the court first and made the code afterwards. But then another plea was raised, and an amendment to the second reading of the bill was founded upon it by Mr. Denman. It was objected that the bill ought not to pass until the rules and procedure of the future court had been laid before Parliament. If this meant that the rules of procedure were to be embodied in the bill, then he must point out that such a course would swell the measure to the size of a volume and make its enactment impracticable. But if it were only meant that Parliament should check and revise the proposed rules, then he was glad to say that this most desirable object was provided for in the bill. The 12th section would enact that none of the rules and regulations of the High Court were to have any validity until they had been confirmed by Parliament; and what was more, this Act itself could not come into operation till such confirmation had taken place. He put it strongly that after nineteen years of delay the society had a right to hope for the accomplishment of its suggestion, and he begged to respectfully urge on him (Mr. Gladstone), to use his influence with the House that the bill might at once be passed as the greatest law reform ever proposed in this country, and still more valuable as making the way easy for further beneficial changes.

Mr. Gladstone, in reply, thanked the deputation for the support of the bill, and assured them that the Government were fully alive to the importance of its passing during the present session, and that every possible effort would be made to secure its object.

SOLICITORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

The usual monthly meeting of the board of directors of this association was held at the Law Institution, Chancery-lane, London, on Wednesday last, the 6th inst., Mr. William Strickland Cookson in the chair. The other directors present were Messrs. Avison (of Liverpool); Benham, Bulmer (of Leeds), Burton, Hedger, Monckton, Nelson, Rickman, Shaen and Torr (Mr. Eiffe, secretary).

A statement of the result of the recent anniversary festival, held under the presidency of Vice-Chancellor Sir Richard Malins, was laid before the board, from which it appeared that, after paying all expenses connected with the festival, the net gain to the funds of the association is a sum of £716 3s. 5d., with an addition of thirty-three life, and eighty-five new annual members. Votes of thanks were unanimously passed to the Vice-Chancellor, and to the stewards and donors at the festival.

The receipt of a legacy of £180, bequeathed to the association in 1869 by the late Mrs. Martha Elizabeth Clark, of Kensington, was reported; and a letter was read announcing a legacy of £90, bequeathed to the association during the present year by the will of the late Mr. Thomas Darwell, solicitor, of Barton-upon-Irwell and Manchester, a member.

A sum of £125 was applied in grants of relief to necessitous applicants, and a sum of £700 was ordered to be added to the invested capital.

Eighteen new life and forty-three new annual members were admitted to the association, and other general business transacted.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

The annual meeting of this society was held at the Law Institution, Chancery-lane, on Tuesday, the 5th of July, Mr. E. C. Harvie presiding. The treasurer's balance sheet, duly audited, was presented to the meeting. The committee presented their annual report, which was as follows :—

To the Members of the Law Students' Debating Society.

Gentlemen,—We beg to lay before you our report of the proceedings of the society during the past session.

The society has, during that time, held thirty-two meetings, at which fifteen legal and nine jurisprudential questions have been discussed. The average length of the debates has been one hour and forty-five minutes. The remainder of the meetings have been devoted to the administration of the society's affairs.

The average number of members attending the meetings has been twenty-six, the largest number at one meeting having been thirty-eight, and the smallest fourteen.

The average number of speakers has been ten, and of voters fifteen, of whom, on an average, eleven voted in person and four in the register.

During the past session thirty-four members have been elected, the name of one former member has been re-entered on the roll, and thirty-one gentlemen have ceased to be members. There are now on the roll of the society 168 members.

Your committee have held nine meetings during the session, and have considered thirty-three legal questions, of which fifteen have been approved for debate.

Mr. W. H. Herbert having resigned the office of treasurer, Mr. L. Hunter, the then secretary, was elected in his place, and Mr. William Appleton was elected as secretary, in place of Mr. Hunter.

Mr. G. W. Byrne having resigned his post of auditor, Mr. A. G. Harvie was elected in his place.

The clause in rule 6, which imposed a fine of sixpence on ordinary members of less than three years' standing for absence from the weekly meetings without notice, has been repealed, and the latter clause of rule 8, providing that members liable to such fine who should be absent from six successive meetings without notice should cease to be members, has also been repealed. No other alteration has been made in the society's rules.

The usual success has attended the members of the society at the examinations for the bar, and the final examinations for attorneys and solicitors.

The above statistics furnish abundant testimony to the continued and increasing prosperity of the society.

We are, gentlemen, your obedient servants,

LESLIE HUNTER, Treasurer.

THOS. R. HARGREAVES,

Members of the Committee.

The following members were elected to serve as officers of the society for the ensuing year, viz.:—Treasurer—Mr. James Smith Hepburn; Secretary—Mr. William Appleton; Committee—Messrs. Richard Freer Austin, John Percy Gordon, Thomas Rowland Hargreaves, Edgar Christmas Harvie, and Leslie Hunter; Auditors—Messrs. Arthur Gough Harvie, and Thomas Widdows.

The next meeting of the society will be on Tuesday, 25th October next.

AN APPEAL COURT FOR AUSTRALIA.

A task of great importance has been taken in hand by a member of our local Parliament. Mr. Casey has obtained in the Legislative Assembly a committee on the expediency of inviting all Australian countries to co-operate in obtaining a common law under which criminals convicted in any one shall lose harbour in all; probates, administrations, insolvency certificates, and executions (against property) issued in any one shall have force in all; and a tribunal of appellate jurisdiction over all Australian courts shall sit in the midst of all upon Australian soil.

The project of an Australian Court of Appeal is momentous, not only because of its probable effect in bringing the highest justice more immediately home to every Australian door, but because also of its certain tendencies on international character and development. The present relation of Australian tribunals to the appellate tribunals of Great Britain can have but an infinitesimally small effect on the national law and policy of Great Britain, but is most powerfully influential on the law and the policy and character of the Australian States. The pageantry of royalty exhibited here, the real acts of political control performed at home, and all the functions of commerce and social life performed between us, do but unite us to the mother country as with silken threads, or cords of silver and gold; but the power which the Privy Council and the House of Lords exercise over the property, liberty, and lives of all Australian citizens, on appeal from the highest courts of all Australian courts, anchors us to the mother country as with cables of iron. It is thus not only because of the personal character of the home tribunal, but because also of the nature of the law administered. The judges are the choicest of all the sages of British law. The law administered to us is principally that British law itself. In this respect our position is different from that of any other possible colonial confederacy; from that of the Canadian Dominion in half of which old French law is the basis of existing rights and wrongs; from that of the South African colonies, where Dutch law still dominates or greatly influences all the relations of the people; and from that of the great Indian Dominion, where two hundred millions of subjects live under the sanction of Brahmin and Mohammedan codes. The advantage of British appellate jurisdiction to such countries as these is chiefly political, ethical, and moral—theoretical, mediate, and indirect; the advantages to us are principally legal, immediate, and direct.

Hitherto by far most frequently the questions sent from Australia on appeal have arisen on the common law or the statute law of England in force in all the Australian colonies; and upon such laws it is obviously of the highest possible value to us to secure the most consummate English opinion. So prized by us, indeed, have been the judgments of such a tribunal, that though to procure them we have had to undergo the cost and delay of making "sacrifices" in a temple on the other side of the world, and though the deliverances of our oracle have sometimes been unexpected and sometimes obscure, yet we have never doubted them so far as they were understood, and we still seek them cheerfully and obey them implicitly when they come. No possible local tribunal that we can form in Australia can compare with these British appellate tribunals in respect of the weight and value of their decisions on questions of English common or statute law; and if all the questions arising among us were such only as these, and if the decisions on them could be obtained with reasonable speed and economy, none others would be desired so long as we remain subjects of the British Crown. But there has been in each Australian colony, even from the first, a proportion of questions arising on laws of purely original structure, which are framed to meet purely local wants, expressed occasionally in local language (for instance the pastoral and mining laws), and incapable of the most perfect interpretation by any tribunal uninformed—indeed incapable of being informed—of those surrounding circumstances which, according to the best canons of verbal criticism should always influence the interpretation of laws. Every year will increase the proportion this local law bears to English law in every part of the British dominions, and in this respect every year will diminish the value of an English court of ultimate appeal, and increase the value of a similar local court. We ought also to remember that the increase of local law has been accompanied by a native growth of lawyers. The educated members of all branches of the Australian legal profession have now attained a proportion, both in numbers and in degree of legal accomplishment, which entitles them to enforce their local and national sympathies and interests. To these important professional elements the question of an Australian Appellate Court presents aspects and aspirations deserving of consideration and weight. The present time seems, therefore, a fitting one to take in hand the establishment of a Federal court. But that task will be difficult as well as important.

In constituting the Court it would seem that the individual legislation of all the local Parliaments concerned would not be sufficient; no single Parliament of any colony could legislate as to the acts of a Court sitting outside its own parliamentary jurisdiction. An Imperial Act would seem necessary. In its constitution the Court would seem fitly to include the Chief Justices of all the colonies choosing to join in the scheme; including Western Australia, Tasmania, and New Zealand, if they desired. As to the place of sitting, we think that, for the present, Victoria should at once offer to New South Wales at least an alternate honour. But perhaps this and other difficult points would be most easily as well as most perfectly solved by the Court itself, if the power were given to it to determine the place as well as the times of its sittings. These times, whether fixed by law or by the Court itself, would need to be at least four a year. If the sittings were less often, some judgments would be delayed nearly six months, and thus the local court would lose a most advantageous point of comparison with the existing system. One of the practical effects we should feel in Victoria would probably be the necessity of remodelling the existing distribution of judicial labour, and of adding to the numerical strength of the Victorian bench. The labours of the Chief Justice are already greater than those of any of his brethren, and a local appellate court would at once greatly increase his judicial labours and lessen the time in which they must be performed.—Australian Jurist.

COURT PAPERS.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1869.

The following is the order recently issued in regard to the delegation of power to the registrars of the London Bankruptcy Court:—

Whereas, by section 67 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, it is enacted that "the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, and every judge of a local court of bankruptcy, may, subject and in accordance with the rules of court for the time being in force, delegate to the registrar, or to any other officer of his court, such of the powers vested in him by this Act as it may be expedient for the judge to delegate to him":

And whereas, by the General Rules for Regulating the Practice and Procedure of the London Bankruptcy Court, General Rule 2, it is provided that the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy may delegate to the registrars of his court such of the powers vested in him by the Act as such judge may deem expedient to delegate, except the power to make an order to commit a person for contempt:

Now, I the Honourable James Bacon, Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, under and by virtue of the said recited Act and of the said recited General Rules, do delegate to the following Registrars of the London Court of Bankruptcy—viz., William Hazlitt, Henry Philip Roche, James Rigg Brougham, William Powell Murray, Philip Henry Pepys, Esqs., and the Honourable William Cecil Spring-Rice, and to each and every of them the several powers vested in me by the said recited Act and the said recited General Rules, except the power to make an order to commit a person for contempt, and except also the power of hearing any appeal from a local bankruptcy court under section 71 of the said recited Act, and except also the power of hearing a trial before a jury of any question of fact which the parties in any matter desire shall be so tried, under section 72 of the said recited Act.

Dated this 5th day of July, 1870.

JAMES BACON, Chief Judge.

Mr. John Balguy, barrister-at-law, the newly-appointed stipendiary magistrate of the Staffordshire Potteries, has been placed by the Lord Chancellor on the commission of the peace for the county, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

A deputation from the Law Societies of Birmingham, Liverpool, Leeds, and Newcastle, had an interview on Wednesday with Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Lowe, in reference to the High Court of Justice Bill, now before the House of Lords. The deputation was introduced by Mr. Dixon, M.P.

Sir Barnes Peacock, late Chief Justice of Calcutta, was sworn in on the 6th July, at Windsor, as one of her Majesty's Privy Council, and will therefore become a member of the Judicial Committee of that body for the hearing of Indian appeals. In the Court Circular Sir Barnes is styled a "baronet," but no official announcement of a baronetcy being bestowed on him has yet been made. There are several precedents, however, to show that this honour has been conferred on the retiring Chief Justices of Bengal. The Right Hon. Sir John Anstruther was created a baronet on being appointed Chief Justice of Bengal in 1798, and the Right Hon. Sir Henry Russell received a similar honour on his return to England, after having served in that office, in 1812. The Right Hon. Sir Edward Hyde East (author of "East's Reports" and "Pleas of the Crown"), was also created a baronet on his return from India in 1823.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

Early in the week the markets, railways especially, were very brisk; now, however, the exciting position of Spanish affairs has occasioned a general relapse in the stock markets. Foreign securities have fallen, followed by the railway market; the former had already been depressed by some large sales on French account. The markets generally are heavy and in a state of considerable uncertainty. The Colonial and Indian Guaranteed Railway stocks maintain their ground, and the latter are now high in price. The arrangement came to by the Great Indian Peninsula Railway with the Government of India will probably be found to enhance the value of those stocks. The consolidation of the Great Western Railway Guaranteed and Preference Stocks is to take effect on the 16th.

Mr. Charles Ewens Deacon, solicitor, has resigned the offices of Town Clerk of Southampton, Clerk to the Local Board, and Secretary to the Cemetery. Mr. Deacon who was certificated in 1825, has held the town clerkship for thirty-two years. Mr. R. S. Pearce, the Deputy Town Clerk, who is in partnership with Mr. Deacon, is a candidate for the vacant office.

The will of the late Mr. William Sharpe, solicitor, of Bedford-row, has been sworn under £30,000 personality.

Mr. Serjeant Kinglake, M.P. for Rochester and Recorder of Bristol, is at present lying seriously indisposed at his town residence.

A law has been passed in California, under which every insurance company organised under the laws of the State shall furnish the Insurance Commissioner, on or before the first Monday in January every year, with data necessary for valuing all its policies outstanding on the 31st of the previous December. The Insurance Commissioner is authorised to employ a competent actuary, whose remuneration shall be three cents,—1½d. for every 1,000 dols. insured.—Post Magazine.

LONDON, JULY 16, 1870.

WE LEARN that the Committee of the Judicature Commission who were appointed in January last to deal with the County Courts, Local Courts, and Courts of Quarter Sessions, have produced a memorandum on these subjects, in the nature of a report for the use of the commission.

With regard to extension of jurisdiction, they consider that the evidence which has been taken before the committee coincides with public opinion in pointing to an extension of county court jurisdiction, both as regards the amount and the nature of the subject-matters of litigation; and they observe that one mode of extending the jurisdiction would be to allow plaintiffs to sue in the county court, entirely irrespective of amount or subject-matter, defendants being at liberty to remove into the superior courts (whether of law or equity), the removal being as of right where the amount is over a certain limit, and on certain conditions, and on cause shown when below the limit; a suggestion is also noticed that no defendant should be allowed to remove without first disclosing by affidavit a substantial defence on the merits, and that a plaintiff might be permitted to remove where the defence raises a question appropriate for a superior court. If these extensions should be found to work well the committee consider that the incorporation of the County Courts with the High Court of Justice as Courts of First Instance would naturally follow, but they query whether this change might not be made at once.

With regard to the classification of business, the committee notice one great cause of complaint—viz., the non-separation of the undefended cases (which form so large a portion of county court business), from claims bonâ fide disputed, an evil which would obviously be largely increased if the jurisdiction were enlarged without the introduction of any kind of classification; to meet this there has been suggested the assignment of certain county court towns in each district (the circuits being re-arranged, and probably diminished in number) for the trial of the more important bonâ fide contested cases, the subordinate County Courts (one of which might be appended to each principal Court) might, it is suggested, be each presided over, at a lower salary, either by a registrar as assistant judge, or by a barrister or solicitor sitting as judge but exempt from registrar's duties.

For the inconvenience, which has been matter of complaint against the county courts, as contrasting unfavourably in this respect with the local courts—of plaintiffs having always to be prepared with proof whether defence be likely or unlikely, and of the length of time between plaint and judgment-by-default—the committee can suggest no adequate remedy, except an extended issue of judgment-by-default summonses, which, again, might let in miscarriages of justice as against that class who are defendants in the very-small-debts cases. The committee throw out a hint, however, that this risk might possibly be obviated by the use, for judgment-by-default summonses, of peculiar coloured paper, the meaning of which would become matter of public notoriety, with the requirement of an affidavit of personal service, or (as some witnesses have suggested) service on defendant's wife. The committee note a unanimity of evidence in favour of allowing judgment-by-default in all claims over £5.

As to Service of Process, the committee think it reasonable that plaintiffs should be allowed the option of serving summonses themselves (or by their attorneys). High bailiffs they consider a necessary appurtenance to the courts which do the largest businesses; but all officers, they think, should be remunerated by salaries, and not by fees.

With regard to Expense of the County Court System, and the objections which have been made on this score, the committee suggest that in the smaller towns the county court might be kept open only one day (market-day) or two days per week instead of six, which would lower the expenses of providing for registrars' attendance, since one chief registrar per circuit, with clerks' or other professional help, could so, in most cases, get through all the business. They state it to be in evidence that the substitution of chief for deputy registrars was better for the profession than for the public.

The committee next proceed to deal with what for the sake of brevity they christen the "Banking System," under which the defendant pays his judgment debt to the Court and the Court passes the money on to the plaintiff; to abolish which would be to dispense with half (six) of the books now kept and a considerable proportion of the clerks. On this point there appears to be a considerable conflict of testimony, the majority of county court officials reprobating the idea of such a change, and those of local courts where the same system has not obtained, taking the opposite view. The former say—firstly, that the collection of the judgment debts by plaintiffs personally would be attended by numerous breaches of the peace, to which the committee reply that that would probably be otherwise if (as in the case of bastardy orders) it were made the defendant's business to come and pay the money, and not the plaintiff's to go and demand it;—and secondly, that in cases of execution or default in payment of instalments, there would ensue a very inconvenient uncertainty as to the amount which defendant had really paid, for which the committee suggest no remedy, but think the evil exaggerated, and query whether it would not be outweighed by the per contrâ. For the protection of defendants they would require from plaintiff, before execution, an affidavit of the sum due, giving the judge power to fine him for exaggeration; and they recognise the appropriateness of the post-office for payments passing between parties living distant from each other.

They advise the Payment of Fees by Stamps, as withdrawing a temptation from the lesser officials, and effecting a saving in clerks, treasurers, &c., subject to some simplification of the fee scale; no return of hearing fee could be made under the stamp system.

Criminal Jurisdiction should not, in their opinion, be added to the present Jurisdiction of the County Courts.

Finally, the committee state it as their opinion that all the Local Courts of Civil Jurisdiction might be abolished,—excepting the Stannaries Court and the Lord Chancellor's Courts of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and reserving the question as to the Mayor's Court (London), the Liverpool Court of Passage, and the Salford Hundred Court of Record.

No alteration is recommended as to Quarter Sessions beyond the recommendations of the Commissioners' First Report, but the committee observe that the time for holding Quarter Sessions must depend on that of the Assizes, a matter not before them.

WE PRINT IN ANOTHER COLUMN the report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons—appointed to inquire into the law of compensation for accidents as applied to railway companies, and also into the question whether precautions ought not to be taken to prevent accidents. The report is not what would be called a strong one. The proceedings of the committee show that they were nearly evenly divided on the more important questions, and the result is that the recommendations upon which they finally agreed do not probably represent with exactness the views of any member of the committee.

The practical effect of the report, except that it may slightly influence the Lord Chancellor in his preparation of rules of procedure of the High Court, will be nil. The committee do not concur in the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners of Railways in 1867, which they quote in their report—to the effect that the liability of the companies should be extended so as to make them insurers of their passengers except as to the consequences of their own negligence, but that the amount of the compensation should be limited. The committee prefer that a new tribunal should be established to administer the same law as is now administered. Their views as to the composition of this tribunal are rather vague, being simply that it shall not have a jury, and that it shall be sufficiently strong to secure the confidence of the public and possess adequate legal experience, and be assisted by engineering and medical advice.

They recommend to the careful consideration of her Majesty's Government the best mode of constituting such a tribunal. If the subject should be mooted again shortly we expect to hear from her Majesty's Government that they have too much on their hands to undertake this careful consideration at present, and that the committee was appointed for the purpose amongst other things of undertaking themselves this careful consideration and not of recommending it to some one else. As regards the limitation of amount of liability, the committee think that if their ideal tribunal is established no alteration of the present law will be required, but that a jury ought to be restrained from giving more than £1,000 to a first-class passenger; £500 to a second; and £300 to a third. We confess ourselves somewhat at a loss to understand this recommendation, but presume it to mean that the companies have failed to make out their main proposition—viz., that the fares they are entitled to charge are not sufficient fairly to cover the risk, but that they have shown that the amounts are occasionally unfairly assessed. If so, we fail to see the fairness of establishing an arbitrary limit. This seems as unfair as anything any jury have ever done. Inasmuch, however, as there can be no doubt that changes are impending in the constitution of all our tribunals, the result of this alternative recommendation on the subject of limiting the liability must be taken to be a report against any such limitation. We presume we shall at some time, more or less early, have the practical recommendations of the Judicature Commissioners carried out, as well as some of the theoretical ones which have been so much discussed of late. We take these practical recommendations to include a system whereby the nature of each dispute may be ascertained as early as possible in the proceedings, which to this point are to be uniform, and thereupon a mode of trial may be appointed such as may be most appropriate to the nature of the dispute when so ascertained. When we get such a system it will be only in the ordinary course to have questions of amount of compensation for personal injuries referred to official referees of the character contemplated by the report now presented. The result, therefore, comes to this,—that if the High Court of Justice Bill passes and rules are made carrying out the intention of the Judicature Commissioners, or even if such rules are made for our present courts, there will be, in the opinion of this Committee, no reason for limiting the liability of railway companies.

As regards the question whether any further precautions ought to be taken by companies to prevent accidents, the committee again confine themselves to recommending the evidence they have taken to the consideration of railway directors. They were equally divided on the question whether they should report that the evidence they had taken was "strong" evidence, but by the casting vote of their chairman they decided not to do so.

THE "TIMES" OF WEDNESDAY LAST contained a leading article commenting severely on the supposed misconduct of Baron Bramwell, in refusing to sit as a judge of the Queen's Bench at Nisi Prius, and so to enable that court to be kept open until Thursday the 14th, which should have been the last day of the sittings. Now, everyone in the profession knows that Baron Bramwell has had an easy time during the present legal year. He has tried the only election petition that there has been, but he has escaped all circuits, and probably he has not sat in court or in chambers for more than about twenty days during the year. He also availed himself of this leisure at the early part of the year to take a foreign tour, starting, however, before Mr. Justice Hayes' death had thrown additional work on the other judges, and before the Judges' Jurisdiction Act had passed, which might have enabled him to render assistance in other courts. The waste of judicial power which the recent inactivity of Baron Bramwell proves to be possible, is, therefore, a most fair subject of comment.

The occasion which our contemporary has chosen for its text is, however, a most unhappy one, for Baron Bramwell has been sitting in his own Court of Exchequer during the last three days of the Nisi Prius sittings; there, and by his aid, we believe, the list was got through on the last day. The three judges of the Exchequer had all started on their circuits, and therefore if it had not been for the services of Baron Bramwell, an election judge, being available, the list of that court would not have been concluded. It may be that there were more arrears in the Queen's Bench, but it cannot be doubted that the Baron's first duty was to his own court, and if he did refuse to assist in the Queen's Bench (which is a mere assumption of our contemporary, and which certainly was not stated by the Chief Justice), it was doubtless on the ground of his being wanted in his own court.

One reason why the Courts have not all been able to sit to the end of the usual sitting is no doubt this—that owing to Easter falling in term time, the end of the sitting falls three days later than usual. Most of the judges in fixing their circuits seem to have ignored this, or at all events they did not act in concert so as to provide for at least one judge of each court being in town till the end of the sittings. In fact, however, it would be difficult to secure that end, for it is only the chiefs who are responsible for sitting at Nisi Prius (for which they receive an additional salary), and who are bound to make their business arrangements so as to enable them to do so. The puisne judges only assist their chiefs at Nisi Prius as a secondary duty, when they have no duties elsewhere. As regards the chief justices, it cannot be said that any of them have neglected their duty. The Chief of the Queen's Bench happens to be the judge on duty at the Old Bailey, a duty imposed upon him as judge of the North Wales circuit, who, beginning his circuit later than the others, always takes the Old Bailey for July. On this occasion it happens that when the days for the sittings at the Old Bailey were chosen in November last, long before the present difficulties could have been foreseen, the July session was fixed for this week. The session also happens, unfortunately, to be a very heavy one. As regards the Exchequer, the Chief Baron certainly started two days before the end of the sittings, but he probably knew that he could rely on the services of Baron Bramwell, to which he had a claim prior to that of the Chief of the Queen's Bench. As regards the Common Pleas, the Chief Justice has deferred the commencement of the Home Circuit until the conclusion of the London sittings, and he was able at all events to sit for half of the last day, going down to Hertford in the afternoon. In this court, however, the cases in the list were so long that several of them, if begun, would probably not have been finished, and so were postponed. It is well known that, unless there is a reasonable probability of trying and finishing a cause, it is better to postpone it early rather than have the expense of keeping witnesses waiting about the court for two or three days at a time on two different occasions.

AS WE MENTIONED when discussing the subject at length (ante p. 549 and 570), benefit building societies are now governed by 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, and those provisions of 10 Geo. 4, c. 56 and 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 40, which, although those Acts are repealed, are kept on foot for the purpose of building societies. By a bill now before Parliament is proposed to repeal 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, and by implication the provisions of the other two Acts, and to substitute for them the provisions of the bill; but the bill proposes rather to consolidate than to alter the existing law relating to these societies. Some alterations are, however, to be made of which the most important are the following:—The appeal to the quarter sessions in the case of the registrar refusing to certify all or any of the rules transmitted to him is abolished. The restriction of the amount of shares to £150 is abandoned. The rules are to state the manner in which the funds of societies are to be invested. The rules are to provide for a general statement of the funds and effects of the society, with an account of all moneys received and expended on behalf of the society, being prepared at least annually and attested by two or more members of the society or other persons appointed by the auditors and countersigned by the secretary. Amalgamation of two societies or the transfer of engagements from one society to another is to be feasible with the consent of the major part of the trustees and of the committee of management of both societies or of the majority of the members of each such society. A society is to be wound up voluntarily by five-sixths of the members signing the proposed plan of dissolution; or compulsorily on the petition of any member or creditor if the Court shall so order. "The Court" throughout the Act is to mean in England the county court of the district in which the society carries on business. Lastly, there is a clause in the bill empowering societies to receive deposits or loans "to be applied to the purposes of the society," but no member is to receive any interest or dividend by way of annual or periodical profit upon his share until it is paid up or realised, or he withdraws from the society. This clause will set at rest the remata questio—Can building societies borrow money?—certainly as regards all future societies, and, as regards existing societies also, if it is held to be so far retrospective as to sweep them in, or is made so before the bill becomes law. This clause, and the provisions placing building societies under the jurisdiction of the county courts, are practically the most important innovations of the bill.

MR. STANSFELD stated in the House of Commons, on the 8th, in reply to a question by Mr. Salt, that in his opinion the present arrangements respecting the business of the Accountant-General in Chancery's office were, especially as regarded the Long Vacation, unreasonable; and that the whole subject was being considered by the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury. We are very glad of this latter assurance. We have before now had occasion to comment on the hardship of having the fount of justice sealed up in certain cases for a quarter of a year; the inconvenience as regards moneys in court may be more prosaic, but it is quite as inconvenient. As the matter now is, not a penny can be got out of court during the long period for which the office of the Accountant-General is closed. Solicitors can bear witness how very inconvenient that often proves to suitors. We do not want to make the Long Vacation as busy as term time. The lawyers and the officers earn their holiday, and the public are all the better for their having it; but, just as a "vacation judge" is appointed to provide for pressing matters of injunction, and so forth, there should be some representation of the Accountant-General's office, accessible during the Long Vacation, for the transaction of urgent money matters.

THE SUPERIOR COURTS sent 116 actions in tort to the County Courts for trial last year, under section 10 of the Act of 1867. The total amount claimed was £32,000, but only £2,880 was recovered; 66 of the actions were successful. In eight cases the claim was for £1,000 (including one for £1,300), and only three were successful, the damages awarded being £50 in each case. There were twenty-one claims for £500 each, thirteen of which were successful, but only to the extent of £975 in the aggregate. In no case was the sum claimed recovered, the nearest approach to the full amount being in a case in which £250 was claimed and £200 recovered. In one case where £200 was claimed 5s. was awarded, and in numerous cases where the sums claimed were from £200 to £300 the verdicts varied from £2 to £10. In most of the unsuccessful claims the defendants appear not to have thought it worth while to tax their costs. The obvious inference from these facts is that a large proportion of these actions were of the kind termed speculative.

THE DEATH OF LORD JUSTICE GIFFARD has robbed us of one of the ablest judges who ever adorned the Bench. A strange sad fatality has attended the occupants of the Lord Justices' Bench since the dissolution of the long companionship of the late Lords Justices Knight-Bruce and Turner. Sir G. J. Turner survived his colleague scarcely nine months; Sir John Rolt had scarcely sat for six months when he was struck down by paralysis, and, though still living, never returned to the Court. Sir C. J. Selwyn, to all appearance the most robust among his fellows among the bench, the "light blue" oarsman of earlier years, was taken by death in the year following; and now Sir G. M. Giffard, has been summoned to join his predecessors. No sounder lawyer, no stronger, keener, or quicker intellect, and no better gentleman has ever been raised to the English bench. In our obituary notice we shall be able to speak of him at greater length; and, in the meantime, we must express our sincere sympathy with the eloquent tribute offered to his memory yesterday by Lord Justice James, the colleague who never met him on the bench. Sir W. M. James's speech will be found printed in another column.

THE RIGHTS OF HUSBANDS IN THE DIVORCE COURT.

The agitation in some quarters for "women's rights" has called forth in other quarters the most indignant protests against these most modern of modern theories by which women are affirmed to be as much entitled as men to all civil, political, and proprietary rights. The discussion goes on hotly in the Houses of Parliament and outside the Houses of Parliament, and as far as we can see at present it is likely to continue for some time to come. With the political aspect of these questions we do not interfere. We only deal with their actual or probable effects upon the existing law. In the discussions upon this subject at public meetings and elsewhere a surprising amount of ignorance as to the real state of the law is frequently exhibited, and we now take the opportunity of noticing a case in which much information on this subject may be found.

It has happened just at this period when questions respecting the rights of married women have been attracting so much public attention, that a case has arisen in the Divorce Court in which a husband has made the boldest claims respecting the exercise of marital rights. It would be difficult to find a parallel for such claims so plainly set forth under such circumstances in any other reported case. The case we speak of is Kelly v. Kelly, decided by Lord Penzance (18 W. R. 191), and affirmed on appeal by the Full Court (18 W. R. 767). The material facts of the case are all found in the judgment of Lord Penzance in the court below. The suit was by Mrs. Kelly for judicial separation from her husband the respondent, the Rev. James Kelly, on the ground of cruelty. He opposed the application, and defended himself in person. Before the circumstances arose on which the charge of cruelty was founded a sister of the petitioner had left her £5,000, a great part of which was lost by the investments the respondent made of it. The petitioner being unable to obtain from her husband a clear idea of her rights and those of her son under her sister's will, wrote, without her husband's knowledge, to her brother-in-law to see the will for her and to explain it, and some correspondence passed between them on the subject. Some of these letters fell into the respondent's hands, and he resented very much this step of his wife's. About the same time the petitioner's son quarrelled with the respondent, and the petitioner to some extent took the son's part. The subsequent acts of the respondent are thus stated by Lord Penzance in his judgment:—"He (the respondent) commenced opening her letters and calling her a vile traitor and apostate. He told her that no modest woman would associate with her more than with a prostitute, and that she had given her confidence to another man, &c., &c. He refused to sit at meals with her; he insisted on occupying a separate bed-room; he told the servants to take orders from him and not from his wife; he forbade her to visit the poor of the district and desired her not to attend the sacrament. Some months passed in this way. The respondent kept apart from his wife all day, except at family prayers, and even then he appears to have had little or no communication with her, except in the way of rebuke or reproach." There was a great deal more evidence of this sort of conduct by the respondent towards the petitioner. When the respondent was with the petitioner for a short time "he occupied the time in what he called 'putting her sin before her,' and in strong, coarse and abusive terms applying to her the same epithets and language as would be applicable to a woman who had been guilty of adultery." "She was entirely deposed from her natural position as mistress of her husband's house." "In short, she was treated as a child or a lunatic."

"Withheld from the performance of her household duties, subordinated to servants, penniless, and, so far as her husband could effect it, friendless, the daily life of this lady was little better than an imprisonment, the solitary silence of which was broken only by the language of harsh rebuke, foul words, and epithets of insult, indignity and shame." Under this treatment the petitioner became ill, and left the respondent's house. As to the conduct of the petitioner under these circumstances Lord Penzance says, "It would be difficult for a wife to play her part in so critical and painful a situation in a more becoming manner."

Subsequently Mrs. Kelly, as was not unnatural, wished not to live any longer with the respondent, and commenced a suit for judicial separation. The respondent did not deny the acts we have before stated, but contended that such conduct did not amount to cruelty on his part, and that it furnished no sufficient reason why his wife should not continue to live with him.

Lord Penzance decided that the respondent's acts amounted to cruelty as they had endangered the health of the petitioner, and he decreed a judicial separation. This judgment of Lord Penzance is worth a careful perusal for the sake of seeing how it guards against extending the definition of cruelty (of course, apart from physical violence or injury) to any conduct, however cruel in fact, so long as the wife's health or personal safety are not endangered. The judgment commences with a most curious sentence. After saying that the peculiarity of the case was the adoption by the respondent of a deliberate system of conduct towards his wife with a view of bending her to his authority, Lord Penzance goes on, "A man who sets about to achieve this end by purposely rendering a woman's daily life unhappy is in danger of overstepping his rights, as he is pretty sure to fall short of his duties." This is a very full recognition of marital rights. To "purposely render a woman's daily life unhappy" is not necessarily to overstep the rights of a husband or to fall short of his duties; but in doing so, he is only in danger of overstepping his rights, and pretty sure to fall short of his duties. The rest of the judgment dwells most strongly on the fact of the danger to the health of the petitioner, of the clearness of the evidence, and on the self-command of the petitioner during all this ill-usage. The learned judge refused to sanction "a system of treatment by which the respondent places his wife's permanent health in jeopardy," and therefore decided the judicial separation.

Against this decision Mr. Kelly appealed to the Full Court, consisting of Channell, B., Hannen, J., and Lord Penzance. This Court affirmed the judgment of the Court below. Channell, B., and Hannen, J., lay down the principle of law applicable to the case in the words of a passage in the judgment appealed against: "If force, whether physical or moral, is systematically exerted for this purpose" (i.e., to bend a wife to her husband's authority) "in such a manner, in such a degree, and during such a length of time as to break down a wife's health and render serious malady imminent, the interference of the law cannot be justly withheld by any court which affects to have charge of the wife's personal safety." "Moreover the decisions have imparted the further proposition as a condition of the Court's interference that the troubles of the wife are not owing to her own misconduct." This principle has, therefore, now the authority of the Court of Appeal. Lord Penzance also gave a judgment in which he enforced the principles stated in his judgment in the court below, and expressed very strongly the necessity of examining into the "conduct of the wife herself by way of provocation," and that "her demeanour under even unmerited oppression or unprovoked cruelty must be studied by the court."

This case decides a new point as to the meaning of the word "cruelty" in the Divorce Court, but as has been seen it extends the meaning of "cruelty" no further than was absolutely necessary for the decision. If unfortunately such a case as this should again arise precisely similar, except that there was no present danger to the wife's permanent health, and no serious malady imminent, the decision in Kelly v. Kelly would not be any authority for saying that the wife had a right to a judicial separation; and indeed the judgments in the case so carefully avoid going that length, that the case would probably be relied on as showing that, unless there is serious danger to health, the wife cannot successfully claim a separation. This point, however, is left open at present.

COLLUSIVE WASTE

A bill for an account of waste already committed cannot in general be entertained unless it prays an injunction also. In such a case an action of trover is the remedy. Where the bill is for an injunction, and waste has been already committed, the Court, to prevent a double suit, will decree an account, and satisfaction for what is past (Jesus College v. Bloom, 3 Atk. 262). But if the waste be of such a nature that there is no remedy at law, a bill for an account will lie. This is the case where waste has been committed by collusion and fraud between the owner of the particular estate and the remainderman.

Waste is either a destruction or a wrongful conversion of part of the inheritance by the owner of a particular estate. We are now speaking not of equitable waste, but of legal waste. Where timber, for instance, has been felled by a tenant for life, impeachable of waste, the owner of the first estate of inheritance (Lewis Bonles's case, 11 Rep. 79) may bring at his option either trover for the trees, or an action for money had and received from the timber; and prior to the provisions of 3 & 4 Will 4, c. 27, for the abolition of real and mixed actions, he might also, if he were or became the immediate remainderman in fee or tail, but not otherwise, have brought an action of waste. "If there be tenant for life, remainder in fee; if tenant for life commit waste and afterwards die, remainderman in fee may bring action of waste" (Page's case, 5 Rep. 76).

To recur to what we said at the outset, that collusion and fraud confer jurisdiction in cases where the remedy would otherwise be at law, the law was settled by the case of Garth v. Cotton (1 Ves. Sen. 524). In Garth v. Cotton, a tenant for ninety-nine years, if he should so long live, without impeachment of waste, except voluntary waste, remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, remainder to his first son in tail, remainder to A. in fee, having no son at the time, colluded with A. to fell timber, and divide with him the proceeds. The tenant for years afterwards had a son, who filed his bill against A., and by Lord Hardwicke's decree, recovered from A. so much of the proceeds of the timber as he had received, while the remainderman in expectancy, but without interest further back than the filing of the bill.

The ratio decidendi in Garth v. Cotton, Vice-Chancellor James explained to be as follows:—"The law being that, if waste is committed, the person entitled to the first estate of inheritance is the only person to recover, and that he is entitled to recover for his own benefit all timber felled: where, by collusion between the tenant for life and the pro tempore owner of the inheritance, waste is committed, the Court with its general jurisdiction to prevent fraud will interfere, notwithstanding it is a legal wrong, and say, "We will not allow this fraud, we will bring this money into court, to be impounded for the benefit of the estate." (See Birch Wolfe v. Birch, 18 W. R. 594, L. R. 9 Eq. 683.) We said the pro tempore owner of the inheritance, because these questions arise in cases where the presumptive remainderman has afterwards been displaced by some later-born person prior to him in the line of limitation, as in Garth v. Cotton.

The last mentioned case went on the ground of actual collusion. In Williams v. Duke of Bolton (1 Cox, 72), the particular estate and the remainder in fee were united in the same person, who, so to speak, colluded with himself in his double character. The case stood thus. B. was tenant for life in possession of the estate, remainder to his first and other sons in tail, remainder to O. for life, remainder to O.'s first and other sons in tail, remainder to B. in fee. O. had a son, who died an infant. B., relying perhaps on O. continuing childless, and having no child of his own, committed waste, and afterwards O. had another son. The Court held that B. ought not to take advantage of his own wrong by taking the timber thus cut. This was as to be expected. But the decision went on to the effect that the second son of O. was not entitled to the proceeds of the timber, which were to be retained in court until it should be seen whether B. should have a child, and the proceeds had to be replaced with interest at 4 per cent. from the time when the money was received for the timber.

In the recent case of Birch Wolfe v. Birch (ubi sup.), in which Garth v. Cotton was considered, waste was alleged to have been committed by the tenant for life, who was also the remainderman in fee at the time. There was this point of similarity between the cases; but the result was wholly different, inasmuch as the Court, in Birch Wolfe v. Birch, finding that the defendant had laid out upon permanent improvements of the inheritance a sum far exceeding the intrinsically small value of the timber felled by his order, thought the charge of collusion could not be supported, and dismissed the bill.

Where, indeed, the person who thus filled both characters has expended far more upon the inheritance than he has received from the acts of waste, it is not likely that the Court can treat the case as one of waste, although legally speaking it may be so. The Court interferes where the owner of the particular estate contrives with the remainderman to do, to the injury of the inheritance, some act which neither could do without the sanction of the other. In Whitfield v. Berwit (2 P. Wms. 240) A. was tenant for life, remainder to first son in tail, remainder to B. for life, remainder to C. in tail. Neither A. nor B. having a son born, B. cut timber wrongfully, and it was held that C., as owner of the first estate of inheritance, was entitled to the proceeds, nor was B. allowed to set off any moneys expended by him in repairs, since it was a wrong thing to cut down the timber, and showed quo animo it was done, not to repair, but to sell. In Birch Wolfe v. Birch, on the other hand, the executor of a tenant for life was allowed to set off sums expended by his testator on permanent improvements against sums received by himself from the proceeds of timber cut by his testator, the Court being satisfied that the waste was committed with an entire absence of intention to wrong the inheritance.

Proceedings to restrain or obtain an account of waste will usually originate with the owner of the first estate of inheritance. But the remainderman for life may also sue to protect the inheritance. Trustees to preserve contingent remainders also may (Garth v. Cotton, 1 Ves. Sen. 555), and, according to Lord Eldon's dictum in Stansfield v. Habbergham (10 Ves. 278), are bound to do so, for the protection of contingent remaindermen where they have notice that acts of waste are being committed.

The proceeds of acts of waste recovered in such a suit, whether by remainderman for life, remainderman in fee or tail, or trustees to preserve, will be directed to be settled to the uses of the settlement, and do not belong to the person who happens to be the owner of the inheritance for the time being subject to the contingency of the estate opening to let in some prior estate of inheritance limited to one who is not yet in esse. Any other conclusion would be manifestly inequitable. Powlett v. Duchess of Bolton (3 Ves. 374), was a suit which was instituted for the purpose of ascertaining who was entitled to the proceeds of the timber wrongfully felled, which in Williams v. Duke of Bolton (ubi sup.) had been ordered to be brought into court. In the course of his judgment Lord Loughborough said, "when this timber was cut, no doubt, at law, the Duke would have taken, being the first owner of the inheritance; but the Court very properly held, that he should not by a fraud upon the settlement which made him tenant for life, gain that advantage to himself, as owner of the reversion in fee. Considering it as a fraud upon the settlement, the consequence is, that that part of the property which is taken from the settlement ought to be restored to the settlement."

We have seen that the right to sue in respect of timber wrongfully cut belongs to the owner of the first estate of inheritance in esse at the time of severance; and he, according to Lee v. Alston (1 Bro. C. C. 37), is entitled to such timber, notwithstanding the existence of immediate estates and contingent remainders that may afterwards come into esse and defeat his estate. According to Bagot v. Bagot (32 Beav. 509, 12 W. R. 35), a decision which seems to be in harmony with Powlett v. Duchess of Bolton (ubi sup.), the property in timber thus severed follows the uses of the settlement, and the interest on the fund thus produced is receivable by the successive owners of particular estates (other than the wrong-doer), the corpus of the ground becoming the property of him who, at the termination of the last particular estate, is the owner of an estate of inheritance. The relative rights of the heir and tenant for life as to timber wrongfully out by a preceding tenant for life were considered in Gent v. Harrison (Joh. 517, 8 W. R. 57).

Demands in respect of timber wrongfully felled, when brought against the estate of a deceased tenant for life, who was also contingent remainderman in fee, must be brought within six years from the death. And, where the two estates are not united, the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27) runs from the death of the tenant for life when the right of the remainderman first falls into possession (Duke of Leeds v. Earl Amherst, 2 Ph. 117). Until the death of the tenant for life, the claim, although capable of being enforced, does not arise in such a state as that it can be barred by length of time.

RECENT DECISIONS.

COMMON LAW.

ACTION AGAINST CARRIERS—PARTY TO SUE—PROPERTY IN GOODS.

Mead v. South Eastern Railway Company, C.P., 18 W. R. 735.

Not long ago (ante 273, 294) we examined the question who is the proper person to sue a carrier for loss of or injury to goods during their carriage. This question, although in principle clear enough, has yet been surrounded with much difficulty, in consequence of many ill-considered dicta in judgments on this point, where it has been said that the proper person to sue is the person who has the property in the goods. As, for instance, in Coombes v. The Bristol, &c., Railway Company, where the consignee of goods, the property in which had not passed to him, sued the carriers for the loss of the goods, Watson, B., said "the right to sue the carrier depends upon the question in whom the property in the goods is." There are dicta to the same effect in other cases. The true rule, however, for ascertaining the proper plaintiff is that he is entitled to sue who has contracted with the carriers for carriage. So far as concerns the contract of carriage, this is the only test for ascertaining the plaintiff. The fact of the ownership of the goods may be material evidence in finding out who was the party who contracted with the carriers, but the ownership is only evidence of that which gives the right of action, and does not itself give the right to sue. There is ample authority for this view, as we showed when we before discussed the subject at length; but there is, no doubt, some confusion in the authorities, not so much from conflicting decisions, but from conflicting dicta that have dropped from judges in these decisions. We are not, of course, now speaking of actions which always depend on the question of property, such as trover and trespass. If a carrier converts or destroys wrongfully the goods of another he may be held liable to the owner. This liability, however, does not depend upon his character of carrier nor his contract of carriage.

Mead v. South Eastern Railway Company will go far to remove the misconceptions which have hitherto existed as to the proper parties in actions against carriers. The plaintiff was in the habit of buying flour from A., who, by the plaintiff's authority, used to send it to the plaintiff by the defendants' railway. Some flour thus sent was injured in the carriage, and the plaintiff sued the defendants for the damage. It may be assumed, for the purpose of the question we are now noticing, that the property in this particular flour had not passed to the plaintiff from A. It was objected by the defendants that the plaintiff was not the proper person to sue as he was not the owner of the flour. The Court, however, refused even a rule to have the question argued. They said that, as there was clearly a contract between the plaintiff and the defendants for the carriage of the flour, the plaintiff was the proper person to sue for the breach by the defendants of that contract. The judgments clearly state the true rule for determining who ought to sue in these cases, and Coombes v. Bristol, &c., Railway Company is also noticed in the judgments, and distinguished from this case on the ground that in Coombes' case there was no evidence of a contract between the plaintiff and the carriers.

This decision will be a useful authority for the future, not because its principle is new, but because it decides clearly a point at law which before could only be established by reference to many decisions, and in spite of many dicta which at first sight appear to be opposed to the rule now laid down in Mead v. South Eastern Railway Company.

BANKRUPTCY.

APPEAL FROM REGISTRAR.

Re Nicholson, Bkcy., 18 W. R. 250.

Ex parte Blair. Re Mackle, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 615.

Before the late Bankruptcy Act the registrar of a court of bankruptcy was a subordinate officer, acting under and subject to the control of the Commissioner of Bankruptcy. Under the new Act his position is altered very materially.

The registrar's powers in respect of bankruptcies commenced under the new Act are governed by section 67 of the Act, and the rules made in pursuance of it. By section 67 the judge may, subject to the rules, delegate to the registrar any of the powers vested in him under the Act. Rules 2 and 3 define what powers may be delegated to the registrars; and rule 4 provides that "every order made by a registrar while acting under any delegated power shall have the same force and validity, and be subject to the same appeal, as an order made by the judge, but the registrar may adjourn any matter for the opinion of the judge, if he shall think fit." The case of Re Nicholson establishes a proposition which follows necessarily from the terms of the Act and rules, namely, that unless the registrar chooses to adjourn a question for the opinion of the judge, no appeal lies from him to the judge. The appeal from a registrar's decision, as from a judge's decision, must, in the case of a county court be to the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, in the case of the London Court to the Court of Appeal in Chancery.

The powers of the registrar of a court of bankruptcy in respect of proceedings pending when the Act of 1869 passed are governed by section 130 of that Act and the orders made under it. That section abolishes the previously existing country district courts of bankruptcy; but provides, amongst other things, that "such part of the business pending in any country district court of bankruptcy as the Lord Chancellor thinks fit shall be disposed of by the registrar of that court, who shall for that purpose continue to have and discharge all his powers and authorities, rights, and duties." Before the passing of the new Act there is no doubt that, except when he sat as deputy for the commissioner, the registrar was "not an independent authority, but simply an officer of the commissioner," and therefore the proper appeal from any decision of his was to the commissioner, not to the Court of Appeal (Re Taylor, 17 W. R. 389). But in the case of Ex parte Blair, Re Mackle, Lord Justice Giffard has decided that under section 130 of the Act of 1869, the registrar of a court of bankruptcy in respect of that portion of the pending business remitted to him by the Lord Chancellor under section 130, is in a wholly different position. He is as to all such business placed on the same footing as a commissioner under the old law, and an appeal lies from his decision to the Lords Justices.

Another point was also decided in the same case more distinctly perhaps than it had been before, namely, that the limitations of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act as to the period for taxing a solicitors' bill of costs do not apply to the bill of the solicitor of a bankruptcy, but that his bill is properly taxable without any special order, notwithstanding that more than a year may have elapsed since its delivery.

REVIEWS.

A Book of Chancery Costs: Comprising the Costs of Plaintiff and Defendant of Suit by Bill, Original Summons, on Special Motions, Special Petitions and Special Cases, Appeals, including Appeals to the House of Lords, Appointment of a Receiver and Passing his Account, Foreclosure Suit, the Trustees Relief Acts, the Companies Acts, with the Regulation as to the mode of Remunerating Official Liquidators, the Charitable Trusts Acts, and Miscellaneous Matters, on the Lower and Higher Scales; with an Appendix containing all the Orders of the Court of Chancery and of the County Courts under the County Courts Acts, 1865 and 1867, relating to Equitable Matters now in force, regulating Charges and Fees allowed and taken in the said respective Courts. By W. SHAEN, M.A., and EDEN KAYE GREVILLE, Solicitors. Second Edition, carefully Revised and considerably Enlarged by J. J. BUNNING, Managing Chancery Clerk. London: Wildy & Sons.

When we have reprinted the title page of this work we have informed the reader what the work is and to what it extends. The changes which have taken place since the first edition was published in 1857 are an ample justification for a second. These tables of costs will be found very useful to solicitors.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

LORDS JUSTICES.

On taking his seat in court on Friday morning, JAMES, L.J., said:—

I cannot proceed to the business of the day without saying a few words on the sad event which has cast its black shadow over this court.

During the short period in which I have been in this seat it has been my misfortune not to have sat by the side of my lamented colleague. But it has been my happiness to have known him well, intimately and as a friend, from the very commencement of his professional life, and for many years we sat side by side in the court of Vice-Chancellor Wood. He at the very outset obtained an amount of business, under which a mind of less strength might well have failed. But he applied himself to it with an industry which never to the end flagged. His acute intellect, sound judgment, and unsurpassed knowledge of legal principles made him the safest of advisers to the numerous clients who sought his counsel. What his powers as an advocate were, those only know and can tell who, like myself, were frequently engaged against him, and found how formidable an opponent he was. But he was not only a great lawyer and a great advocate; he was every inch an English gentleman; and when, after many years of successful practice, he was elevated to the bench as Vice-Chancellor, and afterwards promoted to the office of Lord Justice, his elevation and promotion were received by his brethren with unanimous acclaim, and the whole profession recognised in his appointments the just rewards of pure professional merits; honours and distinctions most worthily won and honourably bestowed.

We all hoped that he had a long period of useful life before him, and that in this court, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the suitors, the profession, and the public would for many years have had the benefit of the great judicial qualities which had already made him as eminent as a judge as he had been distinguished as a counsel; but it has seemed otherwise good to the Almighty Disposer of our lives. The loss to me who had hoped to have sat by him is very very great; it is scarcely less great to you who have practised before him. I know and feel that this tribute to his memory, which has come from the bottom of my heart, finds an answering echo in yours. May we in our respective careers be the better for thinking of what he was in them before us.

(Vice-Chancellor Sir R. MALINS.)

July 14.—THE VICE-CHANCELLOR, on being informed that Lord Justice James was not sitting to-day in consequence of the death of his colleague, observed that if the judges of the court had consulted their own feelings they would not have taken their seats, but, in the pressure of business at this period of the year, they felt that there ought to be no interruption of the proceedings of the court.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN-FIELDS.

This was an application on behalf of the creditors' assignee under the bankruptcy of Mr. George J. Vining, the former lessee of the Princess' Theatre, calling upon Mr. William Shakespeare Webster, solicitor, to show cause why he should not be committed for contempt for refusing to answer certain questions put to him at a meeting appointed for the examination of himself and other witnesses touching the estate and dealings of the bankrupt on the 21st June, such questions having been allowed by the registrar.

It appeared that the witness had been concerned for his father Mr. Benjamin Webster, the landlord of the Princess's Theatre, in certain matters. A lease had been granted of the theatre to Mr. Vining, and, shortly before the date of the adjudication, Mr. Webster, in accordance with one of the provisions in the lease, had re-taken possession. At the examination sitting the witness was asked whether he took an inventory of the scenery and fixtures found at the theatre at the time of taking possession, but he declined to say, on the ground that anything done by Mr. Webster upon his own premises could not form the subject of inquiry in this court under the bankruptcy. But the Registrar held that the witness was bound to answer, and, as he still declined, the matter was referred to the Chief Judge.

F. Knight in support of the application.

Nicholson, for the witness, urged that the assignees had no right to institute a fishing examination for the purpose of obtaining evidence in support of an action against Mr. B. Webster.

The COURT held that the witness was bound to answer the questions proposed to him and that he had been very ill-advised in refusing to do so. The witness had no privileges that other of her Majesty's subjects had not, and, if he still declined to answer, he must be committed.

Nicholson said that the witness was prepared to give all necessary information upon the understanding that it should not be used in evidence in an action.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—The witness has no right to impose any such term. I repeat that he has been very ill-advised.

Eventually, the witness undertook to answer unconditionally the questions proposed to him, and no order was made, except that the witness had to pay the costs:

(Before Mr. Registrar MURRAY.)

The case of Mr. James Hardman Cotterill, solicitor, formerly in co-partnership with Mr. W. H. Cotterill, solicitor, of Throgmorton-street, who recently absconded, again came before the Court upon an application to restrain certain proceedings in Chancery instituted against the firm by a creditor named Hargreaves. An injunction until further order was granted, the debtor stating his entire ignorance of the malpractices in which Mr. W. H. Cotterill had been engaged.

COUNTY COURTS.

LIVERPOOL.

(Before Serjeant WHEELER, Judge.)

July 11.—Church v. The Great Southern Sick and Burial Society.

Insanity held to be sickness, within the meaning of the Friendly Societies Acts. R. v. Manchester, 5 W. R. 29, and R. v. Huddersfield, 5 W. R. 629, commented on.

In this case, which was recently heard before his Honour, judgment was given yesterday as follows:—

Serjeant WHEELER.—The question raised in this case is, whether insanity is sickness or disease within the meaning of the Friendly Societies Acts. The importance of the question at issue may be estimated from the fact that there are in England and Wales 20,000 sick and burial societies, with an aggregate of upwards of two millions of members. The plaintiff is a member of the defendants' society, and his subscriptions have been fully paid. The object of the society, as stated in the rules, is, amongst other things, "to afford the usual aid in case of sickness," and according to a further rule a member visited with any kind of disease, whereby he is unable to follow his occupation or to do any kind of work, is entitled to a weekly sick allowance according to the prescribed scale, which varies with the term of the illness. After receiving relief for twelve months the right to it is suspended for a like period, except in certain specified cases. It is scarcely necessary to say that the principle upon which all these societies are based is that by making periodical payments of limited amount in time of health a working man may secure a fixed provision in seasons of sickness. The plaintiff, whose trade was that of a gasfitter, is now an inmate of the Lancaster Lunatic Asylum, and of course unable to follow his occupation or earn his living. He claims to be entitled to sick allowance under the rules, but the society, whilst waiving any objection of a technical kind, resist the claim because, as they allege, it does not fall within the scope of the society's purposes. In justification of this view they appeal to the published opinion of the late lamented Mr. Tidd Pratt, the registrar of friendly societies, which is in effect that "in no case of insanity would the managers be justified in giving relief to a member so afflicted." And the reason assigned by that gentleman for this strong opinion is, to use his own language, that "sickness means a state of bodily disease being a derangement of the functions of the body, and has no reference to lunacy, which is a derangement of the mental faculties." Mr. Tidd Pratt also, in his treatise upon the law of friendly societies, has a note (see page 15) with reference to the word "sickness" as judicially interpreted under the Act 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, which interpretation he holds to apply equally to the existing Friendly Societies Act. Upon the construction of this word in the earlier Act, Mr. Tidd Pratt says it has been held that lunacy is not in any case to be regarded as sickness, and that by sickness is meant a state of bodily disease, being a derangement of the functions of the body. And he cites in support of his view Reg. v. Manchester, 5 W. R. 20, and Reg. v. Huddersfield, 5 W. R. 629. And further, Mr. Tidd Pratt, in his annual official report upon friendly societies for the year 1866, reports Chief Justice Erle to have used these words—"Sickness implies a morbid action of the body occasioned either by external violence or internal disease, and has no reference to lunacy, which is a disease of the mental faculties." Now upon referring to the reports of these cases, I find that the former of them (Reg. v. Manchester) relates to the removal of a pauper lunatic, under the Act 9 & 10 Vict., and to the effect upon the power of removal of a particular section of that Act, which makes a pauper irremovable in respect of relief rendered necessary by sickness or accident not producing permanent disability. The real point decided must relate back to the single question discussed, and undoubtedly that did not involve the proposition (in fact it could not) that lunacy is not in any case to be regarded as sickness, nor did the court so decide. With regard to the second case, The Queen v. Huddersfield. It has really nothing to do with the present controversy, nor is any warrant to be found in it for the note to page 15 of Mr. Pratt's treatise, or for the paragraph to which I have referred in his official report of 1866; nor did Chief Justice Erle, as is supposed, say anything about lunacy. What he stated, according to the published reports of the case, was that the word "sickness" implies a morbid action of the body, occasioned either by external violence or by internal disease, and that is the only remark which his lordship made. I take for granted that to this dictum of the Chief Justice no just exception can be taken, and that the right of an insane person to relief from the sick fund of a friendly society must depend upon whether insanity is, or is not bodily sickness. Mr. Tidd Pratt asserts it is not. I venture, appealing to the testimony of the best authorities in physiology, to think that it is. It is necessary, in considering the question, to bear in mind the natural and essential relations of mind and body. Every manifestation of mind in this life is made by and through the natural organ of the brain, and the mind is so influenced by the brain that the condition of the former is an invariable index to the constitution and condition of the latter. Hence all causes of temporary or permanent disturbance in the health of those parts of the brain that manifest the mind produce in the same degree the signs of mental derangement; and vice versa, all symptoms of mental derangement indicate a proportionate disturbance in the sanitary state of the mind's bodily organ, the brain. Some years since, when it was a common circumstance to examine the brain with the aid only of the naked eye, it was not possible in many cases to discover any appreciable lesions of brain structure which produce and accompany insanity. But now, by the recent application of the microscope, the minute structure of the brain is revealed, and pathologists can trace distinctly the very seat and nature of those morbid changes which are the real essence of insanity. Hence Schroeder van der Kolk, an eminent German anatomist, says that "he does not remember to have performed the dissection of a lunatic during the last twenty-five years without finding a satisfactory explanation of the phenomena observed during life." If we glance back to the year 1831, when Dr. Andrew Combe published his work on mental derangement, we find this principle laid down—"Every derangement of function is accompanied by disorder either in the structure or mode of action of the organ which performs it, and without the removal or cure of which the function cannot be restored to its healthy state. From ignorance or want of confidence in the fact that the brain is the medium for manifesting mind, our predecessors were contented to regard mental derangement as an affection of the immaterial principle of mind, or as a particular dispensation of Providence, which they could not be expected either to understand or to remedy; and accordingly, while this view continued to influence their practice, all sorts of barbarous and useless measures were adopted against the miserable patients." The same author observes—"Sight is never impaired or hearing destroyed unless the organs which execute those functions are diseased, and in like manner thought and feeling are never deranged unless the cerebral organs by which they are manifested have undergone some morbid change. The latest expression of authoritative opinion upon this subject is by Dr. Maudsley, in his Gulstonian lectures "On the Relations Between Body and Mind," delivered this year at the Royal College of Physicians. That gentleman thus speaks—"I have given a survey of the physiology of our mental functions, showing how indissolubly they are bound up with the bodily functions, and how barren must of necessity be a study of mind apart from body. I now propose to show that the phenomena of mental derangement bear out fully this view of its nature, that we have not to deal with disease of a metaphysical entity which the method of inductive inquiry cannot reach or the resources of medical art cannot touch, but with disease of the nervous system disclosing itself by physical and mental symptoms." It seems then that the question in this case is concluded both by reasoning and medical testimony, and it appears to me that insanity is just as much bodily disease as paralysis and apoplexy, which are notoriously affections of the brain, are admitted to be bodily disease. It has been suggested, I see, in the Lancet, that in cases of insanity the right of relief out of the sick fund ought, on account of the usually chronic character of the malady, to be made subject to a special limit in point of time. That matter I leave to others to whom its decision properly belongs. All that remains for me to do is to give effect to the conclusion to which, after much consideration, I have come, and to direct that a verdict be entered for the plaintiff for the sum claimed.

APPOINTMENTS.

MR. JOHN JAMES JOHNSON, Q.C., recorder of Chichester, has been elected assistant chairman of the West Sussex Quarter Sessions, vice the hon. J. J. Carnegie, who has been elected chairman in the place of Mr. J. M. Cobbett, barrister-at-law, resigned. Mr. Johnson is the son of the late William Johnson, Esq., of the Pallant, Chichester, and was born in June, 1812. He was educated at Winchester, and was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in June, 1836, becoming a member of the Home Circuit. In August, 1863, he was appointed recorder of Chichester, and was created a Queen's Counsel and nominated a bencher of his Inn in 1864.

MR. RICHARD SEWARD PEARCE, solicitor, of Southampton, has been elected town clerk of that borough, in succession to Mr. C. E. Deacon, resigned. Mr. Pearce, who was in partnership with Mr. Deacon, was admitted in 1856, and has acted for many years as deputy town clerk of Southampton.

Mr. JAMES CAMPBELL LAYCOCK, solicitor, of Huddersfield, has been appointed clerk to the magistrates of that borough, which has recently received a separate commission of the peace. Mr. Laycock (who is a member of the firm of Laycock, Dyson, & Laycock) was certificated in 1819, and also fills the office of clerk to the West Riding magistrates sitting at Huddersfield.

Mr. BENJAMIN TERRY, solicitor, of Bradford, has been appointed by the Bradford magistrates to conduct public prosecutions for that borough. Some time ago Mr. Terry received the same appointment from the magistrates of the division of East Morley. Mr. Terry (who is a member of the firm of Terry & Robinson) was admitted in 1843, and is an alderman of Bradford.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, solicitor, of Dartmouth, has been appointed, by the Chief Justice of the colony of Victoria, a commissioner of the Supreme Court of that colony for taking affidavits in England.

Mr. JOHN PEED, M.A., Solicitor, of Whittlesea, Cambridgeshire, has been appointed clerk and collector to the Commissioners of the Nene Wash Lands, vice Mr. George Moore Smith, Solicitor, deceased. Mr. Peed was admitted in Michaelmas Term, 1858, and is a member of the Incorporated Law Society, and of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association.

Mr. HENRY NICHOLLS KNOTT, Solicitor (firm of A. W. & H. N. Knott), Worcester, has been appointed clerk to the Bromyard Board of Guardians. Mr. Knott was admitted in 1865, and is a member of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association.

Mr. JULES LOUIS COLIN, barrister-at-law, of the Mauritius, has been gazetted as Procureur and Advocate-General of that island. Mr. Colin was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in June, 1850, and in 1857 was appointed district and stipendiary magistrate of the Rivière du Rempart, Mauritius. In 1869 he was appointed Procureur and Advocate-General of the Mauritius, to which appointment he has only now been gazetted. The emoluments of the office are £1,350 per annum.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LAW CLASSES AT KING'S COLLEGE.

Sir,—In his speech at the recent meeting of the Legal Education Association as reported by you (ante p. 741), Sir Roundell Palmer mentions that I had told him that the law classes at King's College were languishing, and "were not likely to be permanently maintained, unless there was something which could give them the value they ought to have in these institutions, which had the power of granting admission to practice." Will you allow me to state through your columns, first, that in the hope that our machinery for legal instruction may now be utilised by the association, we shall keep on foot all the law classes at King's College; secondly, that as I told Sir Roundell Palmer, one of the law classes, that in connection with the evening class department, has taken root, and flourishes; and thirdly, that an eminent firm in the City has undertaken to give a prize of £10 to the best student in law during the winter session of 1870—71, which commences in October next.

JOHN CUTLER, Prof. of Law, K.C.L.

4, New-square, July 11.

THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Sir,—I was pleased to read your observations in last week's Solicitors' Journal upon the result of the meeting of solicitors held at the Guildhall Tavern, and I am still more glad to find that at last the solicitors have taken up the subject which has required ventilation for a very long time past; but to my great surprise, on making inquiries to-day, I am informed that the candidates who were nominated by the committee appointed at that meeting have decided not to stand for election on the 19th inst. Surely, Sir, if, as I am credibly informed, these candidates signified their assent to act in writing before their names were sent into the Incorporated

Law Society by the committee, there must be some "back stairs" influence at work to induce them to adopt this course, and the sooner the subject is investigated the better for all parties concerned.

Of course, if it is a fact that the gentlemen in question have determined not to stand for election, it is now too late to nominate others, and so the nominees of the council, or rather as they are pleased to term them, "the gentlemen whose candidature is approved of by the council," will step in without opposition. Surely this is only another argument in favour of the resolution which was arrived at at the meeting in question.

July 14.

ANTI-STARCHAMBER.

UNQUALIFIED PRACTITIONERS.

Sir,—I observe that, at the recent meeting at the Guildhall Coffee-house, animadversion was freely indulged in against the Council of the Incorporated Law Society for not putting down unqualified practitioners. In your issue, also, of the previous week a gentleman, writing as to the Legal Education Association, went out of his way to lay a similar indictment against the Council. In your observations upon the proceedings at the Guildhall Coffee-house meeting you, with your usual sense of justice, say that "it is easier to say that such and such a one ought to be proceeded against than to carry the idea into execution." I have been induced by these remarks to refer to the statutes bearing on this question, and I think, if the gentlemen who so freely attacked the Council had done the same they would have arrived at the same conclusion as that to which you have come.

I find that the provisions against unqualified practitioners in the two Attorneys and Solicitors Acts, are sections 2, 32 and 35 of 3 & 7 Vict. c. 73, and section 26 of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, and these sections certainly provide a practicable mode of proceeding against offenders. The provisions of these sections, however, are confined entirely to practising in the various courts. Now we all know that the courts are not the preserves in which these poachers seek their game. The difficulties there are too obvious. In fact, the chairman at the meeting in question alluded only to "law stationers, accountants and others," and it appears that the class of business with which these persons interfere only brings them under the penalties of the Stamp Acts, and we all know that those penalties can only be recovered by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. The speaker and the writer to whom I have alluded do not say that they have satisfied themselves that the inactivity of which they complain does rest with the Council, and does not rest at Somerset House, if it exists at all.

FAIR PLAY.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

July 8.—The Evidence Further Amendment Act (1869) Amendment Bill.—Lord Penzance moved the second reading, explaining that its object was to extend to arbitrations and other proceedings the provision of an Act of last session, enabling persons who objected to take an oath to make a solemn declaration.—The bill was read a second time.

The Benefices Resignation Bill.—The Bishop of Winchester proposed the third reading of this bill, with a new clause, drawn up by the Lord Chancellor, with regard to lunatic clergymen. The bill would place parochial clergymen in much the same position as that of bishops under the Act of last session, and he received letters from them every day expressing great anxiety that it should pass.—Earl Stanhope believed the operation of the bill would be beneficial to the Church, but it differed from the Bishops' Resignation Act in being a permanent measure.—The Duke of Buckingham, while admitting the desirability of making some provision for worn-out clergymen who wished to be relieved from their duties, thought some minimum of service should be laid down as a condition of a retiring pension. It should be considered, moreover, whether an incumbent could properly discharge his duties and meet all claims upon him if his income was reduced by several hundreds a year by the pension of his predecessor. There was nothing, indeed, in the bill to prevent two retiring pensions from being in operation in a single parish at the same time. The bill would not be applicable to small livings unless there was some scheme of augmentation. The composition of the commission by which the pensions were to be awarded also required consideration, for under the bill as it stood the voice of the parishioners would not be heard except through the commissioner nominated by the patron, which would in many cases be insufficient. He thought further time should be allowed for the consideration of the measure.—The Duke of Richmond said most of the clauses required such amendments that they would be hardly recognisable.—Debate adjourned.

The Irish Land Bill.—Third reading.—Lord Clancarty considered the bill as seriously touching on the rights of property; it took from the landlord to give to the tenant, which would cause jealousy between the classes. Still, as a landlord, he would try to make it work well.—The Earl of Granard regarded it as a boon, in that it legalised principles on which good landlords had always acted.—Lord Oranmore still regarded it as an unmixed injury to Ireland.—The bill was read a third time.

Lord Granville said that the clause proposed by Lord Kimberley on the report, enabling a tenant to claim compensation under a higher term of the scale, by basing his claim on a portion only of his rent, did not satisfy the Opposition; and as the Government were not in a position to make any other proposal, he should reserve the question for the consideration of the other House.—Lord Cairns and Lord Salisbury said the Government had promised to bring up a new clause on the third reading.—Lord Kimberley thought not; he was willing to adopt the clause as he had moved it on the report.—The offer was not accepted, and the subject dropped.—A proposal by Lord Longford to leave out the words "and reclamation of land" in clause 3 (Improvement compensation), was negatived.—The Lord Chancellor said it would be unjust to make a tenant responsible for rent due or for breaches of covenant committed by a predecessor from whom he derived title by ordinary assignment with the landlord's consent, because the landlord could get everything from the assignor. He, therefore, proposed to insert the words "from whom he derives by operation of law."—Lord Cairns said this would enable tenants in arrear, and who had committed breaches of covenant to assign to newcomers who would be able to claim full compensation allowance, and so the landlord's rights would be defeated. It went far beyond the Ulster custom.—Lord O'Hagan said the amendment would not deprive the landlord of any just right he now had; he might sue in ejectment or distrain.—Lord Salisbury said it would allow a man to get rid of his mortgage by assigning his land. The amendment was negatived.—Lord Dunsany moved to add the following to the other exceptions in clause 5:—"Where any holdings shall have been in the occupation of the landlord or his predecessor in title immediately before the tenancy under which the claim is made by the tenant."—Lord Cairns said the case was already provided for in the bill withdrawn.—The Earl of Limerick proposed an amendment, the object of which was to enact, in regard to the future only and not to the past, that if a new tenant, with the permission of his landlord, paid anything for goodwill, he should get the landlord's consent in writing.—Negatived.—Earl Granville moved to substitute a new clause, defining the cases in which evidence is to be deemed disturbance. The bill then passed.

The Protection of Inventions Bill was read a third time and passed.

July 11.—The Dividends and Stock Bill passed through committee.

July 12.—The Benefices Resignation Bill.—Adjourned debate on third reading.—The Duke of Richmond said the bill would materially interfere with the rights of patrons as well as with the interests of the Church; it was an exceedingly bad bill.—The Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Winchester, and the Bishop of Gloucester, supported the bill.—Third reading carried by a majority of 29 to 18.—It then appeared that several verbal amendments were necessary; and, in particular, one of the clauses was misplaced. These errors having been amended by the Lord Chancellor, the bill passed.

July 14.—University Tests Bill.—Second reading carried by a majority of 95 to 79.

The Benefices Bill.—The Duke of Marlborough said the bill had been passed by the House of Commons with singular unanimity, but since it had been read a second time by their Lordships he found that objections were entertained to some of its provisions by noble lords on both sides of the House. He would therefore move to discharge the order for going into committee; and next session he would move for a select committee to inquire in what way the existing law ought to be amended.—Lord Romilly said everyone who knew the practice of the House of Commons was aware that it sometimes passed a bill without giving it any consideration, relying on their Lordships to throw it out. Hon. members said, "The Lords will throw it out if it be not a fit bill," so that the fact of the bill now before their Lordships having been passed by the House of Commons with such singular unanimity was a compliment to their Lordships' House rather than a reason why the bill should be passed by their Lordships.—The order for committee was then discharged.

The Charitable Funds Investment Bill was read a second time.

The Lord Chancellor's Judicial Committee of the Privy Council Bill was read a first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

June 8.—The Accountant-General in Chancery.—Mr. Salt asked the Secretary to the Treasury whether it was in contemplation to remove the entire or any part of the business of the Accountant-General in Chancery to the Bank of England; if this was not the case, whether it would be possible to arrange for the payment of Chancery dividend and annuity warrants at the Bank of England from the 20th of August to the 28th of October, during which period (with the exception of three days) the office of the Accountant-General in Chancery was closed; and whether it was intended to fill up the office of Accountant-General when the next vacancy occurred.—Mr. Stansfeld said it was not in contemplation to remove any part of the business of the Accountant-General in Chancery to the Bank of England, nor was there any formed and definite present intention on the part of the Government to alter the arrangements for the conduct of business in that department. It would be premature to express any opinion on the subject of giving up the office of Accountant-General should it become vacant—a contingency which was not very likely to occur; but he could not conceive how the business could be conducted without some officer in an analogous position. He might add that in his opinion the present arrangements for the conduct of the business, especially during the long vacation were unreasonable, and required modification and improvement. The whole subject of the organisation of the office was being considered by the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury, and he hoped and believed that some practical conclusion would be come to which would remove the inconveniences to which his hon. friend's question referred.

Friendly Societies.—Mr. Richards moved "That an humble address be presented to her Majesty praying that she will be graciously pleased to issue a royal commission to inquire into the existing state of the law relating to friendly societies." It was felt by those interested in this subject that nothing short of a royal commission would answer the purpose. One large society—the Liver Society of Liverpool—thought legislation necessary, and they even prepared a bill last session, which, however, was not brought forward. The directors of that society would prefer an inquiry by a select committee, but they said that so many remarks had been made on friendly societies in general, and burial societies in particular, that they would offer no opposition to the appointment of a royal commission. As, however, it was not unlikely that a great many discharged servants might make statements injurious to the society, they wished to be represented by counsel in order that the evidence might be thoroughly sifted.—Mr. Hardy said the Registrar of Friendly Societies had stated that out of some 23,000 or 25,000 of them hardly twenty were solvent. After such a statement everyone must admit that the Legislature ought to interfere. Out of the 32,000 in-door paupers upwards of 4,000 had been members of friendly societies, which ought to have provided for them instead of allowing them to go on the parish.—Mr. Bruce, on the part of the Government, said that was impossible, after reading what had been written on this subject by those who had looked very closely into it, not to admit that it required consideration, while there was a general concurrence of opinion that inquiry must precede legislation. It was well worthy of consideration whether building societies should be included in the motion.—Motion agreed to.

The Life at Sea Bill and The Public Prosecutors (Re-committed) Bill were withdrawn.

The Wine and Beerhouse Act (1869) Amendment Bill.—The Lords' amendments were agreed to.

The Game Laws Amendment Bill was withdrawn.

The Stamp Duties Bill.—Amendments considered and agreed to.

The Ecclesiastical Patronage Bill was read a second time.

The Clerical Disabilities Bill.—Amendments considered and agreed to.

July 12.—The Irish Land Bill.—Consideration of the Lords' amendments.—Mr. Gladstone said the Government in effect agreed to all the amendments except the alterations in the scale of compensations, the shortening of the dispensing or alternative lease from thirty-one to twenty-one years, the clause relating to permissive registration of improvements, and certain portions of the clause defining what is and what is not to be considered disturbance by the act of the landlord.—Mr. C. Fortescue moved to disagree with the Lords' amendment of the scale of compensation.—Amendment rejected by a majority of 146 to 55.—Mr. C. Fortescue also obtained the re-insertion of the provision giving the tenant the option of claiming on the lower scale of rent.—Mr. C. Fortescue proposing to agree to the amendment relating to the building of labourers' cottages, Mr. Maguire, Mr. Synan, Mr. Murphy and others opposed it.—The amendment was upheld by a majority of 396 to 29.—In the clause as to length of the lease which shall bar claim, the original term of thirty-one years was substituted for twenty-one, the limit fixed in the House of Lords, by a majority of 262 to 186.—Registration of Improvements: To the clause which the Lords had inserted, Mr. Samuelson proposed an addition requiring the joint action of landlord and tenant, which was adopted by the Government.—Sir Roundell Palmer and Dr. Ball objected that this made the clause inoperative; carried by a majority of 249 to 186, and the amendment thus amended was agreed to.—Definition of disturbance in holding: Mr. Fortescue said that the Government would agree with the Lords in adding "breach of any condition against assignment, subletting, bankruptcy, or insolvency" to the causes of ejectment which are not to be deemed disturbance; but they would not agree to the omission of the words giving the Court the power to decide that they shall be so deemed on special grounds. The first was assented to without opposition, but on the second Mr. Disraeli opposed, and on a division the words struck out by the Lords were restored by a majority of 248 to 171.—The remaining amendments were agreed to.

Forgery.—Mr. Stansfeld introduced a bill further to amend the law relating to indictable offences by forgery.

Repeal of Obsolete or Consolidated Bills.—Mr. Stansfeld introduced a bill.

The Party Processions (Ireland) Bill was, on the order for committee, thrown out by a majority of 121 to 46.

The Absconding Debtors Bill passed through committee.

The Clerical Disabilities Bill.—Third reading carried by a majority of 95 to 18.

July 13.—The Sites for Places of Worship Bill was withdrawn.

The Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill was thrown out on the second reading by a majority of 121 to 90.

The Churchyardens Liabilities Bill was read a second time.

The Burial Bill.—Committee.—Clause 1 (Notice to incumbent of intention to bury in the churchyard without the rites of the Established church).—Mr. Goldney proposed an amendment limiting the operation of the clause to churchyards where the deceased, previously to the passing of the bill, would have had a right of interment.—Mr. G. O. Morgan objected to the amendment, as being unnecessary.—Negated by a majority of 143 to 89.—Mr. Collins moved to omit the words "or graveyards."—Mr. Sclater-Booth proposed an amendment prohibiting the performance of Divine service within the churchyard by other than ministers of the Church of England.—Mr. Baines opposed the amendment.—Mr. Heygate and Mr. O. Gore supported it.—Mr. Cave expressed a hope that it was not proposed to allow Roman Catholics to perform their burial services in the churchyard; if they were there would no doubt be most painful disturbances, as had occurred in the south of England, in consequence of attempts to introduce into a parish churchyard the extravagant services of a body commonly called ritualistic.—

Mr. O. Morgan considered the amendment affected the whole principle of the bill.—Debate adjourned.

REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

The Select Committee appointed to inquire into the law and the administration of the law of compensation for accidents as applied to railway companies, and also to inquire whether any and what precautions ought to be adopted by railway companies with a view to prevent accidents, have agreed to the following report, dated 7th July, 1870:—

Your committee commenced the inquiry entrusted to them by receiving the evidence of several gentlemen acting in different capacities in the management of railways, and hearing from them the defects in the law of which they considered that the railway companies had reason to complain. The committee also, through their chairman, addressed a communication to the chiefs of the courts of common law, requesting the advice and assistance of the judges in the prosecution of the inquiry, and the result is that four judges have given to the committee the benefit of their knowledge and experience.

Application was also made to the Board of Trade, and, in consequence, two of the inspectors who are in the habit of investigating the causes of railway accidents, were deputed by the office, and have given evidence.

It will be convenient, in the first place, to refer to the law upon the subject. The legal liabilities of railway companies for accidents may be divided into two heads. First, the liability to persons who are not passengers, with whom the railway companies have not entered into anything in the nature of a contract; and secondly, the liability of the companies to passengers who have paid for their tickets, and with whom, consequently, the companies have entered into a contract.

It may, however, be observed, that though the liability in the two cases depends upon a different principle of law, the difference in practice, as the law is now administered, is not great, for in each case the liability of companies for injuries caused by the negligence of their servants is unlimited, and in each case the damages (if not made the subject of an agreement) are assessed by a jury. In the case of the person, not a passenger, with whom there is no contract, the liability rests upon the general law, which law is applicable to private individuals as well as to companies, though the railway companies complain that it is administered against them, by the intervention of juries, with much greater severity than it is administered against private individuals.

Under this law a master or employer, whatever care he may have taken in the selection of his servant, is liable to the full extent of any injury done by such servant within the line of his duty. This unlimited liability was, until recent times, considerably modified by another somewhat technical rule of law, to the effect that no action for damages could be maintained after death for an injury done during life; or, as the rule was expressed, actio personalis moritur cum persona.

This modification was abolished in the year 1846 by statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, commonly called Lord Campbell's Act. And it may be observed that this change did not arise from anything connected with railway accidents in particular, but probably from a feeling that the rule rested upon no sound foundation.

One of her Majesty's counsel, examined before the committee, has expressed a strong opinion concerning the injustice of the general law; and submitted that the master ought not to be mulcted in civil damages to any extent for the negligence of a servant except in the same case as that in which he would now be liable criminally, that is to say, when he himself has, by his own negligence or default, contributed to the injury. This view has not, however, been confirmed by the opinion of other witnesses; and though there is some difficulty in giving a reason why a perfectly innocent person should be liable to an unlimited extent for an accident caused by the negligence of his servant, acting (as it might be urged) contrary to his orders, yet your committee do not feel themselves in a position to recommend such an alteration of the law.

The liability, however, of a railway company with respect to passengers, rests upon an implied contract, and it is well worth the consideration of the House whether the present interpretation of this contract is fair to the railway companies or beneficial to the public.

The Railway Commissioners of 1867 thus express themselves on this part of the subject: "On the other hand, it should not be forgotten that there is an important distinction between damages for injuries inflicted by a mere wrongdoer, and for contingencies resulting from the failure to perform a contract which the person injured willingly entered into, knowing that it was attended with a certain risk."

The railway companies complain of the interpretation put by the law upon these contracts with their passengers, and say that the liability imposed upon them bears no relation to the sums paid to them, and that they have no power of charging a higher fare to a passenger with respect to whom they incur a great risk than to a passenger with respect to whom the risk is comparatively small.

It does not seem clear whether a railway company could legally by notice given to such passenger, affect the interpretation the law now puts upon the contract, and thus diminish their liability; but the practical difficulties incident to such a step would probably be found insuperable. The railway companies complain as much (if not more) of the administration of the present law as of the alleged injustice of the law itself. They say that unreasonable and excessive damages are awarded against them by juries, that great frauds are constantly practised upon them, that costs incident to the settlement of claims are made extravagantly high, and that of the very large sums paid by them, partly for costs and partly for damages, a large portion is dissipated, and does no good to the claimants. They say that in the arrangement of claims without the aid of the court, they are prejudiced, and compelled to pay much more than is fair and reasonable by the power which the claimants possess of forcing the company into court, and compelling them to pay the costs on both sides.

Although the evidence given by the judges fails to bear out these complaints to the full extent, your committee are of opinion that many of these complaints are well founded, and that there are objections to the present administration of the law, of which the companies have reason to complain.

The railway companies suggest as a remedy for these evils, that a fixed limit upon the extent of their liability should be imposed by the Legislature, and that persons estimating the risk at a higher sum than that for which the companies are made liable, should be entitled to insure on reasonable terms made obligatory upon the company. The companies further suggest that some change should be made in the nature of the tribunal to adjudicate upon claims, and that the assessment of damages should not be left, as at present, to the decision of a jury.

In support of the suggestion, that a limit should be placed upon the liability, it may be mentioned, in the first place, that in the year 1839, by statute 11 Geo. 4, & 1 Will. 4, c. 8, commonly called the "Carriers Act," the Legislature fixed the sum of £10 as the liability of carriers for the conveyance of goods and parcels, and imposed, when persons who wished to hold the carrier liable for a larger sum, the necessity of paying an additional sum for the conveyance. So, also, in the year 1854, by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31), the liability of railway companies for the carriage of horses, cattle, and sheep was limited, so that a company is now liable only to the extent of £50 for a horse; but the owner of the horse may, if he think fit, increase the liability by declaring the value he puts upon the horse, and paying an additional sum. The two principles contended for by the railway companies—namely, the limit of the liability and the decision of disputed claims by arbitration—have been adopted by the Legislature in the case of what are called workmen's trains. The history of these workmen's trains has been given in evidence before the committee, and it would appear that the experiment has been satisfactory. The theory was, that as the railway companies disturbed a certain number of working people, who were obliged to remove into suburban districts, it was right that the railway companies should place these people in as good a condition as they had formerly been in by giving them the advantage of very cheap conveyance to and from their work.

The railway companies, in accepting this obligation, stipulated in return that the liability with respect to these trains should be limited, and that claims arising in respect of accidents occurring upon these trains should be settled by arbitration. This stipulation was assented to, and it was accordingly enacted, "That the liability of the company under any claim to compensation for injury or otherwise in respect of each passenger travelling with such tickets as aforesaid, shall be limited to a sum not exceeding £100, and the amount of compensation payable in respect of any passenger so injured shall be determined by an arbitrator to be appointed by the Board of Trade, and not otherwise."

The Royal Commissioners in their report recommend that workmen's trains on this principle of limited liability should run in and out of every manufacturing town.

Your committee recommend that facilities should be given for the extension of the system, and that provision should be made to enable railway companies to establish workmen's trains without the necessity of applying to Parliament for the purpose.

With respect to the ordinary traffic of passengers, the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners is in the following terms:—

We recommend that, on the one hand, railway companies should be absolutely responsible for all injuries arising in the conveyance of passengers, except those due to their own negligence; and that, on the other hand, the liability of the railway companies be limited within a maximum amount of compensation for each class of fares.

With respect to these recommendations, your committee propose an alteration in the tribunal before which cases of railway accidents for the future should be heard. They are of opinion that trial by jury does not in these cases work satisfactorily; and they recommend that for the future a court should be established for the trial of these cases without a jury, which would be sufficiently strong to secure the confidence of the public, and which should possess adequate legal experience, and be assisted by engineering and medical advice. They recommend to the careful consideration of her Majesty's Government the best mode of constituting such a tribunal. All disputed claims for damages arising out of railway accidents shall be made to such court, which shall have power, if it thinks fit, to institute an inquiry on the spot.

The costs shall in all cases, when the claimant recovers damages, be borne by the company, except when the company shall have tendered a sum equal to or larger than the sum recovered, in which case the costs shall be in the discretion of the court.

Notices of possible or probable claims shall be given to the company within a limited specified time from the date of the accident; in default thereof no claim shall be established.

Should this tribunal be established, your committee see no reason for altering the present system of unlimited liability. In the event of the tribunal remaining as now, your committee are of opinion that the liability should be limited as follows, viz., in the case of

1st Class Passengers	1,000
3rd " "	300

Your committee further think that if this limitation is conceded, the public should have power of insuring with the company, for an additional sum of £3,000 in the 1st class, £2,000 in the 2nd class, £900 in the 3rd class, at a reasonable charge not exceeding 3d. for £1,000 in the 1st class, 2d. for £500 in the 2nd class, and 1d. for £300 in the 3rd class, for the journey.

[Then follows a recommendation of the block system of signalling, which we omit.]

OBITUARY.

THE LORD JUSTICE GIFFARD.

Those who happened to be in the Lords Justices' Court on the first day of last Michaelmas Term will not have forgotten the simple, unaffected, yet expressive language in which allusion was made by the presiding judge to the death of the Lord Justice Selwyn. The presiding judge was the Lord Justice Giffard, who has now himself been cut off in the prime of life. The Lord Justice was the son of Admiral Giffard, by Susannah, daughter of Sir John Carter, and was born at Portsmouth in 1813. He was educated at Winchester and at New College, Oxford, and was called to the bar in 1840. He was soon well known in the courts of equity, and for many years he was among the very first of the junior counsel at the Chancery bar. It was not until 1859 that he applied for and obtained a silk gown. He attached himself to the court of the present Lord Chancellor, then Vice-Chancellor, Sir William Page Wood, where he proved as successful within as he had been behind the bar. In March, 1868, he was offered and accepted the Vice-Chancellorship, which Sir William Page Wood had vacated on being made Lord Justice, and within ten months afterwards—viz., in December, 1868, he again succeeded Sir William Page Wood as Lord Justice on the promotion of the latter to the Woolsack.

Just after the late Lord Justice was made a Queen's counsel he was seriously ill, and was long absent from court, and though he had apparently recovered his health the recollection of his former illness naturally increased the anxiety of his friends when he was again attacked a few weeks ago. Their anxiety was too well founded. He died on Wednesday, the 13th instant, in the fifty-seventh year of his age.

His numerous clients, his friends at the bar, and those who in any capacity came before him while on the bench, can alike testify to the high legal powers of the Lord Justice Giffard. The present age has witnessed few men more learned in the law, especially in mercantile law, or more quick in applying its principles, and that in no narrow, technical manner, to the facts of a particular case. While a junior he seldom made a speech, and as a leader he never affected display. On the other hand his terse style, ever directed to the real point, was well adapted to argument, and deserved and obtained great weight with the Court, while those who have listened to or perused his judgments know in what precise and forcible language his equally precise and forcible ideas were expressed.

In politics the late Lord Justice was a decided but moderate Liberal. He never sought a seat in Parliament, and he obtained his appointment as Vice-Chancellor from a Conservative Government.

The Lord Justice was no mere lawyer. His refined and cultivated taste, combined with considerable learning in many departments of knowledge, made him an agreeable companion, and long as he will be remembered as a counsel, an advocate, and a judge, still longer will his friends dwell on his social qualities. There are many men at the bar who recall with pleasure the days passed in his pupil-room, the popularity of which was as much due to his kindly manner towards them as it was to the quantity of work to be found in his chambers, and the style in which it was done. He endeared himself to all members of the profession with whom he came in contact, and to know him in private life was justly deemed a privilege. In short, of all who knew him there is not one who, as he mourns over the loss to the profession and the public, does not feel that he has a friend less in the world.

Sir G. M. Giffard was born at his father's official residence in Portsmouth Dockyard, he became a fellow of his college, and married, several years after his call to the bar, Maria, second daughter of Mr. Charles Pilgrim, of Kingfield, Southampton. The Rector of Long Ditton, near Surbiton, is a brother of the late Lord Justice.

MR. SERJEANT KINGLAKE.

John Alexander Kinglake, Esq., Serjeant-at-Law, M.P. for Rochester, and Recorder of Bristol, died on the 8th of July, at his town residence in St. George's-square, after a short illness. He was the son of the late Robert Kinglake, Esq., M.D., of Taunton, by Joanna, daughter of Anthony Apperley, Esq., of Herefordshire, and was born in 1805. He was educated at Eton, and afterwards proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. (twenty-second senior optime) in 1826. In February, 1830, he was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn, and joined the Western Circuit. He had considerable parliamentary practice; and when the present Lord Chief Justice (Sir A. Cockburn) became a member of the House of Commons, much of his parliamentary business fell to the share of Mr. Kinglake, who was largely employed by the late Mr. James Coppock. In 1844 he was created a serjeant-at-law, and in 1849 he received a patent of precedence, to rank after Sir John Rolfe, then Q.C. Serjeant Kinglake was for some time recorder of Exeter, but was appointed recorder of Bristol in 1856. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the representation of Wells in July, 1852, and again in 1855. He was elected for Rochester in April 1857, and he continued to represent that city till his death. On entering the House of Commons he had, of course, to give up his parliamentary practice, and some time afterwards he relinquished to a great extent his practice at Westminster, devoting himself chiefly to the duties of the Bristol recorder-ship, one of the best provincial posts of the kind. He was also a deputy lieutenant and justice of the peace for Somersetshire, and was a member of the Athenæum, Reform, and Oxford and Cambridge Clubs. Mr. Serjeant Kinglake married, in 1835, Louisa Rebecca, only daughter of John Liddon, Esq., of Taunton. His son, Mr. Robert A. Kinglake, who rowed more than once in the Cambridge University Crew, was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in November, 1868. Serjeant Kinglake was a cousin of Mr. A. W. Kinglake, the author of "Eothen," the "Invasion of the Crimea," &c.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

We are requested to state that Mr. George Brash Wheeler is not the Mr. Wheeler who attended the meeting of solicitors held at the Guildhall Coffeehouse last Thursday.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

ANNUAL REPORT of the COUNCIL intended to be submitted to the General Meeting of the Members on July 19, 1870.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS' REMUNERATION BILL.

Before the commencement of the present session, the council had, through the courtesy of Mr. Rathbone, an opportunity of considering the draft of the bill which has now passed both Houses of Parliament, and will, if it receives the Royal assent, in some respects relieve the profession from the injustice arising from an arbitrary system of remuneration.

The bill was introduced in February last by Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Morley, Mr. George Gregory, and Mr. Goldney, and the council have, through Mr. Gregory, been able from time to time to make suggestions upon the subject during the progress of the bill through Parliament.

The measure is very similar to that which was introduced into the House of Lords in the year 1865 by Lord Westbury, at the instance of this society, which measure was, as the members will probably recollect, lost on the second reading by a very slight majority, a result which was attributed to political and other causes, rather than to any serious, or insurmountable objections to the measure itself.

The important principle secured by this bill is, that an attorney or solicitor may make an agreement in writing with his client for remuneration by a gross sum, by a commission, or percentage, or by salary or otherwise; but such agreement may, if unreasonable, be set aside without suit, on motion or petition, by the Court in which the business is done, or by a judge of such court. If however, it appear that the agreement is fair and reasonable, it may be enforced in a summary manner.

Where the agreement is in respect of business done in an action or suit, the amount of it is not to be received by the attorney until the agreement has been examined and allowed by the taxing officer; and if it appears to the taxing officer that the agreement is not fair and reasonable, he may require the opinion of the Court or a judge to be taken, who may reduce the amount of it or order it to be cancelled, and the costs to be taxed in the usual manner.

Agreements may be re-opened, after payment, in certain special cases within twelve months after the payment of the amount agreed for.

No validity is to be given to a purchase by a solicitor of the interest, or any part of the interest, of his client in any suit. Nor is validity to be given to any agreement by which the solicitor stipulates for payment only in the event of success in the suit.

Claims under agreements made under the Act are to be exempt from taxation, except in certain special cases.

It is also provided that solicitors may take security from their clients for future charges or disbursements, to be ascertained by taxation or otherwise, and subject to any General Rules or Orders to be made. Interest may be allowed upon taxation, at such rate and at such times as the taxing officer thinks just, on moneys disbursed by a solicitor for his client, and on moneys of the client in the hands of an attorney or solicitor improperly retained by him.

The bill also contains the much needed provision that the taxing master is, upon any taxation of costs, subject to General Rules or Orders hereafter to be made, to have regard in allowing remuneration to the solicitor for his services, to the skill, labour, and responsibility involved. It is also provided that solicitors may perform all such acts as appertain solely to the office of a proctor in any ecclesiastical court other than the provincial courts of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the diocesan court of the Bishop of London, and may make the same charges as proctors.

THE CONCENTRATION OF THE LAW COURTS AND OFFICES.

At the time of the last annual general meeting, the council were very actively engaged in advocating the adoption of the Carey-street site before the select committee of the House of Commons, to which the scheme for the erection of the new law courts and offices there, and Mr. Layard's proposition for erecting them upon a site between Howard-street and the Thames Embankment, were referred.

The main points upon which evidence was laid before the committee were the comparative advantages offered by the two schemes for the convenience of the public and the legal profession—facility of access—cost of erection—architectural effect—and delay in proceeding with the necessary works. The council alluded to these subjects so fully in their last report that it is not necessary to repeat them here. It is, perhaps, sufficient to state, that after a lengthy and laborious inquiry, the committee reported in favour of the already acquired Carey-street site.

The council, in discharge of their duty to the profession and to the suitors, spared neither time nor expense in bringing this measure to a successful issue before the select committee; and they believe that the committee attached considerable weight to some valuable statistics with respect to the profession, which were collected with great labour by the society, and handed in by Mr. John Young, who also gave other important evidence before the committee. These statistics are printed with the evidence in the appendix to the report of the select committee.

Although the great scheme of concentration which has been promoted by this society for about forty years, has at length been confirmed, and the desired site secured, there is still great cause for complaint in the delay in the commencement of the works. The session of Parliament is now drawing to a close, and as yet the council cannot ascertain that any material progress has been made towards the completion of the plans. Questions as to the cause of delay have been asked, from time to time, of the Government in Parliament, which have received one and the same formal answer, "that the plans are in course of preparation."

The council, however, hope that before Parliament rises, the Government will give a distinct assurance that the matter will no longer be deferred.

THE JUDICATURE COMMISSION.

The council mentioned, in their last report, that they had submitted to the Royal Commissioners suggestions with a view to secure uniformity in the procedure and practice of the several courts; and they stated that many of those suggestions had been adopted by the Commissioners in their first report.

On the 9th October last, the Royal Commission was extended, and in the same month the council and the committee of management of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association re-appointed the Associated Committee of the two societies to consider the additional subjects referred to the Commissioners.

Soon after the appointment of this committee, the council received a communication from the Commissioners, asking for replies to a series of questions on the subject of the practice and jurisdiction of the county courts. Probably many of the members have seen those questions; but as the matter is one of very great importance to the profession, the questions have been printed in the appendix to this report, together with the answers which were returned.

At the time that the council forwarded to the Commissioners the above answers, they also sent to them some observations of Mr. William Williams, a member of the council, on the subject of the proposed extension of the county court jurisdiction; and these observations are also printed in the appendix.

The council may here state, that the associated committee in framing the answers to the questions, did not rely only on their own experience, but they obtained valuable information and assistance from several members of the profession who had had practical experience of the working of the county court system; and also from the registrars and other officers of some of the metropolitan county courts.

Subsequently some members of the council, and a London solicitor of considerable experience in county court practice, attended at the invitation of the Judicature Commissioners, and gave evidence before them as to the working of the county courts with their present jurisdiction, and more particularly as to the inexpediency of the proposed extension of their jurisdiction.

The effect of the evidence may be thus shortly stated. As to the working of the county courts with their present jurisdiction, it was shown that the great evils which impeded, and to a certain extent destroyed their efficiency, were these: First, the want of a system of judgment by default, the effect of which is that every case (with a very limited exception introduced by the County Court Amendment Act, 1867) is treated as a defended case, and the plaintiffs are most vexatiously put to the expense of attending with their witnesses, and sometimes with an attorney, to establish a claim that is not questioned. Secondly, the compelling plaintiffs as a general rule to sue the defendants in their district, however distant. Thirdly, the insufficient scale of remuneration to solicitors and counsel, the result of which is, that suitors have to provide themselves with professional assistance (which, in a large number of cases, is indispensable) practically at their own expense. And lastly, the absence of means of making interlocutory applications. It was shown that these evils were so seriously felt, that it appeared from information obtained by the council, that wholesale houses in London had found it impracticable to attempt to recover debts under £20 due from debtors residing at a distance. As to the proposed extension of the jurisdiction of the county courts, it was shown that in addition to the above objections, and assuming some of them to be capable of remedy to a certain extent, yet that there were several very serious evils inherent in the county courts which could not be removed, and which must make those courts unfit for the trial of causes more important than those to which their jurisdiction at present extends. Of these objections, the more important were the following:—1st. The want of a judge, or other officer constantly accessible for interlocutory applications, such as orders for particulars, for inspection, for interrogatories, for change of venue, to amend, and the like. 2nd. The difficulty that must arise where both the litigants should not happen to reside in the same town, in compelling one party to employ a strange attorney and counsel, an evil that does not arise as to the superior courts in London, where every country attorney is represented by his regular agent. 3rd. The want of uniformity of law and practice necessarily inherent in isolated local courts. 4th. The want of pleadings defining and limiting the issue to be tried. 5th. The impossibility of preserving a high tone, either in the court or the practitioners, where the large bulk of the business consists of settling disputes of very small amount, conducted in person by the very humblest classes. And lastly, there was urged upon the Commissioners the general impossibility of constructing out of these courts, which were based upon the practice and traditions of the old courts of request, courts capable of satisfactorily disposing of the more important questions of law and fact, which are at present very satisfactorily dealt with in the Courts at Westminster.

It was suggested that, instead of extending the jurisdiction of the county courts by making them courts of first instance, the alteration should be in exactly the opposite direction, by giving to the superior courts the power, after issue joined, of sending all cases under a certain amount, and not involving difficulty, to the county courts for trial. This would give to suitors all the benefits of the superior courts, in the opportunity for interlocutory applications, for raising the issue by pleadings, and in the advantages of centralisation; but it would enable them to try the issue, when raised, at small expense, in the most convenient locality, and before a tribunal generally more satisfactory for the purpose than a common jury.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE AND APPELLATE JURISDICTION BILLS.

A copy of the first report of the Judicature Commission was forwarded last year to each member of the society; and it will be remembered that one of the chief features of this report was a recommendation that there should be a general fusion of the separate jurisdictions now exercised by the superior courts of law and equity. This session a bill was introduced by the Lord Chancellor into the House of Lords, under the title of the High Court of Justice Bill. The council were anxious to support this bill, so far as it had for its objects:—Firstly, the abolition of conflicting jurisdictions of the superior courts, by giving to each court all the jurisdiction exercised by the superior courts. Secondly, the establishment of the principle that equity, where it conflicts with common law, shall prevail, and shall qualify and modify the latter. And, thirdly, the assimilation, so far as is practicable, of the practice in all the branches of the superior courts.

These views, supported as they were by all the weight of the authority due to the report of the Judicature Commission, were, in accordance with the suggestions and recommendations of the associated committee of the Incorporated Law Society and the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, communicated by the Council to the Judicature Commission. But, although the council concurred in the general scheme and object of the bill, yet it appeared to them that the bill was open to great objections in many most important points of its details; and to these the council thought it desirable to direct the attention of the Legislature, in a petition which they addressed to the House of Lords, and which was presented by Lord Cairns. As the main object sought by the council, by this petition, was ultimately attained by an arrangement between the Lord Chancellor and Lord Cairns, it will be sufficient here only to state, shortly, that the objections urged by the council to the bill, in its then form, were as follows:—

That the bill proposed to deal with this important measure, effecting a radical change in the whole administration of justice, in an imperfect manner, leaving, not merely the minor details (which the council were aware could not be conveniently dealt with by inflexible enactments), but some of the most important features of the measure to be worked out by rules of court, which it was proposed should embrace some of the most vital and important branches of the administration of the law, as, for example, whether measures of the highest importance to suitors should be heard by a full court, or by a single judge in chambers; whether suitors should have issues affecting their fortunes, or their characters, in certain cases tried by a jury; whether such rights should be determined by the Court of Justice, or by an accountant or man of science; and numerous other equally important questions relating to the administration of justice. That such delegation by Parliament of its functions to persons however high in authority, not in Parliament, is unconstitutional and objectionable in all cases, and particularly so in a subject of such high importance as the administration of justice.

Particular attention was directed to the fact, that special jurisdiction and procedure have of late years been created and regulated in the courts of common law by the Uniformity of Process Act, the Common Law Procedure Acts, the Railway Traffic Acts, and other Acts; and in the courts of chancery, by the Joint Stock Companies Act; the Trustee Acts, and numerous Acts relating to the fortunes of infants, and other measures, all of which have been the fruit of careful and deliberate legislation; but the provisions of any of which, however carefully framed, might be unintentionally repealed without the consent of Parliament, by the exercise of the proposed delegated powers of making rules and orders.

The council also objected most strongly to the proposal to give the Court the power of compulsorily referring questions in difference to accountants or scientific or other special persons, and though admitting that in some cases accountants or scientific persons might assist the court by inquiries and reports, the council expressed their belief that the masters of the common law courts, or the chief clerks in chancery, are much better qualified than accountants to deal with accounts, from their being accustomed to test the accuracy of evidence. But they most strongly objected to the proposed power of referring questions of fact compulsorily, and without appeal to any persons, but least of all to persons who have not had the advantage of a legal education.

TRANSFER OF LAND.

The council in their report last year stated the purport of the answers they had given to the questions issued by the Royal commission appointed in April, 1868.

That commission made its report in November, 1869, and whilst recognising the non-success of Lord Westbury's Act of 1862, it confirmed the opinion which the council had expressed, that the working of that Act had not been impeded by solicitors, on the ground that it was opposed to their interests.

That Royal Commissioners did not take into consideration the expediency of establishing a system of registration, as the principle had already been adopted by Parliament; but they confined themselves, after hearing evidence on the working of the Act of 1862, to making suggestions for its alteration and improvement,—amongst other suggestions, relaxing the necessity for registering, in all cases, an indefeasible title under the existing system, and giving liberty to an owner to register a title, not necessarily marketable, as from a date of his own choice.

In March last, the Lord Chancellor introduced a bill incorporating therein many of the suggestions of the Commissioners; but the bill also contains a clause which makes the registration of the ownership of the fee compulsory upon any sale of land after the expiration of two years from the passing of the Act.

The persons who may apply for registration are—

"(1.) Any person who has contracted to buy an estate in fee simple in land, whether subject or not to incumbrances.

"(2.) Any person entitled for his own benefit at law or in equity to an estate in fee simple in land, whether subject or not to incumbrances.

"(3.) Any person capable, either alone or with the consent of other persons, of disposing, by way of absolute sale, of an estate in fee simple in land, whether subject or not to incumbrances."

The bill also provides for a registration of charges on land.

Although there is little probability of the bill passing in the present session, the council thought it right to communicate with the provincial law societies, and with numerous country solicitors, in order to elicit an expression of opinion from solicitors largely concerned in conveyancing business in the country; and, as far as the council have at present ascertained, not a single society or solicitor is in favour of the bill as drawn. They consider that the compulsory clause (45) is objectionable, and, as drawn, impracticable, inasmuch as no undivided interests in land are recognised by the bill.

That the registration in London of all transfers of land would be most inconvenient in country transactions, which are very frequently required to be carried through immediately, and without the delay and expense of previously searching the register.

And that the inevitable effect of one central registry would be to increase the expense of dealing with land in almost every instance.

There is a general condemnation of the recognition of "agents," if that expression is intended to include persons not duly qualified to act as attorneys and solicitors.

It is also an objection to the measure, that its operation will depend very largely upon the rules which remain to be published.

The council are now engaged in preparing observations on the bill with a view to its improvement.

STAMPS ON BUILDING LEASES.

The profession were much surprised to learn that in November last the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, in adjudicating upon the duty on a lease* for ninety-nine years, at the yearly rent of £33 12s., and containing a covenant by the lessee to complete a partly-erected house, decided, contrary to the construction put upon the Act of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, ever since it was passed in 1854, that such lease not only was liable to the ad valorem duty on the rent, but required also a common deed stamp of £1 15s., under section 16 of that Act, in respect of the covenant to complete the house; such covenant being treated as a "further or other valuable consideration" under the terms of that section.

This decision was afterwards affirmed on appeal to the Court of Exchequer; but the council, in common with the profession generally, entertained so strong an opinion that this construction was not in accordance with the intention of the framers of the Act, that they at once memorialised the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject.

They urged that section 16 of the Act of 1854 applied only to conveyances, and deeds of that character, and that the increased ad valorem duty imposed by the same Act on leases for terms of between 35 and 100 years expressly pointed at building leases, in which there is invariably a further consideration beyond the rent; and that it was evident that the ad valorem duty in such leases was by the Act made six times higher than the duty on other leases, in order to cover this further consideration; and also that, if it had been intended to impose a new duty on so important and well-defined a class of deeds as building leases, it would have been done by express language, in its proper place in the schedule, and not by ambiguous and inferential language in the body of the Act, in a section apparently applicable to conveyances.

The council also pointed out, that according to the principle of the decision of the Court of Exchequer, the judges might, and that it was very probable, on the ground of logical consistency, that they would, at a future day, if the question were brought before them, hold that covenants to repair, to insure, not to carry on particular trades, and other covenants usually inserted in leases form such an additional valuable consideration as to render the 35s. stamp necessary; and that such a decision would render every lease in England granted since the Act of 1854 liable to a penalty. The council therefore urged the Chancellor of the Exchequer to introduce into Parliament a bill to declare that no lease should be deemed to be improperly stamped by reason of the same not having been stamped in accordance with the requirements of section 16 of the above-mentioned Act of Parliament, and to relieve from penalties all persons who had not, so far as regards leases, complied with the terms of such section; and also either to repeal the latter part of the section, or to amend it in such a manner as to render it not applicable to leases. And that all duties paid in consequence of the decision in Boulton's case should be refunded on application.

At the request of the council, the Chancellor of the Exchequer received a deputation from their body, when he expressed his opinion that the decision of the Court of Exchequer was so clearly right as to preclude any argument as to the intention of the Act, and no satisfactory assurance of a change being introduced could be obtained from him.

A letter was thereupon addressed to him repeating the views of the council and intimating that the matter would at once be brought before Parliament.

Accordingly, the council placed themselves in communication with the Honourable Robert Bourke, member for King's Lynn. Mr. Bourke immediately, in an able and lucid manner, explained the matter to the House, when a very general and decided opinion was expressed in favour of the relief sought by the prayer of the memorial.

The council had previously communicated with numerous country solicitors, and with all the provincial law societies, and had taken active measures to bring the matter prominently before the House. The Government, yielding to this pressure, promised to introduce a clause in their intended bill for dealing with the whole subject of the stamp laws.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, on being further pressed, on account of the daily difficulties occurring with regard to leases, introduced a separate bill, under which it was proposed to indemnify past transactions up to a certain date, but to impose a duty of 10s. in place of the 35s. stamp under the Act of 17 & 18 Vict. upon subsequent leases.

Very great objection was raised to the proposed imposition of the 10s. duty, and Mr. Bourke, therefore, on urgent solicitation from all parts of the country, moved, as an amendment in committee on the bill, to the effect that the duty should not be held to apply in cases of this kind, either past or future.

Although the council felt that it was not within their functions to interfere with the purely fiscal part of the question, the amendment proposed by Mr. Bourke seemed so much better adapted to meet the justice of the case than the Government measure, that they procured for Mr. Bourke numerous promises of support. So much hesitation was, however, shown by the Government in proceeding with their bill, that the council, with the aid of Mr. Bourke, converted his amendment into a substantive bill which he introduced.

Eventually, however, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to a certain extent, adopted the principle of Mr. Bourke's suggestions, by passing through the House of Commons a bill containing a single clause, which is as follows:—

"No lease already made, or hereafter to be made, for any consideration or considerations in respect whereof it is chargeable with ad valorem stamp duty, and in further consideration either of a covenant by the lessee to make, or of his having previously made, any substantial improvement of or addition to the property demised to him, or of any usual covenant, shall be deemed to be or to have been chargeable with any stamp duty in respect of such further consideration."

This clause is not so satisfactory as the bill brought in by Mr. Bourke, which proposed to declare that section 16 of the Act of 1854 was not to apply to leases; and, moreover, the words "or of any usual covenant" introduce an element of doubt, since the Act of 1854 may still render leases liable to the additional stamp in those cases where any covenant not coming under the strict term "usual" is inserted.

The council, therefore, are still endeavouring to procure, in the House of Lords, an amendment which will remove the ambiguous phrase "usual covenant," and substitute for it the language of Mr. Bourke's Bill, viz., "any covenant relating to the subject-matter of the lease."

STAMP DUTIES BILL.

In May last the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought into the House of Commons a new Stamp Duties Bill, which was ordered to be printed on the 20th of that month. The second reading was fixed for the 30th of May. As soon as the council could obtain copies of the bill, which had never been submitted to them for consideration, and upon which they had not been in any way consulted, they gave it their careful attention, and found that it contained many new principles of law and objectionable provisions; and they drew out a few observations on some of the prominent objections, to assist Mr. George Gregory and other members of Parliament in endeavouring to get the Chancellor of the Exchequer to allow more time than he seemed disposed to afford, for the consideration of the bill by the profession and the public. The bill was brought in professedly as a consolidation bill, but it was pointed out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it was by no means of that simple character. For instance, by clause 8 any instrument having several distinct operations was to be separately charged, so that a conveyance operating partly by appointment, and partly by grant, might require two stamps; and by clause 10 all the facts and circumstances affecting the liability of any instrument to duty, were to be fully set forth in the instrument, under a penalty, on persons executing and all persons employed in preparing it, of £50. Again, by clause 17 any instrument not duly stamped was not to be available "for any purpose or upon any occasion whatsoever;" and by clause 126 not only was a new duty imposed on trust money invested in real estate when put into settlement, but the provision for assessing the stamp might involve the investigation of trust accounts extending over thirty years or more, and was incapable of being practically carried into effect except in the most simple case.

Mr. George Jenkins, the conveyancer, was afterwards employed by the council to prepare objections and suggestions for alterations in the bill, and these were submitted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Solicitor to the Inland Revenue Office; but, owing to the short time allowed for consideration of the bill, and the numerous existing Acts referred to, it was impossible to enter into all points of objection. A long discussion took place between some of the officers at the Inland Revenue Office and members of the council. Eventually, Mr. Jessel succeeded in inducing the Chancellor of the Exchequer to undertake to get the bill amended and reprinted before being brought into the committee, and to promise that the bill should be a mere consolidation bill, except so far as any alterations which he might make should not be objected to.

The council expect shortly to obtain a print of the amended bill, when it will have their careful consideration.

The bill has (by referring to the existing Acts for the purpose of consolidation) brought prominently forward a great many objections to the law in regard to stamps as it now stands, but the council are unable in the present session, to do more than assist in obtaining a consolidation bill, with such amendments as may be agreed on with the Chancellor of the Exchequer; leaving to a future period the question what alterations should take place in the general law of stamps. It will be much easier to discuss these questions when the consolidation Act is passed.

LAW ASSOCIATION FOR THE BENEFIT OF WIDOWS AND FAMILIES OF PROFESSIONAL MEN IN THE METROPOLIS AND VICINITY.

At the usual monthly meeting, held at the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, on Thursday, the 7th inst, the ordinary business was transacted, and the proposed new rules which had been referred back to the directors by the adjourned annual general court were again considered.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Trinity Term, 1870.

FINAL EXAMINATION.

At the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors of the superior courts, the examiners recommended the following gentlemen, under the age of 26, as being entitled to honorary distinction :—

1. Frederick Huxley, who served his clerkship to Mr. Thomas Lister Farrar, of Manchester.
2. Henry Claud Lisle, who served his clerkship to Mr. Frederick Chetwode Hoskins Bellyse, of Audlem.
3. Edward Cripps, jun., who served his clerkship to Mr. John Ingram, of Steyning; and Messrs. Burton, Yeates, & Hart, of London.
4. George Richard Wace, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Wace, of Shrewsbury; and Messrs. Woodcock & Ryland, of London.
5. Apsley Petro Peter, who served his clerkship to Mr. Richard Peter, of Launceston; and Messrs. Childs & Batten, of London.
6. Wotton Ward Isaacson, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Pidcock & Son, of Worcester; and Messrs. Taylor, Mason, & Taylor, of London.
7. Edward Athow Field, B.A., who served his clerkship to Mr. Edward Field, of Norwich; and Messrs. Williamson, Hill, & Co., of London.

The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have accordingly awarded the following prizes of books :—

To Mr. Huxley, the prize of the Honourable Society of Clifford's-inn.

To Mr. Lisle, the prize of the Honourable Society of New-inn.

To Mr. Cripps, Mr. Wace, Mr. Peter, Mr. Isaacson, and Mr. Field, prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

The examiners also certified that the following candidates, under the age of 26, whose names are placed in alphabetical order, passed examinations which entitle them to commendation :—

Godfrey Alexander Baker, B.A., who served his clerkship to Messrs. Cookson, Wainwright, Pennington, & Wainwright, of London.

William Martin Best, who served his clerkship to Mr. John George Thompson, of Stockton-on-Tees.

John Isaacs, jun., who served his clerkship to Mr. John Patrick Murrough, of London.

George Brewis McQueen, who served his clerkship to Mr. George Brewis, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne; and Messrs. Chartres & Youll, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

Lionel Nicholas Walford, who served his clerkship to Mr. Herbert Henry Walford, of London; and Messrs. Frere, Cholmeley, Foster & Frere, of London.

Harry Woodward, who served his clerkship to Mr. John Harry Jonathan Woodward, of March; and Messrs. Ravenscroft & Hills, of London.

The Council have accordingly awarded them certificates of merit.

The examiners further announced to the following candidate that his answers to the questions at the examination were highly satisfactory, and would have entitled him to a certificate of merit if he had not been above the age of twenty-six :—

James Mason Allen, who served his clerkship to Mr. David William Heath, of Nottingham; and Messrs. G. L. P. Eyre & Co., of London.

The number of candidates examined in this term was 165 of these 153 passed and 12 were postponed.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATIONS BEFORE ENTERING INTO ARTICLES OF CLERKSHIP TO ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS.

This examination took place on the 13th and 14th inst., at the new Examination Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, London, and at Birmingham, Bristol, Exeter, Leeds, Liverpool, and Newcastle-on-Tyne.

COURT PAPERS.

COMMON LAW BUSINESS AT THE JUDGES' CHAMBERS.

The following regulations for transacting the business at the judges' chambers will be observed until further notice :— All affidavits will be sworn at the chambers of the Lord Chief Justice of England.

Acknowledgments of deeds will be taken at eleven o'clock precisely.

Adjourned summonses before the judge will be heard at a quarter past eleven, and Summonses of the day immediately afterwards, according to number.

Counsel will be heard at half-past twelve o'clock.

Before the masters, adjourned summonses will be heard at eleven o'clock precisely, the summonses of the day immediately afterwards, and counsel at twelve o'clock.

The judge directs particular attention to the rule of Michaelmas Term, 1867, and desires it should be distinctly understood that he will not hear any summons or application directed by the said rule to be heard by the masters.

CHANCERY ORDER.

General Petition Day.—Vice-Chancellor Stuart and Vice-Chancellor Malins, July 22; the Master of the Rolls and Vice-Chancellor Bacon, July 23.

Last seal, July 29.

Last day for taking in stock orders at the Accountant-General's, Aug. 6.

Last day for taking in money orders, Aug. 9.

To expedite the completion of "money orders," the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellors will allow a limited number of unopposed petitions dealing with stock or cash in the hands of the Accountant-General to be placed at the head of the paper on each day during the intervals between the general petition day and the last seal.

R. H. LEACH, Senior Registrar.

The clerkship of the burial board of Lambeth parish is about to become vacant by the retirement of Mr. Wonley.

Mr. Edward Smirke, barrister-at-law, has resigned the appointment of Vice-Warden of the Stannaries of Devon and Cornwall, which is worth £1,500 per annum, and is in the gift of the Prince of Wales, as Duke of Cornwall.

Mr. Jacob Henry Tillett, solicitor, has been elected to represent the city of Norwich in Parliament, and took his seat in the House of Commons on the 14th. Mr. Tillett was admitted in 1839, and was formerly clerk to the Commissioners of Income Tax for Norwich. The rival candidate was Mr. J. W. Huddleston, Q.C., formerly M.P. for Canterbury. Mr. Tillett was unsuccessful at the general election in November, 1868. It is stated that his return will be petitioned against.

THE RECORDERSHIP OF BRISTOL.—Among the men of mark who have formerly been recorders of Bristol, may be mentioned the late Lord Lyndhurst, Sir Charles Wetherell, Mr. Justice Crowder, and the present Lord Chief Justice Cockburn.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The money market news of the week may be summarised by saying that the mutual attitude of France and Spain occasioned a panic early in the week; later a reaction took place, and then a heavy relapse. Nothing remains for us to say, except to point out that if people sell out one thing they must buy another, unless they mean to "tie up" their money in stock, and that such securities as colonial loans and English Railways, &c., are scarcely likely to be physically affected by war between France and Prussia.

IMPORTANT DECISION.—A decision of considerable importance, involving as it does, the question of liability of ship-owners for ocean-borne goods when entered in bond, has recently been rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States. It appears that an importer of this city brought an action against the Liverpool, New York, and Philadelphia Steamship Company to recover the value of one of twenty-three cases of merchandise shipped from Ireland to this port. The duties were not paid, but the goods were entered in bond by consignee for a designated warehouse, and permit delivered to a carman, who usually performed plaintiff's cartage, and was at the same time a licensed United States Customs carman. The usual notice of unloading of the ship was published and brought home to both the consignee and customs authorities. The whole twenty-three cases were proved to have been delivered over the vessel's side on the usual wharf, and were checked both by a clerk of defendants and one or two customs officers who were stationed there, and the goods were virtually placed under the latter's control and direction. One of the cases was subsequently lost; how or where was not ascertained. It was claimed by plaintiff that defendants were bound to watch and take care of the case until it was entirely off the wharf, and receipt obtained for it by the usual employé of the defendants stationed at the end of the wharf. The defendants claimed that the liability as carriers was discharged the moment they passed the goods over to the United States authorities, whom the plaintiff, by not paying duty, had virtually constituted his agents to receive the goods, under the United States laws and Treasury regulations. The referee, before whom the case was tried, held the defendants liable. The case was then carried to the United States Supreme Court, where, at the late general term, the judgment was reversed. Judge Brady, dissenting, held that the defendants, to remove their liability, should have proved affirmatively that the goods were discharged in the day-time. The majority of the Court, however, held that in this case, that question was immaterial, inasmuch as the missing package contained dutiable goods, and that, under the United States statutes and Treasury regulations the customs authorities were the only persons authorised to receive such goods on the wharf; and it appearing that they did so receive this package, with its reception by them, whether in the day or night-time, the liability of the defendants terminated. This decision is in accordance with equity and fair dealing, and as it involves a question which has frequently given rise to vexatious and expensive litigation, it will be hailed with satisfaction by shipowners and agents.—New York Shipping List.

A woman in Illinois, preparing herself for the bar, called recently at the Law-book House of E. B. Myers, in Chicago, purchased six hundred and fifty dollars worth of law books, paid five hundred dollars down, and the balance upon the delivery of the books. Since this purchase, Mr. Myers says he is in favour of women being admitted to the bar, and believes he would vote to give them the right of suffrage.—Chicago Legal News.

CONJUGAL SEPARATION IN FRANCE.—A report of judicial statistics recently made by the French Minister shows that applications for separation de corps have largely increased of late years. In 1857 the total number of such applications throughout the whole of France was only 1,191, while in 1868 it reached no less a total than 3,000. The courts granted the applications in the proportion of 89 per cent. In 2,683 cases the wife was the plaintiff, and only 316 applications were at the instance of the husband.—Times.

TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY.—An American law newspaper reports a probate case in which a great number of witnesses were called to prove a testator incapable of making a will. The Court observed:—The witnesses for contestants had very curious notions as to what constitutes testamentary capacity. One says, he was spiritually blind; another that he was disconnected in conversation, and as an instance, says, that "he would talk about what people ought to do, and then never do it himself;" another, that "what was strange in his conversation about selling his property, was the enormous price he asked for it . . . eight hundred dollars an acre;" another, that he would fly from one thing to another not connected with it. G. W. Scattergood says, he would talk strangely, sometimes he would say, "he had seven and-a-half acres, sometimes seven and three-quarter acres, and sometimes seven and-a-quarter acres." Peter Castor says, that his "idea is, that a man incapable of doing business is incapable of making a will." The case is gravely reported with the head-note—Testamentary Capacity is Not to be Determined by the Notions or Ideas of Witnesses!

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT.

Amsterdam Exhibition, 1869. First Prize, being above the Gold Medal. Supplied to the British, French, Prussian, Russian, Italian, Dutch, and other Governments. Dr. Lankester writes regarding Extract of Meat:—"But there is a difference in flavour, and here, as in all other kinds of food, it is the flavour that makes the quality." It is essentially on account of the fine meaty flavour, as distinguished from the burnt taste of other Extracts, the LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT defeated all Australian and other sorts at Paris, Havre and Amsterdam, and is so universally preferred in all European markets.

One pint of fine-flavoured Beef-tea at 2½d. Most convenient and economic "stock."

CUTION.—Require Baron Liebig's, the inventor's, signature on every Jar, and ask distinctly for LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT.

In one volume, crown 8vo, price 3s.

LONDON, JULY 23, 1870.

THE MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY BILL has been returned by the Select Committee of the House of Lords in such a form that, to use a popular expression, "its own mother would not know it; again." In fact, the whole bill has disappeared, and instead we have a number of isolated provisions dealing with particular cases of admitted hardship, but leaving the general law outside those particular cases quite untouched. We quite agree with Lord Houghton that this is a bill "founded on a total absence of principle," but in that respect it is in accordance with most of our remedial legislation. As we entirely disapproved of the principle contained in the bill as it was sent up to their Lordships, we cannot regret that that principle has been negatived; and, as a temporary expedient, until some satisfactory principle can be determined upon, we are glad to accept the bill in its altered form, as removing some of the most obvious evils of the present law, without introducing, at least to any appreciable extent, the objectionable features of the original bill. But we still hope at no very distant period to see that true rational principle established which has for nearly a century been the governing principle in a large part of Europe, and which has been already advocated on more than one occasion in these columns.

Since the bill passed through committee we have learned that Lord Romilly has succeeded in introducing on the report an amendment in accordance with his Lordship's own constant practice, settling on the married woman the whole of any legacy under £200 which may be bequeathed to her generally. We have no objection to this. It was urged that when the testator has not chosen to say that the fund should be settled, the law ought not to settle it; but the obvious answer is that this is already done whenever the aid of the Court of Chancery has to be invoked by the husband, and the present Lord Chancellor has directed, in Re Swan (12 W. R. 738, 2 H. & M. 34), that the money may be paid into court by the executor for the mere purpose of having it so settled. Surely then it is but right to make the settlement matter of law, without this circuitous and expensive procedure for the purpose.

THE GOVERNMENT INTEND to introduce a bill "to amend the neutrality laws," by which, of course, is meant, not the international law of neutrality, which can only be dealt with by international convention, but those statutes (Foreign Enlistment Acts, &c.) by which the British Legislature has endeavoured to guide British subjects into compliance with the terms of the conventions by which the subject is regulated. It is, of course, important that in such a time as the present our legislation of this description should be as complete as possible. With respect to "contraband of war," a most important topic to the shipping and mercantile interest, the Government decline the responsibility of a definition. Practically, it is for the Prize Court of the capturing flag to say what is contraband of war in the individual case. In the present days of steam navigation coal would probably be considered contraband, and such was the view adopted by the Foreign Office in 1859, in a letter of advice quoted by Mr. Gladstone on Thursday evening last.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR'S BILL for the Improvement of the Judicial Committee is not, we fear, well calculated to effect the object for which it was avowedly introduced. The bill, in our opinion, does at once too much and too little. It does too little because, instead of enabling every Privy Councillor, whose previous training might be presumed to have fitted him for the task, to advise the Crown as to the exercise of its appellate prerogative, it merely empowers the Crown to add a further limited number to the two persons who can at present be arbitrarily appointed members of the Committee. This seems to us faulty in principle as well as inexpedient. The Privy Councillors are her Majesty's highest and most trusted advisers, and their ranks are continually recruited from amongst those who bear or have borne the highest places in all the different walks of life, and the position of a Privy Councillor ought of itself to be considered sufficient qualification for a member of this Committee, if only that position has been attained by reason of "judicial" services of any kind. The guaranty that no unqualified persons shall be found sitting on this Committee should be sought in the exclusion of all persons below the rank of Privy Councillors, not in the arbitrary selection of a limited number from amongst those equally eligible. Granted that no one should be a member of this Committee who is not a "judicial" member of the Privy Council—i.e., unless he holds, or has held, some high judicial or quasi-judicial office; nay more, unless his appointment as a Privy Councillor was directly consequent upon his tenure of such office—surely it might be assumed that no such person would be sworn on the Privy Council unless either his personal qualifications or the office which he filled was sufficient to entitle him to take rank with the colleagues whom he would find there. As the bill is drawn, the Committee will still consist of an unlimited number of purely English judges and ex-judges; while the number of judges representing all the rest of the empire, and particularly the colonies (who never could, in the nature of things, be very numerously represented there) is still so arbitrarily confined as to render it not impossible that services of the highest value may from time to time have to be dispensed with merely from want of room on the Committee. And yet the universality, so to speak, of the Committee, and the power of employing the most distinguished services, wherever found, constitutes one of its principal claims to the confidence and obedience of the colonial tribunals.

Again, the bill seems to us to do too little, in confining the number of sub-committees which may sit at one time to two. Provided always that not less than three members sit on each sub-committee, there can be no good reason why the number of such sub-committees sitting at once should be limited at all, for there is certainly no ground for supposing that any such limitation would tend to strengthen the committee or committees actually sitting; on the contrary, experience shows beyond controversy that not more than three members would attend, as a general rule, even though but a single Court should be formed. Surely, then, the bill might well have left the Committee power to form as many divisions as it could whenever there was sufficient pressure of business to call for sub-division at all.

On the other hand the bill, so niggardly with reference to Indian and colonial judges, contains a provision enabling the Crown to appoint any barrister of fifteen years standing, (which means, we presume, though it is not so stated, at the bar of England,) who might happen to have been made a Privy Councillor, a member of this Committee, although he might never have held any judicial office at all, or even been entrusted with a solitary brief in his whole career. He might have been sworn of the Privy Council because he had inherited a peerage, or on account of high political claims; he might, for instance, be Chancellor of the Exchequer, or a Secretary of State, and thereupon, if only he had been called to the bar fifteen years before, though he had never even attempted to practice, he is to be eligible to be appointed a member of a court of appeal of the highest dignity and power. This clearly ought not so to be.

Finally, we conceive that the idea of paying salaries to the members of the Committee is a grave mistake. The dignity of the Court is a large part of its efficiency, and that dignity depends, we think, very much on the fact that these are the constitutional advisers of the Crown directing the sovereign in the exercise of one of her highest prerogatives; a fact which would inevitably be lost sight of in the decisions of a court mainly composed, as it would inevitably become, of salaried judges. If it be found by experience, as may be the case, that without some pecuniary inducement sufficient regularity of attendance cannot be obtained, it would, we think, be far better to set about this by some graduated scale of pension, to be regulated according as the member did or did not attend with regularity the sittings of the Committee, than, by creating a class of paid judges, to lower the status of the court, and eventually, in all probability, destroy its prestige. Moreover it cannot be doubted that from the time the paid judges began to sit, the attendance of the unpaid members would fall away, till at no distant period all that is distinctive in the Judicial Committee would be lost, and we should merely have added another, and by no means judiciously, to the regular paid courts of the country.

IT HAS BEEN UNDERSTOOD that a petition would be presented in reference to the late Norwich election, praying that the election of Mr. Tillet might be declared void, and claiming the seat for Mr. Huddleston.

The time for presentation has not yet expired, and we have no information beyond the reports in circulation. Supposing, however, that the facts relied on by the petition if presented should be those referred to in the opinion of Mr. Mellish and Mr. Barstow which has been published, we must doubt its success.

We may assume for our present purpose that the facts proved to the satisfaction of the Royal Commissioners could if necessary be proved again, and that, therefore, it would turn out that Mr. Tillet did in 1868 make payments to secure the show of hands at the nomination. Of course, in a proceeding to which he was a party, Mr. Tillet might be able to put a different interpretation on the affair. If, however, he did make such payments we have little doubt it amounted to bribery within the meaning of the Acts. Upon this point the opinion of counsel is clear, and we see no reason to doubt it. Indeed, after the recent decision in the Bristol case it seems impossible to do so. It appears, however, to be assumed in the opinion of the public that if Mr. Tillet was guilty of bribery as a candidate for Norwich in 1868, he is necessarily disqualified to become a candidate in 1870, during the same Parliament. We think that is not so. By the Common Law of Parliament bribery at a particular election disqualifies for that election, but it is only by statute, if at all, that bribery at one election can be a disqualification at a subsequent one. On reference to the statutes it will be seen that the disqualification does not depend upon the candidate's having been guilty of bribery, but upon his having been reported to be so by particular specified tribunals.

By the 36th section of the Act of 1854 a candidate reported guilty of bribery by a committee of the House of Commons was disqualified for sitting for the same place in the same Parliament. By the 46th section of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, it is declared that the report of a judge trying an election petition shall have the same effect. There is, however, no section giving this effect to the report of commissioners, or imposing the disqualification on the candidate generally and independently of the manner of detection of his guilt, or even upon his conviction upon indictment. Curiously enough, however, the 44th section of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, disqualifies candidates who employ as agents or canvassers persons whom they know to have been reported by Royal Commissioners as guilty of corrupt practices. Mr. Tillet, therefore, though apparently not disqualified to be a principal was disqualified from being an agent or canvasser on the ground of his having been reported by the Commissioners. He probably canvassed for himself and he no doubt knew that he had been so reported, but we apprehend he cannot be said to have employed himself as a canvasser on his own behalf, so as to come within the meaning of this section. If he employed any other person who had been associated with him on the previous occasion and had also been reported, the case would be different.

Supposing, however, that a petitioner succeeded in making out that Mr. Tillet was disqualified to stand at the recent election, further questions of nicety would arise, as to whether Mr. Huddleston could obtain the seat. This would depend upon whether it could be made out that a number of voters exceeding Mr. Tillet's majority had notice of his disqualification. We believe notice was in fact given to a large number of voters, but questions would arise which have hitherto been discussed principally before parliamentary committees, as to the nature of the notice which would be sufficient, and as to how far voters must be presumed to know the law upon doubtful points, and to know that a person who at a previous election had paid for a show of hands was disqualified for standing. Further questions might arise as to whether voters might not be qualified in presuming a man to be innocent who had never been convicted.

THE GOVERNMENT HAVE STATED that they intend to fill the vacancy in the Lords Justices' Court, but we believe there is no probability that any appointment will be made this side of the Long Vacation.

THE JUDICATURE COMMISSION AND THE COUNTY COURTS.

We were enabled to give our readers last week an account of the recommendations made to the Judicature Commission by the Committee of their own number appointed to inquire into the subject of the county courts and other inferior tribunals. Of course the recommendations of this Committee are in no sense binding upon the commission, and may or may not be adopted by that body; but the quarter from which they come gives them very great weight and importance, and some of the most serious of the proposals thus made will, we think, be read with considerable surprise.

It will probably tend to make the case clearer if we classify the proposals of the Committee under several distinct heads.

In the first place there are a number of suggestions made, to some of which the Committee give their distinct adhesion, which are aimed merely at improving the working of the county court system by changes in its details, but which do not tend to alter its fundamental character, and have not necessarily anything to do with the extent of its jurisdiction. We need not remind our readers that, as a general rule, a plaintiff who sues for a small debt in the county court has no means of knowing whether his claim is to be disputed or not until the case is actually called on in court, and consequently he has to incur in each case all the expense of preparing his evidence and summoning his witnesses often only to find that his money is thrown away. This has long been felt as one of the most obvious practical defects of the county court system. And the Committee have only followed the advice which has been long and pressingly urged by professional men when they advise an extension of the system of default summonses. The only real difficulty attending this matter is to guard against injustice to ignorant and unbusiness-like defendants; and, of course, most defendants are of this class. As to this point the commissioners will not be much assisted by the somewhat sketchy suggestions of their Committee. They make one recommendation, however, which is worthy of consideration, namely, that default summonses should be printed on paper of a particular colour.

The next recommendation, that plaintiffs should have the option of serving process themselves or by their attorneys instead of employing the officers of the court, is probably a wise one. But we doubt whether it will, if adopted, have any great effect in cheapening proceedings; for unless the present system be abandoned altogether the number of county court officers cannot be very materially diminished. We believe that the real remedy for the evils now felt in this department, as for many of the other faults of the county courts, is to be sought in a far more vigorous system of supervision and control from above over the courts and all their officers, from the judge to the humblest bailiff, than any which is now exercised.

A very serious change is advocated by the Committee, and one which certainly should not be adopted without mature consideration, when they recommend the abolition of what they call the banking system, by which the Courts not only decide between the parties but also receive the sums adjudged to be due and pay them over to the proper quarter, keeping the necessary accounts relating to each case. Of course the abolition of this system would save expense. But we doubt much whether it would not also destroy the efficiency of the Courts for the discharge of their most important duty, namely, the collection of very small debts, and render the system of payment by instalments in small cases practically unworkable. We are sure, at least, that the Committee are misled by a false analogy when they draw an inference from the various local courts, such as the Lord Mayor's Court in London, or the Court of Passage in Liverpool. Such courts deal practically with a different class of suitors and a different class of suits from the county courts. It would probably be quite safe to assume that most of the causes which such courts try are for claims of five, ten, or twenty pounds, and most of the suitors persons of some education. But in the county courts the average amount claimed is barely two pounds; the great majority of claims must therefore be far below that sum. And the great bulk of suitors are no more competent to keep correct accounts than they are to command an army.

Another change which the Committee seem to approve is, that central county courts should be established on the various circuits, to which certain classes of business should be remitted. This is a change which, if it were not carried too far nor applied too generally, if its working were kept under very stringent supervision, and if it were aimed wholly to the better working of the existing system, we should approve. It would, we think, be for the interest of the suitors, and economise labour and expense, if cases sent from the superior courts were always heard in the larger towns, not in country villages; and the same may be said of some other classes of cases. The county courts were never intended, and are utterly unfitted, for the trial of substantial disputes. But jurisdiction over such matters has been forced upon them, and such a change as that proposed might probably diminish the disadvantages under which the county court judges are called upon to discharge their difficult and various duties. The Committee, however, seem to contemplate something very different from this in the change which they suggest; we shall consider what they do mean directly.

There is one proposal of the Committee which seems to have been made in complete oblivion of the county court legislation of the last few years. Up to the year 1867 the duties of the registrar of a county court were almost exclusively ministerial; his work was office work, requiring integrity and intelligence, but no very special qualification beyond. And as long as this was so, we can well understand that it might be a question whether a fully qualified professional man was necessary in every court as registrar. But by the Act of 1867 the judge may, and we believe that in fact every judge in England but one ordinarily does leave all undefined actions of contract to be adjudicated upon by the registrar; and under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, almost the whole jurisdiction in bankruptcy may be, and generally is, exercised by the registrars of those courts which have jurisdiction in bankruptcy. The registrar is therefore no longer a mere ministerial officer, he is a judge, and he has, as such, to dispose of an enormous majority of the common law actions which come before the Court, and in bankruptcy to try the most difficult questions of law and fact. Yet the Committee seriously and decidedly advise that for the future there shall be only one registrar for each circuit, who is to sit in person apparently at the principal town of the circuit, and be represented at the smaller towns, either by "his own clerks," or "other professional men acting as his deputies." The plan would no doubt be cheap, as the Committee suggest. But we question whether even economy would reconcile the public to the spectacle of an attorney's clerk from a neighbouring town sitting to hear causes, adjudicate bankruptcies, and try questions of fraudulent preferences and priorities. If, on the other hand, the Committee mean their suggestions to apply only to office work, then, to speak of common law business only, the chief registrar must go round the circuit with the judge, and in fact give his whole time to the work. No one, we presume, will suppose that an attorney of the right class can be induced to do this for less than twelve or fifteen hundred a-year; and the proposal therefore is simply a proposal to double the number of county court judges. And as for bankruptcy, the Committee seem to have forgotten its existence. Bankruptcies cannot wait, and therefore the chief registrar must either be in several places at once or send a clerk to some of them.

So far we have spoken of suggestions which are or may be intended to improve the efficiency of the present county court system; and some of those suggestions, as we have said, seem to us useful, some very much the reverse, and others of doubtful value. We have, secondly, to consider the recommendations of the Committee as to jurisdiction. The Committee recommend that the jurisdiction should be extended both as regards amount and as regards the nature of the subject-matter of litigation. And they say that public opinion and the evidence taken both point to such an extension. As to public opinion, it either means the vague impression of people who know nothing about the matter, in which case it deserves little attention, for such vague impressions are the very things which Royal Commissions are appointed to correct; or else it means the opinions of those who are competent to judge upon the subject, and in this case we venture to think that we can estimate this opinion as well as the Committee can do. As to the evidence taken by the Committee, we have not, of course, the power of speaking with certainty; but we are very much misinformed if the evidence in favour of an extension of jurisdiction was not mainly that of a certain number of the county court judges themselves, who would be more than human if they did not take an exaggerated view of the merits of their own courts. Let us see how the case stands upon the evidence which is open to all of us. The bar are confessedly opposed to any such extension of jurisdiction as that proposed; but it will be said that the bar are interested parties. The attorneys, if we may judge by the voice of their recognised organs, take the same view; the Incorporated Law Society have spoken very clearly upon the question; and, so far as we know, the various Provincial Law Societies have concurred with them. As to litigants in these courts, there are two particular classes who have to use them on a large scale, namely, wholesale dealers and tallymen. Tallymen have no interest in the question of extension, for if tallymen are in the habit of giving credit up to fifty pounds, things are worse than we thought. To the wholesale dealer the county court is the greatest nuisance in existence. A brewer at Burton-on-Trent sends his beer, and a Manchester warehouseman sends his printed goods, into every town in England. At Christmas and Midsummer he has probably a hundred small debts to recover. If he can instruct his attorney to issue a hundred writs in the Common Pleas his course is easy. But under the county court system he must employ a hundred attorneys to issue summonses out of a hundred county courts;—no small inconvenience. And if the cases should have to be tried, which of course is rarely the case, he must send the same witnesses rushing through England from county court to county court to prove all these demands. Wholesale dealers are, therefore, of course anxious to have county court jurisdiction diminished rather than increased. But what about the great mass of litigants who cannot be reduced to any defined classification? Can their feeling on the subject be tested? We think it can. There has been for years a power of trying cases up to any amount in the county court by consent. That enactment has been a simple dead letter. Recourse to the equitable jurisdiction of the courts is practically optional; and the result is that hardly anyone has ever applied to it. But further, without any consent, the plaintiff may proceed in the county court for claims up to £50. Yet only about one plaint in a hundred is for a sum over £20; from which it may safely be inferred that the bulk of the claims over £20 which are brought in the county court are those in which a substantial fear exists of not recovering more than £20 if the action is in contract, or £10 if in tort, and therefore of not getting costs. In truth, if there be any one fact in the history of county courts perfectly clear, it is that nothing but a penal clause as to costs has ever driven any class of causes into the county courts from the superior courts. Where, then, is to be found the proof of a general desire for the extension of county court jurisdiction?

The Committee, however, make another suggestion, and apparently with approval, of a graver nature than any we have yet had to consider, a suggestion which would, by a side wind as it were, revolutionise the whole judicial system of the country from one end to the other. According to that proposal the mass of the county courts throughout the country would be reduced in importance, and presided over by judges at small salaries. All really serious cases would be transferred to central courts, held at a few places throughout the kingdom, far fewer in number than the present number of circuits. The jurisdiction of these central courts would be increased to a great, if not an unlimited extent; and they would be presided over by judges at salaries far above those of the present county court judges. Such is what the Committee suggest. We presume also, though they have, oddly enough, said nothing on the subject, that they would also supply these central courts with a machinery, a staff of officers, and a system of procedure somewhat resembling those of the superior courts, sufficiently, at least, to enable them to do their work with something like efficiency. Now we ask our readers what this proposal amounts to, if we throw aside names? It is not a proposal to improve the county courts. It is a proposal to establish a totally new class of courts, practically to do the same work which the superior courts now do. It is a proposal to introduce the provincial system under cover of another name.

There is much to be said in favour of the provincial system, though our own opinion is strongly opposed to it; and until the Judicature Commissioners made their first report there were some who expected that they would recommend its adoption. But they did not do so; on the contrary, they recommended the establishment of a High Court of Justice on a scale amply sufficient to dispose of all the real and substantial litigation of the country, thereby impliedly rejecting the other theory which would render the greater part of that elaborate machinery superfluous. The Committee whose recommendations we have been considering seem to take a different view; but we do not believe the Commission will be led by them. We do not believe they will repudiate their own report and stultify the bills now before Parliament, or recommend the establishment at double expense of two separate instruments for doing the same work. We hope and believe that their recommendations, whatever they may be, will be directed to the simple end of increasing to the utmost degree the efficiency, rapidity, and economy of the county courts for the purposes for which they were designed, namely, the recovery of small debts, and of the superior courts for the purpose for which they are designed, namely, the disposal of matters of real litigation.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

TRANSFER OF CAUSE FROM COUNTY COURT.

Baker v. Wait, V.C.J., 18 W. R. 185, L. R. 9 Eq. 103.

The 10th section of the original Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 99) conferring equitable jurisdiction on the county courts, prescribes the county courts in which the several kinds of proceedings are to be instituted, concluding with a kind of residuary clause enacting that "proceedings in any suit or matter under this Act, which are not otherwise provided for, shall be taken or instituted in the county court within the district in which the defendants or any or either of them shall reside or carry on business." Section 3 gives the Vice-Chancellors an absolute discretion to transfer any matter to the Court of Chancery on application by any party.

Baker v. Wait was a case falling under this residuary clause, and the plaint was issued from the Bristol County Court, within the district of which one, and one only, of the five defendants resided, the others being scattered over various parts of the south west of England. But the defendant who lived in the Bristol district was substantially in the same interest as the plaintiff, at any rate there was no substantial question between them. Vice-Chancellor James on this ground transferred the cause to the Court of Chancery. He further went on to say that, there being no substantial defendant within the district, an order of the county court would have been void. That is within the spirit, if not within the letter, of the enactment.

WINDING-UP—APPEAL FROM ORDER.

Re Contract Corporation. Ex parte Ebbw Vale Company, L.C., 18 W. R. 222.

Section 124 of the Companies Act, 1862, enacts that there shall be no rehearing of or appeal from orders or decisions made in a winding-up, unless notice is given within three weeks after the order complained of has been made, or unless such time is extended by the Court of Appeal. The Joint Stock Companies Winding-up Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 108), s. 33, was the original of this section, and the Master of the Rolls in Re Risco Coal and Iron Company (37 L. J. Ch. 429), held, apropos of that section, that the three weeks are to be computed from the date when the decision was pronounced by the judge, not that of the drawing-up of the order. As to the grounds on which the Court will or will not grant extension, no rigid limits are either possible or desirable. In Re Wiltshire Iron Company (16 W. R. 444), Lord Cairns granted an extension because important documents had been discovered, on the absence of which the judgment had to some extent proceeded. It is not enough to say that no harm has been done by the delay (Re Samuel Bastow & Co., 37 L. J. Ch. 52, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 46). In Re Hull Forge Company. Ex parte Mitchell (36 L. J. Ch. 337), the Lords Justices (Knight Bruce and Turner), refused to extend the time merely because a judge of co-ordinate jurisdiction had in the interim pronounced a contrary decision. The House of Lords had acted on the same view in Bevan v. Countess of Mornington (8 H. L. 525). But a contrary decision by an appellate court is a very different matter, and is held in the present case to be a reasonable ground for the extension. Other cases on this section are cited in the second edition of Shelford on Joint Stock Companies, p. 251.

SALE OF LAND BY AUCTION ACT (1867)—PUFFING.

Gilliat v. Gilliat, M.R., 18 W. R. 203.

As we commented on this decision (ante p. 127) the Saturday after it was delivered, a short note will suffice in this column. The 30th & 31st Vict. c. 48 put an end to the doubts and the conflicts between the equity and common law rules in the matter of puffing, by peremptorily assimilating the equity rule to that at common law; and though Lord St. Leonards considered the equity rule the best, we must agree with the present Master of the Rolls in thinking it the wholesome course to forbid puffing practices, and require all to be fair and above board. Section 5 of the Act says the conditions of sale must state whether there is a reserved price, or whether a right to bid is reserved, or else it shall not be lawful for the seller to employ anyone to bid, or the auctioneer knowingly to take a bid from any such person. In Gilliat v. Gilliat the conditions of sale stated that there was a reserved price, but said nothing about any biddings; a puffer having been employed, who did not, however, bid up to the reserve price, the Master of the Rolls discharged the purchaser.

PRACTICE AS TO CONCURRENT SUITS IN DIFFERENT BRANCHES OF THE COURT.

Orrell v. Busch, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 588, L.R. 5 Ch. 467.

The policy of the rule has been questioned which entitles the plaintiff to mark his bill for which court he thinks fit, and it has been suggested that bills should be marked for the different courts in rotation. The present rule, however, cannot have been intended to give a plaintiff liberty to mark a bill for one branch of the court where another bill relating to the subject-matter has been already marked for another branch of the court. This having been attempted in the present case, the Lord Justice Giffard laid down this rule, that where a party, knowing that a suit has been instituted in one branch of the court, files his bill in another branch of the court in respect of the same subject-matter, if an application to the Court of Appeal for a transfer of the second cause becomes necessary, the plaintiff in that cause will in general be ordered to pay all the costs of the application. There is no reason, it seems, why the application should be delayed until the decree is made.

LIMITED LIABILITY AND NON-LIABILITY.

Re Baglan Hall Colliery Company, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 499, L. R. 5 Ch. 346.

This is a startling decision, but the logical sequence of the earlier decision in Pell's case (18 W. R. 31). Seven or more persons, joint owners of any concern, may form themselves into a limited company for the purpose of carrying on the concern, and subscribe the memorandum of association for any number of shares they may think fit, such shares not being stated in the memorandum to be paid up. They may then commence business and carry it on as long as they can without incurring any liability whatever, provided they insert in the articles of association a proviso that the shares subscribed for shall be deemed to be fully paid-up. This was the course pursued in the Baglan Hall Colliery case, and the decision on appeal was that the shares subscribed for must be taken as having been fully paid-up by the handing over the colliery. The Vice-Chancellor had held, as the Master of the Rolls has held in several cases, that the obligation to take and pay for shares subscribed for must be satisfied by the delivery to the company of money or money's worth after the formation of the company. The Court of Appeal has decided that the delivery may be either before or after, and what we venture to regard as the obvious intention of the Legislature, that the memorandum must be signed in respect of, at least, seven shares not paid up, is thus frittered away, added to which there is no security where property is handed over antecedent to the formation of the company that the value of the property so handed over shall correspond with the nominal value of the shares subscribed for in exchange. The Lord Justice did well to add that if people will deal with limited companies, without looking at the memorandum and articles, they must take the consequences. Persons who have dealings with a company are not now safe in assuming the liability of the subscribers to be what it appears to be on the face of the document, or indeed to have any existence at all. They are bound for their own protection to look at the articles also. We commend this case to the notice of the Legislature, whenever the state of the existing law of limited liability comes to be considered.

BANKRUPT CONTRIBUTORIES AND THE RULE OF SET-OFF.

Re Strang, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 475.

Where a contributory happens to be also a creditor of the company there can be no set-off allowed in the winding-up between the mutual debts, but he must pay all calls due from him before he can receive any dividend in respect of his proof (Grissell's case, 14 W. R. 1015, L. R. 1 Ch. 528). But if he be a bankrupt the mutual clause in bankruptcy, and not the rule of administration adopted by the Court, is applicable, and a set-off will be allowed, whether the application be made in the bankruptcy or in the winding-up. The mutual credit clause in the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act was re-enacted, with a few apparently unimportant variations, by the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. Under the old law it was held that where a debtor had executed a duly registered creditor's deed, whether a deed of assignment (Re Duckworth, 15 W. R. 858) or a deed of inspectorship (Re Carralli and Haggard's claim, 17 W. R. 244) or a composition deed (Re Strang, ubi sup.), the mutual clause applied, there being nothing in the Companies Act, 1862, to override the provisions of the bankruptcy law with reference to set-off, where there had been dealings between the bankrupt and a company in liquidation.

The Act of 1869 has not altered the application of the rule where a contributory has become bankrupt, and in such a case the set-off will still be allowed. In a case of liquidation under arrangement the rule will probably be the same, section 125, sub-section 7, of the Act providing that all the provisions of the Act shall, so far as the same are applicable, apply to the case of a liquidation by arrangement in the same manner as if the word "bankrupt" included a debtor whose affairs are under liquidation. There is no such proviso among the regulations of the Act as to composition with creditors.

Re Strang also decides that where the contributory has before his bankruptcy assigned his debt to a third party the assignee will stand in the same position as the contributory would have done as to the right of set-off.

SEIZURE QUOUSQUE—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

Walters v. Webb, V.C.M., 18 W. R. 86, L. R. 9 Eq. 83; on appeal, 18 W. R. 587.

When a copyholder dies and no person claims to be admitted in his room, the lord of the manor may, after three proclamations, seize the copyhold into his own hands for want of a tenant. In such a case, unless there be a special custom in the manor that the copyhold shall be forfeited, the lord cannot seize for an absolute forfeiture, but only quousque—that is, until some person shall come in and claim. Seizure quousque, according to

Doe v. Trueman (1 B. & Ad. 736), is in the nature of a process at the instance of the lord to compel an appearance by the heir and payment of the fine on admittance. There is no forfeiture (Doe v. Muscott, 12 M. & W. 832) but a simple discontinuance of the possession of the heir; yet although there is no forfeiture, and the lord is in a certain sense a trustee for the heir, yet the heir is not absolutely unlimited in point of time, as in the case of an express trust. Walters v. Webb decides that where the lord has seized quousque, the right of the heir to be admitted on payment of the fines due, after he has been out of possession for twenty years, is barred by the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will 4, c. 27). The ground of this decision was that the suit brought by the customary heir to compel the lord to admit him was in effect a suit for the recovery of land, and that there having been a discontinuance of the receipts and profits for twenty years the statute was a bar to the claim.

It was decided in Andrews v. Hulse (6 W. R. 508), by Vice-Chancellor Wood, that the Court can entertain a bill by a copyholder to compel the lord to admit him, though the ordinary remedy is by mandamus.

LESSOR TO COMPANY ENTITLED TO OBJECT TO REDUCTION OF CAPITAL.

Re Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company,
V.C.J., 18 W. R. 794.

Where a company proposes to reduce its capital, every creditor of the company who, at the date fixed by the Court, is entitled to any debt or claim which, if that date were the commencement of the winding-up, would be admissible in proof against the company, shall be entitled to object to the proposed alterations, and to be entered in the list of creditors who are entitled to object (Companies Act, 1867, s. 13). It was held in this case that a person whose tenant the company was was a "creditor" within the meaning of the above section in respect of future rent. A claim in respect of rent not yet accrued due cannot logically be admissible in proof, inasmuch as the possibility of non-payment is a contingency which cannot be estimated, but as a protection to the landlord it has been decided that he is entitled to enter a claim for the amount at which the future rent is estimated (Re Haytor Granite Company, 14 W. R. 67, L. R. 1 Ch. 77, where, however, the company was about to be dissolved), though he is not entitled, when he has entered his claim, to have a sum equal to the dividend upon the amount at which the future rent is estimated impounded to secure payment of the future rent (Re London and Colonial Company, Horsey's claim, 16 W. R. 535, L. R. 5 Eq. 561). By a liberal interpretation of section 13 the Vice-Chancellor decided, that as the claim for the future rent might form the foundation of the proof, the lessor might object as a creditor to the proposed reduction of capital. A sum had in consequence to be appropriated to meet the payments of future rent during the remainder of the term.

COMMON LAW.

NOTICE TO PRODUCE—SECONDARY EVIDENCE— FORGERY—CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

Reg. v. Fitzsimons, C.C.R. (Ir.), 18 W. R. 763.

No rule of evidence is better known than that which forbids the giving of verbal evidence of the contents of a written document. The contents of a writing must be proved by the production of the writing itself. There are, of course, exceptions to this, the most important of which are the cases where the writing is lost or destroyed, or where it is in the possession of one of the parties to the suit and notice to produce it at the trial has been given by the other side. The notice to produce does not compel the party who has possession of the document to produce it, but if he does not produce it the party giving the notice may give verbal evidence of its contents.

Where an action is brought for the instrument itself

there is no direct question as to the precise terms of the instrument, as in actions of trover, or detention of a document, or for its negligent loss; evidence of the identity of the document must of course be given, and to do this it may be necessary to prove its contents. This, however, may be done without giving any notice to the other side to produce it, and without proving its destruction, because such evidence is not to prove the precise words of the writing but merely to establish identity. The same rule holds good in criminal cases and it has been decided that "if a person be indicted for stealing a bill or other written instrument its identity may be proved by parol evidence though no notice has been served on the prisoner or his agent" (Taylor Ev. vol. i. p. 407, 5th ed.; see Reg. v. Brennan, 3 Crew. & D. 110; and Aickle's case, 1 Leach, 294).

This rule does not extend to cases of forgery, and consequently in an indictment for forging an instrument which the prisoner had in his possession, notice to produce it must be given, otherwise secondary evidence of its contents will not be allowed (Reg. v. Howarth, 4 C. & P. 255). In Taylor on Evidence, immediately after the passage we have just cited, the rule in cases of forgery is noticed, and it is said "the main reason why parol evidence is admissible in a case of larceny though inadmissible in a case of forgery is that a person charged with stealing an instrument must know from the very nature of the accusation that he will be called upon to produce it; while an indictment for forgery furnishes no such intimation." This reason, however, does not seem the true one, and probably a stronger ground for upholding the rule is that on indictment for larceny it is a mere question of identity, whereas in cases of forgery the essence of the charge is not the identity of the instrument but the writing that is upon the instrument, and, therefore, the instrument itself must be produced.

This latter principle was recognised in Reg. v. Elworthy (16 W. R. 207), and it has again been followed in Reg. v. Fitzsimons, which was an indictment for forging a bank-note. The note was in the prisoner's possession, and secondary evidence of its contents was given at the trial, although the prisoner had received no notice to produce it. The Court for Crown Cases Reserved in Ireland held that the secondary evidence was not admissible and quashed the conviction on the ground that "the prosecutrix was bound to prove the case affirmatively, and by the production of the best and most trustworthy evidence that can be procured," and that the best evidence had not been given in this case.

By this decision it is now clear (Reg. v. Howarth was only the ruling of a single judge) that in an indictment for forging a document which is in the prisoner's possession, notice to produce it must be given before it can be proved by secondary evidence; and it seems clear that the rule will be followed whenever the direct question at issue (whether in civil or criminal cases) is the writing itself, but will not apply where evidence of the writing is given merely for the purpose of identifying the document.

BANKRUPTCY.

APPEAL IN CASES PENDING AT COMMENCEMENT OF ACT.

Ex parte Palmer, Re Palmer, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 597; Ex parte Anderson, Re Anderson, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 765.

In the case of Acts drawn with such extreme brevity as the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and its kindred Acts, it might easily have been anticipated that considerable difficulty would arise in the application of its provisions to pending bankruptcies commenced under a different system of law and a different scheme of procedure. And not only has this been the case, but some curious and somewhat awkward results have been arrived at.

The language of the Bankruptcy Act is for the most part general, and in most of its sections there is nothing expressly to limit their operation to matters arising after the commencement of the Act. Then, again, most of its sections deal distinctly with matters of mere procedure; and it is a general rule of construction that enactments affecting only procedure are so far retrospective that they apply to proceedings already pending as well as to those subsequently commenced (Wright v. Hale, 9 W. R. 157; Kimbray v. Draper, 16 W. R. 539). The Bankruptcy Repeal Act, 1869, however, while repealing all the previously existing Bankruptcy Acts, by section 200, provided that such repeal shall not "affect any right, title, obligation or liability accrued before the commencement of this Act," nor "interfere with the prosecution or affect the course of any legal proceedings pending in bankruptcy or otherwise under any such enactment before the commencement of this Act; but subject to the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and to the Debtors Act, 1869, such proceeding shall be prosecuted as if this Act had not passed." And rule 319 of the Bankruptcy Rules of January, 1870, says that "the foregoing rules shall apply, in exclusion of all other rules and orders heretofore made, to all proceedings commenced under the Act; but the principles, practice, and rules on which courts having jurisdiction in bankruptcy have heretofore acted in dealing with proceedings in bankruptcy or otherwise, shall be observed by any court with respect to the further prosecution of any proceedings pending on the 31st of December, 1869, except, &c."

Two classes of questions have arisen upon the subject—first, which of the new powers conferred upon the courts by the Act of 1869 apply to proceedings pending at its commencement; and secondly, which course of practice, the new or the old, is to prevail where the two are inconsistent?

As the first of these questions, in most instances in which a question has been raised as to whether any new power given to the court by the late Act applies to bankruptcies previously pending, the question has been answered in the affirmative. Thus, in Ex parte Wisland (18 W. R. 616) it was decided by Lord Justice Giffard that section 80, sub-section 3, applies to such proceedings, so as to empower the London court to transfer the proceedings from a local court to the London court. And in one of the cases now under review (Ex parte Anderson) the same learned judge decided that sections 66 and 72 likewise apply to pending proceedings, and that under them a court of bankruptcy has power to grant an injunction restraining a person to whom the goods of the bankrupt have been fraudulently assigned from dealing with them. In the same case, however, the Lord Justice is reported to have expressed an opinion that the powers under section 13, which enable a court of bankruptcy at any time after petition to stay actions against the bankrupt and to appoint a receiver, are not to be exercised in bankruptcies in which the adjudication was before the commencement of the Act of 1869. But this opinion seems to have been founded rather upon the view that in such cases the exercise of these powers could hardly be necessary, than upon a strict construction of the Act itself.

Of the other class of questions, those having to do with mere practice, and of the curious results arrived at, the two cases now under review afford a good example. By section 61 of the Act of 1861 an appeal lay from a local court of bankruptcy direct to the Lords Justices; and by section 171 of the same Act thirty days were allowed for appealing from an order allowing or refusing the discharge of a bankrupt, instead of twenty-one days, as in other cases. By section 71 of the new Act, the appeal from a local court must be to the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy in the first instance; and by rule 148 the time for appeal is in every case twenty-one days. Now in the case of proceedings pending at the commencement of the latter Act, and still in progress, which practice is to prevail? The answer, according to Lord Justice Giffard, is—sometimes one and sometimes the other. If the order appealed against be one which a court of bankruptcy would have had power to make before the Act of 1869 was passed, then the old practice is to prevail. And, accordingly, in Ex parte Palmer, where the order appealed against was one granting the bankrupt his discharge, the Lord Justice held that the assignee might appeal direct to him, and had thirty days for doing so. If, on the other hand, the order appealed against be one which, but for the Act of 1869, there could have been no jurisdiction to make, if it be made in exercise of some of the new powers conferred by that Act, then the new practice is to prevail. And, accordingly, in Ex parte Anderson, where the order appealed against was one granting an injunction against a stranger to the bankruptcy (an order which, before the Act of 1869, could not have been made), the Lord Justice held that the appeal ought to be to the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

JURISDICTION OF COURT OF BANKRUPTCY OVER DEEDS REGISTERED UNDER SECTION 194 OF BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1861.

Ex parte Atkinson—Re Brooks and Another, C.J. Bkcy., 18 W. R. 598.

Two points, both of considerable importance, were decided by the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy in this case. First, he held that by virtue of section 197 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, courts of bankruptcy had jurisdiction to administer the trusts of a deed between a debtor and his creditors, registered under section 194 of that Act, though not registered under, nor otherwise complying with the provisions of section 192, so as to become binding upon non-assenting creditors. The question whether courts of bankruptcy had any such jurisdiction is one which, as far as we know, had never before been expressly decided. On the one hand there were strong dicta of Lord Westbury in Ex parte Morgan (11 W. R. 316), and of the judges of the Court of Exchequer in Pearson v. Pearson (14 W. R. 842), to the effect that section 197 applied only to deeds registered under section 192. And it must be observed that some of the provisions of sections 197 and 198 have been expressly decided not to apply to any deeds but those under section 192; and it is somewhat difficult to see how a section is to split up, and be treated as partly applicable, and partly not applicable, to the same subject-matter. On the other hand, there were also dicta of several of the barons of the Exchequer suggesting that some of the provisions of section 197 might be applied to deeds under section 194. It is curious that the point should now, for the first time, come to be expressly decided long after the sections in question have been repealed. The decision of the learned Chief Judge may, we think, well be open to question; but, at the present stage of the Act's history, it is not very likely to be reviewed.

Secondly, in the case under review, the Chief Judge has decided that, by the operation of section 130 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, which empowers the Lord Chancellor to transfer the business of any country district court to the London court, or a county court; and of rule 316, which directs the judge of any local court to have and exercise all the powers, &c., of a district court with respect to any trust deed, &c., executed before the 31st December, 1869, in the same manner as, with respect to any other legal proceeding pending, a county court has power to execute the trusts of a deed within the jurisdiction of a district court whose business has been transferred to it. The doubt on the point arose from the fact that the Bankruptcy Repeal Act repeals the Act of 1861, only excepting from the operation of the repeal any "legal proceedings" pending. It might not be quite clear whether the carrying out of a trust-deed is a legal proceeding; or, if it be not, whether the rule could extend the operation of the statute. But any other decision than that arrived at would have been so inconvenient that the result could hardly be seriously doubtful.

REVIEWS.

The Law of Joint Stock Companies and other Associations, as Contained in the Statutes Relating to Joint Stock Companies, the General Orders and Rules of the Court of Chancery, and Decisions of the Courts of Law and Equity; together with Industrial and Provident Societies Acts, and County Court Orders thereon, the Stannaries Act and Rules, and the Act Relating to the Abandonment of Railways and Winding-up of Railway Companies; with Notes as to the mode of Procedure under them. By EDWARD W. COX, Serjeant-at-Law, Recorder of Portsmouth. Seventh Edition, by Charles J. O'Malley, LL.B., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London: Horace Cox.

The last edition of this work was published shortly after the Act of 1862 came into operation, since when various Acts, including the Companies Act, 1867, and an almost countless multitude of decisions, have come into being.

Like other works on joint stock companies, it comprises, first, a general introduction to the subject; and, secondly, the Acts, orders, rules, &c., with the decisions noted up. The introduction in the present edition consists of 113 pages of criticism on the Act of 1862, with various instructions, some of which are likely to prove serviceable to promoters, for the incorporation, &c., of joint-stock companies. The author of the introduction seems to consider the limited liability Acts to be most unjust departures from previous principles. "The Law of Partnership," he says, "was founded upon the principle that he who acts through an agent ought to be responsible for his agent's acts; that it is politic as well as just that he who shares the profit of an enterprise should be subject also to its losses; that there is a moral obligation, which it is the duty of a civilised and Christian nation to enforce by law, to pay debts, perform contracts, and make reparation for wrongs. Limited liability is founded on the opposite principle, and is designed to enable a man to avail himself of the acts of his agent, if advantageous to him, and to avoid responsibility for them if they should be disadvantageous; to speculate for profits without being liable for losses; to make contracts, incur debts, and commit wrongs, the law depriving the creditor, the contractor, and the injured, of his rightful remedy against the property or the person of the wrongdoer, beyond the limit, however small, at which it may please him to determine his own liability." If this criticism on the Act is well founded, what is to be said of the advice given by the author for the carrying out of such objects? In the notes, both to the introduction and the Acts, &c., a vast mass of cases is noted up, and in main all the decisions are to be found posted up, in one part or another, which will make the book a useful one to the practitioner. The introduction contains much that is practically useful, though it is adapted rather for the promoter or director than for the lawyer. The work, however, will not compare favourably with that of Mr. Pitcairn's, which we noticed some while ago. One advantage it possesses over Mr. Pitcairn's book is the fact of its later issue, which has enabled the editor to post up a number of the later cases; taking the book, however, as a whole, we very much prefer Mr. Pitcairn's edition of Shelford. The cases are better arranged there, and the subject is treated in a much more "thorough" and methodical manner. The present work, however, is a useful one, and the latest practice-decisions are to be found among the annotations.

COURTS.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR and Lord Justice JAMES.)

July 19.—Upon taking his seat this morning the Lord Chancellor said,—It would have been consonant with my own feelings and those of Lord Justice James if we could with propriety have closed the court for this day, but he to whose memory we should all have desired to pay this tribute of respect would have been the first to wish that the sutors of the Court should not, even for a few hours, be unnecessarily exposed to delay in the hearing of their causes. I cannot, however, refrain from saying a few words which are called forth by the dispensations of Providence, which twice within one year have deprived, I will not say myself, but the public, of the two colleagues whose advice and concurrence for a time lightened my labours and gave weight to their result. With regard to Lord Justice Selwyn I have before had occasion to notice the retentiveness of his memory in regard to decided cases, and his calm good sense in applying them to the matter in question, and I have thankfully acknowledged the graceful act of self-denial by which, notwithstanding my remonstrances, he declined the position which was his due by seniority of appointment. Our mutual confidence in each other, I am thankful to say, was from day to day increased, and I have never ceased to regret the unexpected close of his career of usefulness. My colleague has lately paid a tribute to the distinguished qualities of Lord Justice Giffard at once so complete and so discriminating as to leave me little to say. In addition, however, to the knowledge which we have had in common of his career at the bar, it has been my privilege on the bench also to have been assisted by his arguments, and afterwards to have been associated with him in the performance of my duties. None but those who have had cast upon them the responsibility of judicial decision can adequately appreciate the advantages of an argument at once concise and complete, vigorous in its condensation, neither wasted on untenable propositions nor abridged by evading the difficulties of the case. On the bench the rapidity of his apprehension did not betray him into hasty conclusions, and more than once I have known him depart from his first impressions as the facts were more fully developed and explained in the course of argument. I have been aided in a matter which I feel it difficult to express by his quiet, suggestive appreciation of the cardinal facts of the cause. On no occasion have we had the misfortune to differ. Had it been otherwise I should have had just reason to doubt the soundness of my conclusions. We could claim the common advantage of the training and the traditions of the same public school, as well as those of our common profession; and our principles of thought and action were thus more completely brought into unison. It may be pardoned to one who finds himself thus unexpectedly bereft of two colleagues younger than himself to mingle personal regret with the general sorrow which deplores their loss.

LORD JUSTICE JAMES.

July 22.—Re Heather, Son, & Gill, Solicitors.

This was an appeal by Messrs. Heather, Son, & Gill, solicitors, from an order made by the Master of the Rolls for the taxation of a bill of costs delivered by them. They had acted as solicitors for a benefit building society, who were mortgagees of some property, and the bill in question was delivered to the representatives of the mortgagor. The amount of the bill was £83 16s. 10d. Messrs. Pritchard & Son, who were the solicitors to the mortgagor's representatives, objected to some of the items in the bill as not being properly chargeable against the mortgagor, and struck out items by which they reduced the bill to £47 6s. 4d., and sent it back to Messrs. Heather & Co. inviting them to make suggestions upon it. Ultimately Heather & Co. assented to the alterations to a considerable extent, and sent in a revised bill for the amount of £57 17s. Messrs. Pritchard & Son were not satisfied with this reduction, and ultimately an order was obtained to tax the original bill. Application was made to the Master of the Rolls to set aside this order; if an order for taxation was made, only the revised bill ought to be taxed. His Lordship refused to alter the order, and Messrs. Heather & Co. appealed.

Freeling, for the appellants.

J. W. Chitty, for the respondents.

JAMES, L.J., thought this was a case of some hardship upon the solicitors as they seemed to have gone through the bill, and reduced it with reference to the suggestions made to them, and there might have been a reason for the apparently enormous overcharge in the original bill in the fact, as Mr. Freeling had suggested, that charges had been made for business done before a proper retainer had been given. But the Court had to deal with the matter on general principles, and with regard to the circumstances which might arise, and that being so he was glad that the discussion had satisfied him that the order of the Master of the Rolls was free from technical objection and consistent with justice. The case was one of a mortgagor, and one knew how completely a mortgagor was under the harrow. He was obliged to pay before he could get back his title-deeds, and in such a case a solicitor was tempted to introduce into his bill a number of charges to which he was not entitled. In the present case the mortgagor was minded to question the bill. He knew perfectly well that the solicitor had committed himself to such an extent that he would be able to go into the taxing master's office at the expense of the solicitor. That was a great advantage to which he was entitled. Instead of at once taking that advantage, his solicitor, with that comity which was proper between solicitors, but not intending to deprive his client of any advantage to which he was entitled, said, I have reduced the bill to such an amount, will you accept that? If the solicitor on the other side could take the opportunity of recasting his bill, he might say, I can clearly sustain the bill to the extent of £47; I will stick on charges to such an amount that one-sixth cannot be struck off the new bill, and so I shall be free from the risk of having to pay costs, and shall get the profit of the taxation. That was a course of proceeding which could not be sanctioned. His Lordship did not mean to say that this was the case here, but it was a thing so likely to occur that he was glad that the order of the Master of the Rolls could be sustained. He thought the order was technically, substantially and morally right. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN-FIELDS.
(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)
July 20.—Re Williams.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 125, 126—Petition under—Resolution of creditors—Practice.

In this case the debtor had filed a petition for liquidation under sections 125 and 126 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and resolutions of creditors, passed at a meeting duly held for that purpose, were tendered to the registrar (Mr. Keane), but (exception being taken to certain of the proofs) he made no order in the matter, but referred the parties to the Court.

Bagley now asked the Chief Judge to decide the questions which had arisen between the parties, stating that one of the points to be determined was whether a solicitor could prove his debt before his bill had been taxed.

Reed for the debtor.

The CHIEF JUDGE observed that by the 295th rule the registrar would, where he refused to register the resolution, certify the grounds of such refusal by memorandum under his hand, and file it with the proceedings. It did not appear that in the present case the registrar had declined to allow registration.

Bagley.—By the 300th rule neither the resolutions nor the proofs nor proxies of creditors assembled at any meeting are to be objected to or refused by the registrar by reason of any informality therein, unless he shall be of opinion that such informality is matter of moment, in which case he shall refer the matter to the judge.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—That is not this case. The registrar must either register or refuse to register, and then there is a right of appeal. If he refuses to register he must state the reasons. I have no power to decide the questions which are raised. The parties seem to have been all equally blundering before the registrar, and there will be no costs on either side. They must go before the registrar again.

Solicitor for the debtor, Plunkett.

Solicitors for the creditors, Carter & Bell.

(Before Mr. Registrar PEPYS.)
July 19.—In Re Crawford.

Practice—Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 7, 9—General Rules of 1st January, 1870, Rule 36—Petition for adjudication—Neglect of debtor to file notice disputing statement in petition.

This was a petition for adjudication in bankruptcy against Robert Crawford. A debtor summons had been taken out against him upon which he had filed the necessary affidavit and obtained leave to give security under section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, but had failed to do so, whereupon the present petition was presented. No notice had been filed by the debtor with the registrar, showing the statements in the petition which he intended to deny or dispute according to rule 36 of the General Rules in Bankruptcy of January 1, 1870.

G. L. P. Eyre, for the petitioning creditor, contended that, as the debtor had failed to file the notice under rule 36, the petition was unopposed.

The debtor appeared in person.

The REGISTRAR considered that notwithstanding the provisions in rule 36, it was competent to the debtor to come in at any time to dispute the statements in the petition and oppose adjudication, and allowed the debtor to give a bond by way of security for his debt under section 9 of the Act of 1869.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. JOHN THOMAS ABDY, LL.D., barrister-at-law, of the Norfolk circuit, has been appointed (by the Home Secretary) Recorder of the borough of Bedford, in succession to the late Mr. D. D. Keane, Q.C. Dr. Abdy is the eldest son of the late Lieutenant-Colonel James Nicholas Abdy, of the East India Company's military service, by Charlotte Georgiana, daughter of Thomas King, Esq. His grandfather was the late Rev. Thomas Abdy-Rutherford, son of Dr. Rutherford Archdeacon of Essex, by the daughter of Sir William Abdy, Bart., of Felix Hall. The first-named clergyman assumed in 1775, the surname and arms of Abdy, on succeeding to the estates of the last Sir John Abdy, Bart., of Albyns, Essex, and in 1778 married Mary, daughter of James Hayer, Esq., bencher of the Middle Temple, which lady was therefore the grandmother of Dr. Abdy. Dr. Abdy is also cousin of Sir Thomas Neville Abdy, of Albyns, who succeeded to the family estates on the death of his uncle in 1840, and was created a baronet in December, 1849. Dr. Abdy was born on the 5th July, 1822, and was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge. He was at the head of the civil law tripos in 1845, and afterwards became a fellow of his college; in January, 1850, he was called to the bar by the Society of the Middle Temple. On the resignation of Mr. Maine, in 1854, Dr. Abdy was nominated Regius Professor of Civil Law in the University of Cambridge, which he still continues to hold, in conjunction with the Gresham Professorship of Law. He has published several books on civil law. Dr. Abdy is one of the revising barristers on the Norfolk Circuit. He married, in July, 1854, Marian, second daughter of John Hardwick Holloway, Esq., by which lady he has a numerous family.

Mr. HERBERT WILLIAM FISHER, barrister-at-law, and private secretary and keeper of the privy seal to the Prince of Wales, has been appointed by his Royal Highness (as Duke of Cornwall) to be Vice-Warden of the Stannaries Court of Cornwall and Devon, vice Mr. Edward Smirke, resigned on account of ill-health. The value of the office is £1,500 per annum. Mr. Fisher was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. (first class Literis Humanioribus) in 1848. He was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in November, 1855, and formerly practised on the Western Circuit, but withdrew from it several years ago, on being appointed private secretary to the Prince of Wales, to whom he had previously acted for some time as tutor.

Mr. WALTER HYDE, solicitor, of Stockport, and town clerk of that borough, has been appointed (by Mr. Yates, county court judge) Clerk and Registrar of the Stockport County Court, in succession to the late Mr. Henry Coppock, deceased, and the appointment has been duly confirmed by the Lord Chancellor. Mr. Hyde was admitted in 1864, having previously been articled to the late Mr. Coppock, with whom he continued in partnership until his death. On Mr. Coppock's death Mr. Hyde was elected town clerk of Stockport, and now receives the vacant registrarship of the county court.

Mr. JAMES WESTLAND has been appointed Superintendent and Remembrancer of legal affairs to the Government of Bengal.

Mr. JOHN WILLIAMSON BROWN, solicitor (firm of Messrs. Chater, Forster & Brown), Newcastle, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery.

Mr. W. GARROD, of Halesworth, Suffolk, has been appointed Clerk to the Commissioners of Taxes for the division of Blything, in place of the late Mr. John Crabtree, solicitor, deceased.

Mr. CHARLES DUFFELL FAULKNER, solicitor, of Deddington, Oxfordshire, has been appointed Solicitor and Treasurer of the Prosecution Association of that place, in the room of Mr. Henry Churchill, who disappeared on the 8th June, and has not since been heard of. Mr. Faulkner was certificated in 1850.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

July 15.—The Irish Land Bill.—The Commons' amendments to the Lords' amendments were considered, the House finally resolving to insist on their clause for permissive registration of improvements, and on their addition of "breach of any condition against assignment, sub-letting, bankruptcy, or insolvency," to the causes excepting ejectment from being "disturbance."—The compensation scale, the thirty-one years' limit of exception lease, the proviso enabling the tenant to claim in a lower class than the actual valuation of his holding, and the amended conacre clause (permission to tenant to let for potato and other green crops), were agreed to as amended by the Commons.—The Commons' amendment, limiting the sum to be deducted from compensation payments under clause 3 to three years' arrears of rent, was disagreed from.

The Liverpool Admiralty District Registrar Bill was read a second time.

The Charitable Funds Investment Bill and the Rents and Periodical Payments Bill passed through committee.

The Passengers Act Amendment Bill was read a second time.

July 18.—The Life Assurance Companies Bill was read a second time.

The Married Women's Property Bill.—Lord Cairns explained the amendments which the select committee had made in that bill. First, it was provided that the earnings of a married woman, whether they were wages or the results of trade or of literary, artistic, or scientific skill, should be treated as though they had been settled to her separate use. Secondly, as to investments made by married women, whether by means of their earnings or otherwise. Under the existing law a husband might, after giving proper notice, withdraw from an ordinary savings-bank, or a Post Office savings-bank, any deposits placed there by his wife. The bill, as amended, provided that all deposits made in the name of a married woman should be regarded as settled to her separate use, and she alone was to have the control over them. The 3rd and 4th clauses provided that where a woman in humble circumstances previous to her marriage had invested money in the funds or in the shares of public companies for her separate use, such moneys should be treated as her separate property. This provision was greatly needed, because women who had saved up £100 or so were very unwilling to ask their future husbands to sign any documents with reference to it. The Earl of Morley had proposed an additional clause dealing with shares in friendly societies in the same way, and this would improve the bill still further. To all these clauses a proviso was attached that if any investments were made by a wife with the moneys of her husband, and without his consent, application might be made to the Court in a very summary way; and it was likewise provided that nothing contained in the bill should authorise the making of any investment with a view to defraud creditors. With regard to personal property coming to a married woman as next of kin to a person dying intestate, it was provided that it should belong to her for her separate use. In like manner she would have the separate use of land coming to her as heir-at-law to an intestate person. The 9th clause would prove highly beneficial. At present, if a husband effected a policy of insurance in his own name, intending it as a provision for his family, it became after his decease a part of his general estate and was available to pay his debts. Indeed, as it was one of the assets most easily got hold of, it was usually applied to that purpose. This bill, however, provided that if a husband effected a policy of insurance which stated on the face of it that it was to be for the benefit of his wife and children it should not be liable to the claims of his creditors; but if the Court should find that the policy had been effected in order to defraud his creditors it might order the money to be applied towards satisfying their claims.—Lord Penzance said the bill as it now stood was of a practical, workable character.—The House then went into committee on the bill.—Clause 1.

—Lord Lyttelton suggested that the bill be made retrospective in its action.—Lord Cairns said that would be in violation of the principles which guided legislation in such cases as this. To make this bill retrospective would be to take from many men what they now believed to be their property.—The Lord Chancellor said the bill had been much improved in the select committee, and, he believed, when its provisions came to be understood, women would be quick to take advantage of it. A woman might protect any property other than that provided for in the bill by appointing a trustee.—The clause was agreed to.—Clause 2.—Lord Houghton said that this and the next two clauses were founded on a total absence of principle. Married women were obliged by them to invest their money in one of four different ways, as a deposit in a savings-bank, as a Government annuity, in the funds, or in a joint stock company, or not have those savings protected by law for their separate use. It was said they could appoint a trustee, but such a thing as a trustee never entered their heads. What was needed was some simple process by which property of all kinds acquired by a married woman could be secured to her separate use.—Lord Cairns could not admit that the clause was devoid of principle; the property of a married woman could not be secured to her unless the law provided in what manner it should be invested.—The clause was agreed to.—Clause 4.—The Marquis of Salisbury pointed out that whereas this clause provided that fully paid up shares might be conveyed to the separate use of a married woman, it made no similar provision in the event of the shares not being fully paid up. In the event of the shares, as far as they were paid up, becoming the sole property of the wife, to whom were the directors of a company to look for the payment of the remaining calls upon such shares, the husband being protected by another clause in the bill from liability for his wife's debts?—Lord Cairns explained that the husband would not be liable for calls upon the shares not fully paid up, which had belonged to his wife before her marriage, until he committed some act that rendered him liable at law. He would, however, introduce an amendment to meet the case.—The clause, as amended, was agreed to.—The Earl of Morley inserted a new clause after clause 4 to extend the principle of the clause to friendly societies.—The remaining clauses were agreed to, and, on the suggestion of Lord Penzance, the date at which the Act is to come into operation was fixed as the 1st of November next instead of the 1st of January, 1871.—The bill, as amended, was then reported.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council Bill.—The Lord Chancellor moved the second reading. The object of the bill was two-fold,—firstly, to increase the number of persons who might be placed by her Majesty on the Judicial Committee; and, secondly, to secure a special payment to a certain number of members (viz., four) of the Committee, in order that those who received such special payment, independently of any pension to which they might be entitled, should be held as bound to attend the business of the Judicial Committee as all other judges were bound to attend the courts to which they were attached. The bill proposed to authorise her Majesty, after the passing of the Act, by her sign manual, to appoint two more persons who had filled the office of judge of any of the High Courts of Judicature in India, or the office of legal member of the Council of the Governor-General of India, to be member of the Judicial Committee; and it was proposed that there should be paid to each of these persons a sum not exceeding £1,000 a year in addition to their pensions. The Chief Judge of the High Court of Calcutta received a retiring pension of £2,000; and the legal member of the Council of the Governor-General also had a considerable pension on his retirement. In addition to their pensions, those persons, on being appointed members of the Judicial Committee, would each receive £1,000 per annum, by which means there would be no difficulty in securing their regular attendance, except during the vacations, for the despatch of appeals coming from India. It was proposed also to take power to appoint anybody who had held the office of judge of the supreme court of any possession of her Majesty other than India, and one other competent person, being a barrister of not less than fifteen years' standing, to sit on the Judicial Committee; and each of them would be paid a sum not exceeding £2,500 a-year. In that way it was thought that they might place on the Judicial Committee members of the bar, who, having attained eminence and distinction in their profession, might be desirous of retiring to the quiet and much more dignified position of holding an office in which they might be eminently useful. There would be no difficulty in finding men of that character in whom the public would have perfect confidence. The bill would also enable £500 a year to be paid to any of the retired judges who were ex officio members of the Judicial Committee. A judge desirous of retiring from the common law courts or the Court of Chancery had a pension allowed him, and if he retired from the common law courts he saved the expenses of the circuits, or about £500, and he would also have the £500 they proposed to give him, making a difference to him of £1,000 a year altogether, in addition to the pension he actually received. In that manner they might obtain for the Judicial Committee members who would undertake the positive duty of regularly attending its sittings in the mode he had described. Lastly, the bill contained a clause enabling the Judicial Committee to sit, if it thought fit, in two sections; and that would have the effect of disposing of the present arrear of appeals from India, because they might place in each of those sections—having thus secured members bound to attend—a judge from India, and also another judge under an obligation to attend from the two members to be appointed in addition to the present Judicial Committee. And they would only want in each case a third person to preside, who might be found among the ordinary members of the Judicial Committee, all of whom now attended from time to time, but most of whom did not think it reasonable that they should be under the actual necessity of attending regularly from week to week in the way in which the ordinary tribunals sat. There had been intimated to him some objections with reference to the appointment in the first instance of the judges in any court in India, and it had been suggested that in some courts there were native judges whom it would not be desirable to appoint as members of the Judicial Committee. It was not, however, very probable that they would be privy councillors, and none could be appointed who were not; but, if it was thought desirable, there could be no objection to confine the appointment to the chief justice in each court, while with reference to the colonial judges the appointment might be limited to the chief justice of the supreme court of any colony. Although at present there was not an instance of any person being made a privy councillor who had come from any part of her Majesty's dominions other than India, yet he had known at least one Canadian judge who would have been a very suitable person for such a position, and he could not but think that, as the importance of colonial tribunals increased there might be found coming from the Cape, from Canada, or from Australia, some who would be worthy of being placed on the Judicial Committee. —Lord Cairns said that with regard to the second clause, which gave power to appoint two privy councillors who had held the office of judge in any court in India, there ought to be a clear and positive definition on the face of the bill as to what persons could be appointed and what offices they must have held, because owing to the constitution of the High Court of Bengal there might be appointed persons who would be quite unsuitable for the Judicial Committee, and who had never had a case argued before them. The practice had been to treat the Chief Justice of Bengal as a person who was ex officio qualified to sit on the Judicial Committee, and he thought it would be desirable to continue that practice. There were now three ex-Chief Justices of Bengal, two of whom had rendered very efficient service, and he regretted that power was not taken by the bill to appoint all three, the amount of remuneration, if it was limited, being divided among them. By the third clause it was proposed to appoint on the Judicial Committee any person who had held the office of Judge in the Supreme Court of any country other than India, and the consequence might be the appointment of the Chief Justices of Sierra Leone, the Straits Settlements, Gambia, the Mauritius, or any of the colonies whose chief justices were of a different stamp from those whom it was desirable to appoint on the Judicial Committee. To the fourth clause there was a still more serious objection, its object being to give to judges who were entitled to a retiring pension a sum of £500 a-year (in addition to their pension) for their services on the Judicial Committee. There was in this country an ample scale of retiring pensions for judges, and attached to the receipt of those pensions there was always considered to be the obligation, no doubt an imperfect one, to give some portion of their time to the transaction of the judicial business of the country. As soon, however, as there was introduced a system of picking and choosing and bribing a retired judge with £500 a-year extra, an end was put to the honourable understanding which now prevailed, for it was utterly impossible to maintain that obligation when a payment was made to some persons for their attendance, and he hoped the Lord Chancellor would consider that point. He also trusted that a reconsideration would be given to the proposal to divide the Judicial Committee into two portions, a step which he held to be quite unnecessary and which might lead to the effect of their decisions being weakened.—The Lord Chancellor said the division was not to be permanent.—Lord Cairns said that for some time there would be two divisions by whom decisions would be given. —The Lord Chancellor said it was not intended that there should be two permanent divisions, but changes might be made from time to time, so long as it was necessary to have two divisions, and any number of combinations might be made of the members of the Judicial Committee. The bill was read a second time.

The Liverpool Admiralty District Registrar Bill passed through committee.

The Rents and Periodical Payments Bill and the Charitable Funds Investment Bill were read a third time and passed.

The Passengers Act Amendment Bill passed through committee.

July 19.—The Bankrupt Law (Ireland) Amendment Bill was withdrawn by the Marquis of Clanricarde, the Lord Chancellor declining to pledge the Government to deal with the subject within any definite time.

July 21.—The Settled Estates Bill.—The Earl of Airlie moved the second reading. The object of the bill was to enable limited owners to charge their estates, under certain limitations, with the cost of erecting a mansion thereupon, such charge not exceeding three years' net rental. The Montgomery Act in Scotland allowed a charge not exceeding two years' rental for the erection or enlargement of a mansion, and a subsequent Act authorised the sale of so much of an estate as was required to carry out improvements. The bill incorporated the Lands Improvement Act, and it required notice of the improvement, and allowed an appeal to the Court of Chancery. The owner would have no right to build the mansion unless it enhanced the letting value beyond the charge which it would involve. It would otherwise be at the discretion of the commissioners to certify the improvement or not, and without their certificate the charge could not be imposed. The charge, unlike other improvements, would not take priority over other charges. —The Lord Chancellor stated that the law officers of the Crown approved the principle of the bill, it being desirable, especially in Ireland, to induce owners to reside on their estates, the Montgomery Act having, it was understood, worked well in Scotland. Admitting that three years' rental was somewhat excessive, and that the statutory declaration of the owner as to the cost would be an insufficient barrier against fraud, he thought the defects of the bill could be remedied in committee.—Lord Cairns said it was surely better to leave these great and ornamental works to agreement between the various persons interested whenever the entail was opened.—Lord Romilly pointed out that the object in view could be met by a slight addition to the Settled Estates Act, enabling the Court of Chancery to authorise the erection of mansions as well as other improvements. He had known many instances of applications by the tenant in remainder to pull down a house built by the tenant for life, and the bill would be likely to lead to litigation.—The bill was read a second time.

The Evidence Further Amendment Act (1869) Amendment Bill was reported as amended.

The Ecclesiastical Courts Bill was read a second time.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council Bill.—Committee.—Lord Romilly said the measure was spoilt from mere parsimony. They could never secure proper respect for the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council unless they had persons sitting on it who earned that respect from the public, and they could not obtain the services of such persons unless they chose to pay them. He felt very strongly on that subject, because it was one of the reproaches of this country that it made a profit out of litigation—that it made a considerable profit out of the misfortunes of persons who were compelled to go to law—which was just as monstrous in principle as if they were to tax for the support of the police every man who had his pocket picked or his house broken into. Great care should be taken not only that their ultimate tribunal should be able to dispose of the cases which came before it, but that the men they obtained to serve on that tribunal should be such as would inspire confidence among the public and the profession both at home and abroad. To suppose, however, that they could get such men for £500 a year, even in addition to a retiring pension, was, in his opinion, perfectly ridiculous; and again, the idea that they could secure them for £2,500 was, in his view, equally absurd. They must always bear in mind the great increase in the price of all commodities which had occurred of late years, together with the great increase which had occurred in the remuneration obtained by lawyers. That fact ought not to be lost sight of when they were attempting to fix the salary to be given to a judge. If, therefore, the proposal contained in that bill were not altered, their judicial tribunal of the Privy Council would not rise in the public estimation, and would not satisfy the people either at home or abroad.—Lord Cairns regarded the bill as intended to meet a temporary crisis, and suggested the adoption of a clause limiting the operation of the bill to two years, during which time the arrears of business could be cleared off. He disapproved making colonial chief justices eligible to be members of the Judicial Committee, and he asked the Lord Chancellor whether he could obtain the assistance of any such persons as were required. It was hopeless to expect that the services of barristers of experience and ability could be secured for £2,500 per annum, or if they could the judicial salaries paid in this country ought at once to be reduced by one-half. He was also of opinion that the proposed addition to certain salaries would destroy the present system of voluntary service.—The Lord Chancellor agreed with what Lord Romilly had said as to the impropriety of paying all the expenses of a tribunal by levying fees upon the suitors, but that was not proposed by this bill. As regarded the question whether or not the tribunal could be respected unless its members were highly paid, the present tribunal had existed for thirty-five years, and none was more respected. There was no objection to making this a temporary measure if it were secured that those who were appointed under it should not be turned adrift at the end of three years, for if that were likely no one would be willing to accept the appointments. As to the proposed payments not being sufficient to insure the services of men who were qualified to take part in the hearing of cases which came before the Judicial Committee, that must be a matter of opinion, and although he had not made any proposition (for to do so would be indecent and improper), yet statements had incidentally been made to him which rendered him confident that an effective tribunal could be secured by means of this bill.—The bill passed through committee.

The Juries Bill.—Lord Romilly moved the second reading of this bill, saying he would explain its provisions on the order for committee.—This bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

July 18.—The War: Neutrality of England.—In reply to Mr. Vernon Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone said the Government would at once issue a proclamation of neutrality, and introduce a measure to amend the existing law, and to strengthen the hands of the Executive Government, in order the better to enforce its observance. The Government had taken into consideration the recommendations of the Commission of 1868, and, without pledging themselves to precise principles, would introduce a bill to secure the more complete and effectual fulfilment of all obligations that may be considered to attach to us in any contingency, under the law of nations, with respect to ships departing from our ports.

July 19.—The Case of Mr. Edmunds.—Mr. Russell-Gurney called attention to the incarceration of Mr. Edmunds at the suit of the Crown, and moved that the warrant of commitment be laid upon the table.—After a lengthy discussion the motion was agreed to.

The Case of Mr. Fennelly.—Mr. McMahon moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying for a free pardon to Mr. Fennelly.—The motion was rejected by a majority of 63 to 41.

Foreign Enlistment.—The Attorney-General obtained leave to bring in a bill to prevent the enlisting or engagement of her Majesty's subjects to serve in foreign service, and the building, fitting out, or equipping in her Majesty's dominions vessels for warlike purposes without her Majesty's licence.

July 20.—The Game Laws Abolition Bill was, on the adjourned debate for the second reading, thrown out by a majority of 147 to 59.

July 21.—The Vacant Lord Justiceship.—Mr. G. Gregory asked whether it was intended to complete the Court of Appeal in Chancery by filling up the vacancy caused by the death of Lord Justice Giffard, by whose death the country had sustained a great loss.—Mr. Gladstone.—I join in the sentiment expressed by the hon. gentleman as to the nature of the loss which the country has sustained by the death of Lord Justice Giffard, and it is the intention of the Government to fill up the vacancy which has thus occurred.

The Irish Land Bill.—The Lords' re-considered amendments were agreed to, with the exception of that striking out the discretion given to the Court of considering special reasons upon which ejectment for non-payment of rent should not be considered disturbance. The Commons agreed to this with the reservation that under £15 valuation the Court shall have power to inquire whether or not the rent has been excessive.

OBITUARY.

DR. W. ROBINSON.

The death of William Robinson, Esq., D.C.L., took place on the 11th July, at Stanhope-villa, Putney, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. Dr. Robinson was admitted an advocate of the College of Doctors of Law in November, 1830, and chiefly practised in the Court of Admiralty.

MR. S. HILL.

Mr. Stephen Hill, solicitor, of Salisbury, died in that city on the 6th of July, at the age of sixty-four years. He was certificated in 1831, and had been for some years in partnership with his son, Mr. Stephen Hill, who was admitted in 1854.

MR. J. HUNTER.

Mr. John Hunter, solicitor, of Newcastle and Gateshead, and clerk to the borough magistrates of the latter place, died of consumption on the 8th of July, at his residence, in Gateshead. Mr. Hunter, who was admitted in 1840, had for the past ten years been the legal adviser of the Gateshead bench, having been appointed in 1860, on the death of Mr. G. B. Reed.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

The annual meeting of members was held at the Law Institution, Chancery-lane, at 2 o'clock on Tuesday, the 19th inst., the chair being occupied by Mr. Lawrance, President. There was a very large attendance.

The Secretary (Mr. Williamson) having read the notice convening the meeting, the minutes of last meeting were taken as read, and Mr. William Ford, whose turn, it was stated by the Chairman, had come to act as President for the ensuing year, was unanimously elected to fill that office, Mr. Ouvre being elected Vice-President.

The retiring members of the council were also unanimously re-elected.

The CHAIRMAN said there were four other members of council to be elected, to fill vacancies caused by the decease of Messrs. E. Savage Bailey, W. Sharpe, and R. Wilson, and the resignation of Mr. Maynard. The gentleman who had been nominated to fill the first vacancy was Mr. F. G. Davidson; Messrs. W. B. Paterson, C. Claridge Druce, C. E. Jones, and W. A. Jevons were also nominated, so that there were five names for four vacancies.

Mr. SAUNDERS (Birmingham) begged leave to propose Mr. W. A. Jevons in the place of Mr. Davidson, not from any hostility to the latter gentleman, because he was totally unacquainted with him, but because he believed Mr. Jevons was as well qualified as anyone who could be selected, and he thought it desirable that the provinces should be more fully represented on the council.

Mr. COLBORNE said he understood that a rule was laid down as to the number of provincial members on the council, and on that ground he should support the nomination of the council. At present the proportion was one-ninth of the whole number, and as the vacancy had occurred by the death of a London member he thought another member from the metropolis should be elected in his place. If it were the opinion of the majority of the members that the provinces were not adequately represented, that was another question, and ought to be definitely brought forward and decided. Until this was done he thought, having a council, they should place confidence in them and support their nominees.

The CHAIRMAN said the rule had undoubtedly been to restrict the number of country members, because, in fact, all the work had to be done by the London members; Mr. Hopeshaw was the first country member elected, and since that time the number had been gradually increased to five, who were pretty evenly distributed over the kingdom.

Mr. SACNDERS said the total number of members was 2,379, of whom 1,746 resided in London, and 633 in the country, or rather more than a fourth.

Mr. TORR thought that if the number of provincial members on the council were increased it would attract a much larger number of country members, many of whom at present took no interest at all in the society. No doubt there was a good deal of work to do; but he thought twenty London members, with the occasional assistance of ten from the provinces, would be easily able to manage it, and he saw no reason why, if necessary, the total should not be increased even to the extent of thirty country members and twenty in London. This system had been carried out with the greatest success in the case of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association, the directors of which were chosen from the provinces in the proportion of two to one. He believed some such arrangement was necessary in order to the prestige of the society, and to make it really represent the profession at large.

The CHAIRMAN said that many of the London members were connected with agency firms, and thus represented country members in the largest sense of the term. In the case of the London and Provincial Law Association, he remembered, whilst a member of the committee of management, that there was often a difficulty in forming a quorum.

On the names being put to the meeting, Mr. Davidson was elected by a large majority. Messrs. Paterson, Druce, and Jones were then elected without opposition; and Messrs. Bird, Markby and Mills, the retiring auditors, were unanimously re-elected.

The CHAIRMAN said the next business was the consideration of the report, which he supposed would be taken as read.

Mr. J. J. MERRIMAN said he had a matter to bring before the meeting, which he thought fairly arose out of the substance of the report, though, at the same time he should like to take the opinion of the chairman as to whether it would come better in the form of a resolution at a subsequent period of the meeting. He had endeavoured to give a practical effect and substance to those frequent inspirations which had been heretofore embodied in vague and indefinite resolutions for the improvement of the status of the profession, and to suggest some means for curtailing the monopoly of the bar which was constantly encroaching upon what fairly belonged to their own branch of the profession, which was not only an injury to them personally, but he unhesitatingly affirmed—and it was only on this ground that they could ever expect anything to be done—it was also greatly detrimental to the interests of the public. After the matured consideration he had been able to give to the matter he had drawn a bill, which he now begged leave to submit, as a tolerably clear embodiment of the opinions of the council as shown in the report. The recitals were as follows:—

"Whereas, by several Acts now in force, attorneys and solicitors are disqualified to hold various judicial and other public offices and appointments.

"And whereas the public interests have suffered by such disqualifications, and it is expedient that attorneys and solicitors should be eligible and qualified to fill such offices and appointments, under proper limitations and conditions.

In these he believed every one would concur, and the enacting clauses were short and only two in number, viz.:—

"Whenever in any Act now in force or operation it is enacted that any judicial or other public office and appointment, including the offices of county court judge or stipendiary magistrate, shall be held or occupied by a barrister, or serjeant-at-law, counsel or certificated conveyancer, the said Acts shall be read and construed as if the words 'or an attorney-at-law and solicitor of the High Court of Chancery in England and Wales, having been in the practice of his profession, and been a member of 'the Incorporated Law Society' for the space or term of — years previous to his said appointment,' were also included in the enactment.

"That no barrister or serjeant-at-law shall hereafter be eligible or qualified to fill the office of solicitor to the Treasury, the War Office, the Admiralty, or any other department of the State or public service, and that such offices of solicitor to any and every department of the State or public service, shall be filled by any attorney and solicitor, who shall, previous to his appointment, have been in the practice of his profession, and a member of 'the Incorporated Law Society,' for — years at the least."

He should propose as a resolution that the above be taken into consideration by the council, but he was in the hands of the chairman whether he should defer moving it until later.

The CHAIRMAN thought the report had better be disposed of first.

A MEMBER asked what additional rent would have to be paid by the club for the additional accommodation now provided.

The CHAIRMAN said they would be only too happy to retain the club as tenants on the same terms as before. The alterations were made principally for the purpose of affording additional accommodation for the students, but at the same time it was thought desirable to increase the conveniences afforded to the club, which had always been considered one of the most valuable adjuncts of the institution.

Mr. COLBORNE said he had one or two remarks to make in accordance with notice he had sent, on some topics which were treated in the report. The first subject treated of was "The Attorneys' and Solicitors' Remuneration Bill." With regard to the principle that an agreement might be made for remuneration by a gross sum, by a commission, or by salary, or otherwise, it was well known that in the case of railway companies, and corporations, and municipal bodies requiring the services of a town clerk, it had long been the practice to agree upon a fixed salary, and he must say he disagreed with the following sentence in the report:—"The bill also contains the much needed provision that the taxing master is upon any taxation of costs, subject to general rules or orders hereafter to be made, to have regard in allowing remuneration to the solicitor for his services, to the skill, labour, and responsibility involved." Who was to be the judge of that? The very things which a taxing master always ignored were skill, labour, responsibility, and time. If any matter were pushed through in a short time by the energy and skill of the attorney or solicitor, the taxing master would almost annihilate the bill of costs, whereas if it dragged on for a long time, and there were numerous charges for routine matters which could be done by any clerk in the office, they were allowed amply. To give an instance within his own knowledge. He had conducted an arbitration for eight days in opposition to the solicitors of a powerful railway company, aided by a Q.C., and on the last day, in order to save another adjournment, they sat from 10 a.m. until 8 p.m., when he concluded with a two hours' summing up of his case, and for this, which was considered a day's work, although it really involved the work of three, he was allowed the munificent sum of four guineas! whereas if he had retained counsel the fees would have been probably 100 or 120 guineas. Unless, therefore, there was some honest court of appeal to which the decisions of the taxing masters, especially those in the common law offices, who, being barristers, were in his opinion not fitted for their positions, he thought this provision would be null and void. The taxing masters in chancery were much more competent men, but in many cases he believed those in the other branch of the law, being barristers, looked upon attornies simply as the catspaw by which the chestnuts were to be pulled out of the fire for the benefit of the gentlemen of the long robe. With regard to the section having reference to the improvement of legal education, he found Sir R. Palmer was of opinion that they were not sufficiently educated, but he believed the anxiety and responsibility which devolved upon them in conducting their clients' business formed the best education they could have. The gentlemen to whom he had referred seemed to think they should be highly educated and take degrees, and yet still continue to be subservient to the other branch of the profession. He had no objection to the educational part of the process, or to the raising of their social status, but he thought the restrictions ought to be removed which prevented their pleading in the superior courts. There was evidently no ground for this distinction, because they were at present allowed to conduct important matters before courts of arbitration and to appear before Parliamentary committees, and, indeed, in the latter case it was often much more to the interest of the client that the solicitor who was acquainted with all the local details should conduct the case, rather than endeavour hopelessly to cram them in a short time into the head of a barrister, however clever. He quite agreed that there ought to be a school of law for judges and judicial functionaries, but it ought not to be at the expense of the public or of the other branch of the profession; and now that they were invited to go hand in hand with societies representing barristers in promoting legal education he thought it was the time to ask whether this distinction was still to be kept up, and if so to what degree. It might be a question whether it would be advisable to abolish all distinctions, though this had been done in the United States; but at any rate solicitors and attorneys ought to be allowed to plead in the higher courts. Then there were many important questions with regard to counsel's fees. He had no objection to the best men receiving the highest pay, and indeed this would always be the case, but he did object to the responsibility lying upon them, and desired to impress upon the council the necessity of laying down some rules upon this subject. An attorney did not dare to let a counsel go into court sulky or dissatisfied with his fee, though he had known some disgraceful cases of the sort, which he was sorry to say it was quite useless to bring before the benchers. With regard to the constitution of the council he thought it a fair question whether it might not be improved by the addition of more country members, but if this course were adopted it should be done on due consideration, and he hoped the distinction would be offered to men of long standing and moderate practice, who would look upon it, as it was in truth, as the blue ribbon of the profession.

Mr. MARRIOTT said the relations between the two branches of the profession much needed amendment, and he might particularly mention a rule which obtained at the bar, by which, if any counsel were dissatisfied with a solicitor, no matter on what ground, he might send a note to the other counsel engaged in the same cause, and not one of them would appear until the cause of dissatisfaction was removed. He had known such a thing to occur, and he could only say it was a relic of barbarism, and ought to be abolished. At present they were entirely in the hands of counsel.

Mr. HARSTON said he had had some experience at the bar himself, but he had never heard of such a case as had been stated by the last speaker, and did not believe the rule existed in the broad form in which it had been stated.

Mr. MARRIOTT said he could give all the particulars of the instance to which he had alluded.

Mr. HARSTON regretted that the report contained no allusion to the unjust taxation to which solicitors were subjected on taking out their certificates. It was stated specifically in the report that the council approved of the Attorneys and Solicitors' Remuneration Bill, but he did not think as it stood at present that it was for the benefit of the profession, and he much regretted that there should be cause, if there was cause, for what had been stated by Lord Chelmsford in the House of Lords, that there were attorneys whom he did not trust. The object of the bill was to enable a clever man of high class to obtain better remuneration for his services than another, but he did not think it would ever have this effect unless there were a clause providing that the agreement might be submitted and approved by some competent authority before the work was done. He objected, not to the amount, but on principle, to the society making a grant of £142 to the council of law reporting, because it was really contributing to an enterprise which interfered materially with the ordinary commerce of the country. With regard to the status of the profession he must say that he had been much galled by the remarks of Lord Chelmsford, and it seemed to him incontestable either that the council did not possess sufficient power to deal with unworthy members of the profession, or that they did not properly exercise the powers they had.

Mr. ROSE said he should advise any gentleman who made an agreement with his client, to keep, notwithstanding, a strict ruling of his costs in the regular way for his own protection. He did not think they ought to be offended because a noble lord in his place in Parliament had exercised the right of expressing his own opinion, especially as he had said substantially much the same as their own council, who reported that there had been no diminution in the number of communications made regarding the misconduct of attorneys and solicitors. Whilst expressing his unfeigned respect and regard for every member of the council, not one of whom should he like to see changed, he must say he did not think the interests of the profession were sufficiently attended to. They had before them a report of forty pages, dealing with many most important matters which it was impossible adequately to discuss at such a meeting as the present, and, therefore, it was desirable that other means should be taken for ascertaining the opinions of the whole profession upon them. In other societies, such as the Royal Society, the Royal Institution, the Society of Arts, and those societies which had for their object the amendment of the law, weekly meetings were held for discussion and deliberation, and he did not see why they should be an exception. With regard to the concentration of the law courts he did not think the council were entitled to so much credit as some were disposed to give them for bringing back the courts to the Carey-street site, and they might, at all events have endeavoured to alter the title of the High Court of Justice Bill, the only court which ever bore that name, as far as he knew, being the one which tried Charles I. in the time of Cromwell. He did not know much about the fusion of law and equity, but he thought it unwise to put a common law judge to administer a system of which he knew nothing. With regard to the Stamps on Building Leases Bill, the Stamp Duties Bill, and the Mortgages Bill he gave the council all due credit, but the Married Women's Property Bill he looked upon as a complete subversion of English law, religion, and morals, and one which had been decided upon evidence absolutely false. He had always been in favour of a division between the two branches of the profession, but he must say there was a wonderfully grasping spirit about barristers in general, and he thought the time was come when attorneys should make a struggle, and when parties should have the option of saying whether or not they would have the assistance of counsel, or whether their cases should be advocated by an attorney or solicitor. He was quite aware of the advantages of having an advocate who had been trained to that particular duty, who did not come in contact with the witnesses, and who had his brief prepared for him; but still, there was something to be said on the other side. If a counsel took a brief knowing he could not attend to it, he committed a gross fraud, but he must say that it was wonderful how barristers looked after their cases as well as they did, particularly at common law, where the leaders did not, as in chancery, confine themselves to one court, and where he had known seven special juries sitting at one time. The Court of Chancery would do very well if the Ministry would let it. If there were two Lords Justices to reverse the decisions of one Vice-Chancellor, so that suitors might feel sure that their cases would be heard and decided upon the law and merits of the case, it would be the most complete and perfect system of jurisprudence in the world; but he wanted to know where was the influence of the council upon the government when the Court of Appeal had remained in so scandalous a state as it had during the whole of the present year. When there was a good appeal court it was of no use bringing a sham appeal, because it would be heard in three weeks or a month, and there would be costs to pay; but when appeals could not be heard for many months, it was often worth while to appeal simply for the sake of tying up the cause. In the olden time the council issued the Legal Observer every week, and were thus in constant communication with the members, and this was certainly necessary in a profession which, more than any other, demanded almost universal knowledge on the part of those belonging to it. In his opinion, the best members of the profession ought to be asked to read papers on those important subjects which were mentioned in the report, and means ought to be taken for collecting the opinion of the profession at large as to those alterations in the law which were considered beneficial to them, and more especially so to the public at large.

The CHAIRMAN, in reply to a question, said that it was the intention of the council, as soon as the scheme of the Legal Education Association was put forward in a definite form, to call a public meeting of the profession to consider it.

Mr. EDWIN KIMBER said he quite agreed with a good deal of what had been said by Mr. Rose; there certainly ought to be more communication between the council and the members with regard to the provision mentioned in p. 4, that validity is not to be given to any agreement by which a solicitor stipulated for payment only in the event of the success of a suit; the whole profession wanted to know whether such agreement would be valid against the solicitor though not against the client. They wanted their interests more thoroughly looked after, and also the advantage of the public, for the two must go together. He agreed with those who said that the monopoly of the bar should not be allowed to exist any longer, and he must say he was perfectly astonished to find that when a member of the council got up in the House of Commons on a question of the greatest importance to the whole profession and to the public, the House was miserably counted out. He could not understand such a question being brought forward without some means having been taken to make a House.

Mr. TORR wished to ask what had been done upon the question of costs, as to which the report was again silent.

Mr. BURTON said that some three years ago, in the time of Lord Westbury, the council made considerable progress in the preparation of a new order of court, the main principle of which received the sanction of the Lord Chancellor and of two of the Vice-Chancellors, but which stood over because of some objection on some points entertained by the masters. The resignation of Lord Westbury then put a stop to further progress, and from that time there had been so many judicial changes that it was impossible to do anything. The council had, however, been in communication with the present Lord Chancellor and the taxing masters upon the subject, and also upon the question of lunacy costs, which called loudly for amendment; but owing to the important legal reforms which the Lord Chancellor contemplated, it was considered useless to press him upon the subject at present. The taxing masters, however, seemed favourably disposed, and the council would re-open communications with them at the conclusion of the present session.

The CHAIRMAN, in replying to the observations which had been made, said there could be no better proof that the members of the council were not sinecurists than the lengthy report which they had issued, treating as it did, of so many and such important subjects. With regard to the Attorneys and Solicitors' Remuneration Bill, the council, feeling somewhat aggrieved at the action and language of Lord Chelmsford in the matter, particularly as he had been for so many years their standing counsel, directed him to write to the noble lord on the subject. The Chairman then read the correspondence, including a resolution to the effect that the council were of opinion that the proposed amendment would neutralise the good effect of the bill. The reply of Lord Chelmsford set forth in detail his reasons for moving the amendment, one of which was, that when the bill was originally introduced by Lord Westbury it was only intended to apply to conveyancing business. He did not think the higher class of solicitors and attorneys would be very likely to make agreements for conducting litigation, and if they did they need not fear the scrutiny of the taxing master. The chairman, after reading it, said it seemed very conclusive, and its very existence showed the important position to which the society had attained, and the courtesy with which it was treated. His own opinion was that the new bill would not be of much practical service, and certainly a taxing master was not the best man to form an opinion as to the amount of skill and labour bestowed in bringing a suit to a speedy termination, for when a deputation waited upon the Master of the Rolls and two of the Vice-Chancellors to urge that some such power should be conferred upon them, they protested against having any such duty imposed upon them, and said they were wholly incapable of forming an opinion upon such a subject. The donation of £142 had been simply made in what amongst gentlemen he might call a gentlemanly spirit, it being understood that the remuneration payable to the various editors would depend in some measure upon whether that amount and others advanced by similar bodies were to be considered as a debt against the Council of Law Reporting. He hardly knew how to meet so formidable an antagonist as Mr. Rose, though he believed there was no one who had more at heart the interest and welfare of the profession, or who would more cordially support the council. Amongst other things, he had treated of the relations between the bar and their own branch of the profession as likely to be affected by the new scheme of legal education. It was impossible to speak definitely on that subject at present, but the interests of solicitors would be carefully watched, and as there were nineteen out of the thirty members of the council on the list of directors of the Legal Education Association, he did not think there was much to fear. He was sure Mr. Rose would not object to the bar being educated, at all events—and he spoke seriously—up to their own standard. Men came from the universities with all their blushing honours thick upon them, and vaulted almost immediately into the arena of professional life, entirely untrained in the details of the profession by which they expected to get their living; whereas an attorney had to pass a preliminary, intermediate and final examination, in addition to which he had the advantage of the classes and lectures which had recently been established. They must march with the times in the great question of education, but at the same time they intended to preserve the integrity of their own branch of the profession, and not be dragged at the chariot-wheels of any movement which would in the slightest degree tend to destroy their independence. No doubt they had grievances, but he was in hopes that when the bar had the advantage of more illumination they would be ashamed of those things which were now sometimes done, of course through their clerks. No doubt there would be many details to be considered, but nothing would be done on their part without calling a meeting of the profession, which he hoped would be the largest ever held in that hall. Mr. Rose had proposed that they should meet oftener, but he did not know how, when, or where they were to meet, or what for, and he would remind the members that a limited number of the profession had at all times the power of calling a meeting.

The motion for the adoption of the report was then put and carried unanimously, as was also the auditors' report, the broad effect of which was that the annual income of the society was about £2,000, to meet an expenditure of about £1,710.

The CHAIRMAN then proposed a resolution for reimbursing Mr. Chester the sum of £110, expenses which he had been put to in defending an action for defamation in consequence of information which he had given as to the conduct of an articulated clerk which led to his being refused admission to examination and to his master being struck off the rolls. The resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. ROBERTSON submitted a resolution pledging the meeting to an approval of the Mid-London Railway scheme, which included the formation of a new roadway from Holborn and the Strand to Lincoln's-inn-fields, giving improved access to the new Courts of Law both by road and rail. After some discussion, several members objecting to the principle of such a resolution in the absence of any evidence on the other side, and the Chairman having stated that the council had already given their conditional support to the scheme, Mr. Robertson withdrew the resolution.

Mr. J. J. MERRIMAN said it was evident that so broad and serious a matter as that opened up by the draft bill he had laid before the meeting could not be fairly considered at such a late hour, and, therefore, in order that it might be put in proper shape he had altered the resolution he had intended to propose, and should now submit it in the following form:—

"That the council of the Incorporated Law Society be requested to consider the expediency of calling the attention of Parliament to the injustice now done to the attorneys and solicitors of England and Wales, and to the prejudice of the public service, by their exclusion from various minor political and other public offices and appointments; and that the council be further requested to consider the expediency of endeavouring to obtain the enactment of a measure which shall qualify attorneys and solicitors to hold such judicial and other public offices and appointments as their special ability and experience render them well-fitted to hold with advantage the public service."

Everyone must admit that the monopoly which they possessed rested upon services which they contributed as an equivalent to the public: and, of course, if they asked for the abolition of any disability under which they laboured, the onus would lie upon them to show that the removal of the disability would tend to promote the public interest, and was desirable on the ground of public policy. Without going into detail, either of compliment or censure, he ventured to broadly state this proposition as one which could not be controverted, that the present area of selection open to advisers of the Crown was so limited that proper men could not be found to fill the offices. Over and over again at meetings of the Law Amendment Society and the Social Science Association, he had heard it stated, and it was a fact, that the public appointments to minor judicial offices were a scandal and a disgrace to the country. Of course, such a sweeping censure applied only to a certain number of cases, and a large number must be excepted, but still there was hardly a number of the Law Times issued which did not repeat from the columns of some provincial newspaper an instance of ungentlemanly and almost injudicial conduct on the part of a county court judge. Although many of these gentlemen were scarcely second in point of ability or moral character to the superior judges, still there were many exceptions, and he could only attribute the appointments of such men to the area of selection being unduly narrowed. Again, with regard to the office of a stipendiary magistrate, they all knew that the amount of legal training required was exceeding small, but what was desired was a large practical acquaintance with the every-day business of the world, and there was no doubt that the experience and training of a solicitor fitted him to fill such an office pari passu much better than a barrister. If these two offices were thrown open it would do more than anything else in his opinion to improve the social status of the profession. At the present moment there was a hard and fast line drawn between the two branches which every rising man felt to be a great restraint upon him. He himself had been strongly urged not to waste his time in that branch of the profession to which he had devoted himself, but to go to the bar; and from the second year of his articles down to the present moment he had been compelled to regret the step he had taken, although he had no reason to complain of the amount of success which had hitherto attended him. At the same time he felt this—and it was a consideration which must have pressed upon many other gentlemen—that there was nothing in the nature of things to prevent a man in his position, at the age of fifty or fifty-five, from holding a minor judicial appointment, such as at present it was provided by statute should be held only by a barrister of five or seven years' standing. It seemed to him that such a rule was quite repugnant to the common law, and experience had shown that it was detrimental to the public interest. On these grounds he had some time ago prepared the bill which he had now submitted, but he thought it only due to the council of that society that it should be first submitted to them, and that with their approval it would be more likely to pass into law; but if there were any difficulty about Mr. Gregory taking up this matter, he could himself easily get two members to place their names on the back of the bill, and he believed there would be much less difficulty in passing it than in carrying a broad measure like that for legal education or any matter intended to benefit solicitors in an indirect way.

Mr. W. S. MASTERMAN seconded the resolution, and Mr. SAUNDERS, of Birmingham, also expressed his entire concurrence in it.

Mr. B. J. WATSON said he much regretted that previous notice should not have been given of such an important matter being intended to be introduced, and he quite agreed that the passing of such a measure would do more than anything else to raise the status of the profession; the pecuniary remuneration he did not care so much about, and he only wished he had any reasonable hope of seeing such an Act become law. He would remind the meeting of a fact which they had perhaps forgotten, that many years ago, an Act of a somewhat similar character was passed, putting attorneys of a certain number of years' standing, say ten, in the matter of these appointments, on the same footing as barristers of say seven years' standing. He had no objection to this slight distinction, and was quite willing to admit that the bar might represent the cavalry while they played the part of the more serviceable infantry, but the next year that Act was repealed, attorneys were altogether disqualified, and only barristers of ten years' standing were declared eligible as county court judges. He did not want to pull down the bar, indeed many of them had sons at the bar, but they wanted to raise themselves, and he hoped the bill of Mr. Merriman might speedily become the law of the land.

Mr. COLBORNE inquired if any provision were made for removing the disability which attorneys and solicitors laboured under with regard to the office of magistrates in boroughs, except while they filled the office of mayor, and ex-mayor. He said this greatly affected their social position in the country.

Mr. MERRIMAN said this question had occurred to his mind, but he had been desirous of simplifying the matter as much as possible, and of opening offices of emolument as well as of honour. It was also within his own knowledge that in many cases solicitors were placed on the commission of the peace after they had retired from practice, and he must confess that there would be many difficulties in the way of a practising solicitor holding the office of magistrate. At the same time this bill was open to any amendment which the council or the members might wish to introduce.

The CHAIRMAN said he apprehended there could not be any objection to the resolution; the council had already passed a resolution to much the same effect, and it would have been struggled for on the last occasion, but it was feared to endanger the success of the measure then in progress.

Mr. MERRIMAN said he had been astonished to see how destitute of any practical result had been the suggestions heretofore made for improving the social status of the profession. As conductor for many years of a public newspaper he had had some facilities for gauging the force of public opinion, and he believed that a simple bill of this kind, affirming a broad principle of public policy, would have a much better chance of passing than one of a more complex and indirect character.

Mr. SAUNDERS said, when county courts were introduced in 1847, the motion that attorneys should be eligible as judges was only lost by a very small majority, and they had certainly much more influence in the House of Commons at the present time than they had then.

Mr. MUNTON and Mr. KIMBER also supported the resolution which was carried without opposition.

The proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the chairman for his able conduct in the chair and for the valuable assistance which he had rendered to the society during the past year.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE AND THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION BILLS.

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The humble Petition of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association

Sheweth,—That on the appointment by her Majesty on the 18th September, 1867, of Commissioners to inquire into the operation and effect of the present constitution of the several courts of law and equity in England, your petitioners took a lively interest in such inquiry, and, after earnest consideration of the subjects so referred, joined with the Council of the Incorporated Law Society in making various suggestions to the Royal Commissioners, and especially expressed their opinion that the present separation of jurisdiction was injurious to the suitors and that one general court ought to be established.

That your petitioners have felt much gratification at the recommendations in this respect made by the Royal Commissioners in their report submitted to her Majesty and presented to your honourable House.

That your petitioners have observed with great satisfaction the introduction into your honourable House of two bills shortly intitled "The High Court of Justice Act, 1870," and "The Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1870," for the purpose of carrying into effect the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners.

That in the judgment of your petitioners it is most essential to the interests of the community that the proposed abolition of the present distinctions between courts of equity and courts of law should be made without delay, and they respectfully submit that the preparation of rules providing for the regulation of all matters relating to the institution and conduct of business, or incidental to, or connected with, the administration of justice in such courts when consolidated, may be properly deferred until after the said bills now before your honourable House shall have become law.

Your petitioners, therefore, humbly pray that your honourable House will not delay to give effect to the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners, but will be pleased to pass, with such amendments as may be necessary or expedient, the said bills for the establishment of a High Court of Justice and a Court of Appellate Jurisdiction.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

(Signed) J. FRED. BEEVER, Chairman.

(Signed) PHILIP RICKMAN, Secretary.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

This week has witnessed a continuance of last weeks' agitation; at one time the markets were in an almost "hysterical" condition, sinking at every offer to sell. At length, however, the low prices have begun to tempt investors, and a small but steady current of purchases has set in, made by bond file investors. In the present state of Continental affairs it is impossible to predict the state of the markets a week hence, but the present moment exhibits a tendency to improvement. The bank rate of discount has moved up to 3½ per cent.

Mr. W. N. Maroy, solicitor, and clerk of the peace for Woresstershire, has purchased the manor of Bewdley.

Mr. Julian Goldsmid, barrister-at-law, of Somerhill, near Tunbridge, has been elected in the Liberal interest as M.P. for Rochester, in succession to the late Mr. Serjeant Kinglake. Mr. Goldsmid is the eldest and only surviving son of the late Mr. Frederic David Goldsmid (who was M.P. for Honiton from July, 1865, till his death in March, 1866), by Caroline, only daughter of Philip Samuel, Esq., of Bedford-place, Russell-square; he is therefore a nephew of Sir Francis H. Goldsmid, Q.C., M.P. for Reading, to whose baronetcy he is heir-presumptive. He was born in 1838, and was educated at University College, London, of which institution he became a fellow; he matriculated at the London University in 1856, and graduated B.A. in 1859, taking the first place in classics. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in January, 1864, joining the Oxford Circuit. He was elected M.P. for Honiton in 1866, and continued to represent that now disfranchised borough till the general election of 1868, when he was an unsuccessful candidate for Mid-Surrey. He is a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for the county of Kent.

By order of the Board,
F. ALLAN CURTIS, Actuary and Secretary.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT.

Amsterdam Exhibition, 1869. First Prize, being above the Gold Medal. Supplied to the British, French, Prussian, Russian, Italian, Dutch, and other Governments. Dr. Lankester writes regarding Extract of Meat:—"But there is a difference in flavour, and here, as in all other kinds of food, it is the flavour that makes the quality." It is essentially on account of the fine meaty flavour, as distinguished from the burnt taste of other Extracts, the LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT defeated all Australian and other sorts at Paris, Havre and Amsterdam, and is so universally preferred in all European markets.

One pint of fine-flavoured Beef-tea at 2½d. Most convenient and economical "stock."

CARTON.—Require Baron Liebig's, the inventor's, signature on every Jar, and ask distinctly for LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT.

LONDON, JULY 30, 1870.

THE WAR BETWEEN FRANCE AND PRUSSIA will make it necessary for commercial lawyers to rub up their old lore on the subject of "contraband," a topic of much import to shippers, ship-owners, and insurers. The decision whether any particular cargo of goods is or is not contraband of war lies theoretically as well as practically with the Prize Court of the capturing power, whose decision is a decision in rem, and not to be impugned in any court. It will be remembered that though a foreign judgment in personam may be reviewed, a foreign judgment in rem may not. There has indeed been a disposition on the part of the present Lord Chancellor, among other judges, to hold that even a foreign judgment in rem may be reviewed if on its face it has proceeded on a gross disregard of the comity of nations (see Simpson v. Fogo, 11 W. R. 418; and the report of Castrique v. Imrie, in the Exchequer Chamber, 9 W. R. 455); but it is in a high degree improbable that a foreign Prize Court decision would ever be disregarded by any of our courts. Indeed apart from their being decisions in rem there appears to be a sort of understanding that Prize Court decisions are conclusive on the matters before them. When we speak of a Prize Court decision being unquestionable in the court of another power we shall of course be understood as meaning unquestionable for the purposes of questions arising in the foreign court and hinging upon the question decided in the Prize Court, as, for instance, in insurance matters.

Contraband may be confiscated by the captor, beyond which there is this further consequence, that any insurance upon it is void. A contract to insure contraband is void, because it is a contract to export under circumstances which render the exportation illegal, and if the act be illegal, an insurance to protect the act is illegal likewise.

At the present moment all sorts of questions are being asked as to whether or not this, that, and the other is contraband of war. Without following Grotius into his three classifications of munitions of war, goods applicable for pleasure and not for war, and goods of a mixed nature (incipitis usus), we will state as shortly as we can the present acceptance of the subject. All muniments of war conveyed to a belligerent are of course contraband; also all goods conveyed to a blockaded port. As to what is or is not a blockaded port, it is material to notice the 4th article of the French Emperor's proclamation, that "blockades, in order to be binding, must be effectual; that is they must maintained by a force really sufficient to prevent the enemy from obtaining access to the coast"—this merely expresses what has been decided in our own English courts. Two things are necessary to constitute a blockade binding on neutrals—first, that it should be notified to their country; and secondly that there should be really a substantial blockade. It is not enough for a belligerent to proclaim a blockade which he cannot maintain, but of course a blockade does not necessarily cease to be a blockade because one or two vessels manage to run the gauntlet. The blockading power is entitled to consider its notification of a blockade to the Government of a neutral power as a notification to all the subjects of that power. But it seems that, with reference to the validity of an insurance, there is no such rule, and the knowledge of the insurers is a question of fact to be determined (Lord Tenterden in Harratt v. Wise, 9 B. & C. 717). In Naylor v. Tylor (ib. 721) a master sailed to a port not knowing whether it was blockaded or no, and not intending to violate the blockade; the policy, also, on the ship was framed upon a doubt whether the blockade would be subsisting by the time the ship arrived out; it was held that the voyage, and therefore the policy, was not illegal. We need not, of course, say that all persons would be regarded as having notice of matters of public notoriety.

As to goods in general, no hard and fast definition of contraband is possible. The doctrine of "occasional contraband" (i.e., that destination, &c., &c., may make anything contraband) has, indeed, been found fault with by some text writers, but may be regarded as established in modern use. For the purposes of the present war, it must be assumed that all sorts of things may be contraband according to their destination, the exigencies of the belligerent at the port to which they are addressed, and a hundred other varying circumstances. Coal, for instance, may fairly be considered contraband if conveyed to a port in which belligerent steam-rams are lying. Resin, rope, and other articles capable of being "naval stores" may be contraband when shipped for a belligerent dockyard port. Horses may be contraband if shipped out to be landed for belligerent use. Provisions may be contraband if intended for the same end (some writers have maintained that such necessities ought to be incapable of being contraband, but that is not the rule now at any rate). Some articles are from their nature more capable of being contraband than others; thus it is very easy to understand the circumstances under which a cargo of saltpetre might be contraband, but (except, of course, as exported from or imported into a blockaded port) it is almost impossible to conceive how a cargo of violins could be contraband.

It may be useful to give a few notes of "contraband" cases decided by our own Court during the last French war.

In The Jonge Margaretha (1 Rob. 193), Sir Wm. Scott (afterwards Lord Stowell) observing that provisions "generally are not contraband, but may become so under circumstances arising out of the particular situation of the war, or the condition of the parties engaged in it," held that a cargo of cheese shipped by a Papenberg merchant from Amsterdam to Brest was contraband, Brest being a naval arsenal of France, in The Zelden Rust (6 Rob. 93) a cargo of cheese shipped from Amsterdam to Corunna was held contraband, Corunna being, "from its vicinity to Ferrol, a place of naval equipment, almost identified with that port." In these cases notice was taken of the fact that the cheese was of the quality served out in the French navy. But in The Frau Margaretha (6 Rob. 92) similar cheese shipped from Amsterdam to Quimper was held not contraband, on a presumption that Quimper, though near Brest, was sufficiently remote for carriage purposes to rebut a presumption of the cheese being destined thither. In these modern days of railway transit this consideration would be hardly applicable. In The Range (6 Rob. 127), it appearing that a cargo of biscuit for Cadiz was shipped under false papers, and had come from the public stores at Bordeaux, both ship and cargo were condemned. In The Edward (4 Rob. 69) wine was seized in a Prussian ship, ostensibly bound from Bordeaux to Embden, but hovering near the French coast. Here the Court examined the ship's log, and arriving, by the assistance of the Trinity Elder Brethren, at the conclusion that the intention was to get into Brest condemned the cargo.

In The Charlotte (Noch) (5 Rob. 275), Swedish copper, in sheets, but not adapted for ship-sheathing, was held not contraband. In The Graeffen Van Gottland (H. of L. not reported), a shipment of masts in a Russian ship for Cadiz, was condemned. The latter decision was commented on in the judgment in The Charlotte (Koltzenburg), 5 Rob. 305, in which a cargo of masts in a Russian ship for Nantes (a mercantile port), was condemned, the Court holding that with regard to an article such as masts, the character of the port of destination was immaterial, since even in a mercantile port masts might be fitted into privateers (but note that privateering is not on foot as between France and Prussia). In The Tree Geffronen (4 Rob. 242), Sir William Scott laid it down that pitch and tar are universally contraband, "unless protected by treaty, or unless it is shown that they are the produce of the country from which they are exported." Similarly, in The Neptunus (8 Rob. 108) it was held that sailcloth is universally contraband, even when destined for ports of mere mercantile equipment.

We may also remind the reader that as regards mixed cargoes, "to escape from the contagion of the contraband, the innocent articles must be the property of a different owner" (Bynkershoek, and see The Staat Embden, 1 Rob. 30). Where a doubtful cargo is seized and afterwards released by the Prize Court, it is a frequent practice to saddle it with the captor's expenses (see The Gute Gesellschaft Michael, 4 Rob. 95).

WE SAID LAST WEEK, in commenting upon the recommendations of the county court committee of the Judicature Commission, that that committee were misled by a false analogy when they inferred from the working of the system prevailing in such courts as the Mayor's Court, that the banking system (i.e., the system by which the Court itself receives all sums awarded to be paid and keeps the accounts relating to them), might safely be abandoned in the county courts. We said that courts such as the Mayor's Court have to do with a wholly different class of suits from the county courts. A few figures will make our view clearer. In the year 1868 there were 10,080 plaintiffs in the Mayor's Court, of which forty-six were for sums under £5. In 1850, the last year for which returns as to this precise point are obtainable, of every thousand plaintiffs in the county courts 811 were for sums of £5 or less. And in 1850 the average amount sued for in the county courts was higher than it is now, so that presumably the proportion of claims below £5 must be even larger now than it was then. The result is that in the Mayor's Court the cases in which the amount claimed is under £5 are less than one-half per cent. of the total number of cases; in the county courts they are more than eighty per cent.

THE SUBJECT OF SERVING COUNTY COURT SUMMONSES by plaintiffs or their attorneys or employés has some little light thrown upon it by the recent return of county court business. We need not remind our readers that under section 2 of the Act of 1867 it is optional on the part of a plaintiff whether he has his summons served by the bailiff of the court or by himself or representative. According to the return for last year, there were 25,726 summonses issued under section 2, but only 5,869 were to be served otherwise than by bailiffs; or, in other words, about one plaintiff in five declined the services of the bailiff. The return does not show how many were taken out to be actually served by plaintiffs themselves, but from other sources we learn that the number is very small indeed. It rarely happens that a plaintiff elects to be his own process server without indicating a desire to insult the defendant, a proceeding which certainly ought not to be encouraged by law. In some parts of the country there appears to be a far greater proportion of services by bailiffs than in other parts. In circuits 1 and 37 the bailiffs served all but something under two per cent., while in circuits 11 and 23 they served not quite

50 per cent. This may be explained in more ways than one. One possible explanation is that some bailiffs are more careful and therefore more trusted than others. If this be the case, what we want is more supervision.

WE UNDERSTAND THAT THE GOVERNMENT have not adhered to their idea of postponing, until after the Long Vacation, their appointment to the vacancy in the Lords Justices' Court, and that Mr. Mellish, Q.C., is to be the new judge. Certainly, as a rule, the Chancery bench should be filled from the Chancery bar, but we do not think that the Court of Chancery is otherwise than benefited by being now and then freshened up, as it were, by a first-rate common lawyer. Mr. Mellish is certainly admirable at common law, besides which he bears the reputation of knowing every other kind of law. Altogether the appointment is an excellent one. Of course the new Lord Justice will not take his seat until after the Long Vacation, but the Government will have done very wisely in filling up the appointment at once. It frequently, nay usually happens, when a Queen's Counsel is raised to the bench, that a considerable temporary inconvenience is entailed on parties for whom he has been concerned, and who are suddenly deprived of his services. By making the appointment immediately before the Long Vacation this will be reduced to a minimum.

NEUTRALITY LAWS.

On the 18th of this month Mr. Gladstone stated in the House of Commons that the Government had taken into consideration the recommendation of the Neutrality Laws Commission of 1868, and that it was the intention of the Government to introduce a bill "to secure the more complete and effectual fulfilment of all obligations that may be considered to attach to us in any contingency under the law of nations with respect to ships departing from our ports." In accordance with this statement a bill has since been introduced into the House and printed.

Before examining what alterations in the existing law are required for the more complete fulfilment of the obligation of the law of nations, let us attempt to clear away some of the confusion of thought which is often displayed in discussions upon this subject. The law of nations, or international law, as it is now most generally called, is the law which regulates the relations of sovereign states towards one another, as municipal law regulates the relations in which the citizens of a particular state stand towards one another. For instance, it is a rule of international law that one state cannot enforce its laws against, or exercise any jurisdiction over persons or property within the territory of another state. This carries out amongst states the rule of municipal law which in England is expressed by saying that "every man's house is his castle." A particular course of conduct has, in fact, been marked out by the common consent of nations, to which all states are expected to conform. In this way the idea has grown up that states have certain rights against, and certain duties towards, one another.

These rights and duties, when ascertained and established by unvarying practice, may be stated in the form of laws or rules. The collection of these laws or rules is called International Law, and the duties enforced by them are obligations of international law. These obligations are in many respects vague and undetermined, and they are without that sanction which gives force to municipal law, or law strictly so called. Some writers, indeed, deny that international law is law in any sense, and no doubt it differs much from the law administered by each state within its own territories. Notwithstanding this difference, however, international law has much in common with municipal law. Some of its rules are observed with as much strictness as those of any municipal law; as, for instance, the rule which protects ambassadors. Other rules, again, are frequently broken, or perhaps it would be more correct to say that such rules are not universally assented to. As the general consent of nations is necessary to establish a rule, and as there is as yet no power in existence to create or to compel the observance of a rule of international law, the difficulty is rather to obtain a recognition of the rule than its enforcement. When once recognised — i.e., generally assented to—it is not often broken.

At the present time international law presents an appearance which probably all law has presented at some portion of its early history. Habits and customs exist and are generally followed, but these customs have not the precision and clear definition of more advanced law. There is as yet no tribunal for the enforcement of the customs which may be neglected with impunity by the strong but are binding upon the weak. The public opinion of the civilised world is as yet the only sanction for enforcing international obligations, but that opinion is becoming stronger and more important every day, and as its strength increases the due observance of international law becomes more imperative upon all states. The wilful neglect of international obligations is generally considered a just cause of war.

The sole source of international law is the voluntary usage of nations—the municipal laws of one state cannot affect other states unless they assent thereto. The usage, however, of even one of the great nations, and therefore, even its municipal law, may have an important indirect effect upon the usages of other states, and so affect the general law of nations. If the bill now before the House of Commons is passed, it will have a wider scope than ordinary municipal law, and it can hardly fail to have some influence upon the general law of nations.

The bill relates exclusively to that branch of international law which relates to the duties of neutrals. It is with this part of the law that England is now especially concerned, and it is for the better observance of these duties that the law is to be amended. In approaching this subject it must be remembered that neutral states have a twofold duty—first the negative duty of abstaining from giving assistance to either belligerent in their corporate capacity as states; secondly, the positive duty of restraining persons within their territory from using the country as a base for hostile operations against either belligerent. The neutral must, therefore, prevent the enlisting of troops or the fitting out of military or naval expeditions against either party to the war. The subjects of neutral states are not restricted from carrying on trade of all sorts with either or both the belligerents subject only to this, that contraband of war, such as arms, gunpowder, and other munitions of war, and goods of any kind sent to a blockaded port, may be lawfully seized by the other belligerent, and the neutral has no ground of complaint. The neutral is not bound to prevent trading in contraband of war or with blockaded ports, although it may do so if it thinks proper, provided only that any restrictions apply equally to both belligerents. Each belligerent has, on the other hand, the right of searching neutral vessels upon the high seas for the purpose of intercepting contraband or cargoes bound for a blockaded port, and the belligerent may lawfully seize and confiscate such goods.

At the present moment the most important subject the Government has to deal with is the fitting out armed vessels in England. The broad rule is clear that it is a breach of neutrality to allow vessels to be armed and equipped in neutral ports, so that on leaving the neutral waters they are ready to commence hostilities. The precise extent of this rule, however, and its accurate definition have not yet been clearly settled, and to this point we shall have to recur hereafter. In order to prevent a violation of this rule it is necessary that it should be recognised by municipal law. This question has been dealt with in England by the Foreign Enlistment Act (59 Geo. 3, c. 69), passed in 1819. The second section of this statute forbids the serving of English subjects or inducing them to serve in the military and naval service of foreign states without a licence. The sections immediately following deal with subjects of minor importance until section 7, which is the one which now chiefly concerns us. That section provides that if any person within the British dominion shall, without leave, "equip, furnish, fit out, or arm, or attempt or endeavour to equip, furnish, &c., or procure to be equipped, &c., or shall knowingly aid, assist, or be concerned in the equipping, &c., of any ship or vessel with intent or in order that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of" any foreign state as a transport or store ship, "or with intent to cruise or commit hostilities" against any foreign state with whom his Majesty shall not be at war; or shall issue or deliver any commission for any state or vessel to the intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed as aforesaid, every such person shall be guilty of a misdemeanour and punishable as therein specified, and officers of the customs, excise, and navy are authorised to seize such vessels in the same way that they are "empowered to make seizures under the laws of customs and excise, or under the laws of trade or navigation, and such vessels shall be forfeited." Section 8 is directed against aiding the warlike equipment of foreign armed vessels.

There has been only one decision upon this statute, viz., The Attorney-General v. Sillem, or The Alexandra (12 W. R. 257), where it was held by the majority of the Court of Exchequer that the mere building of ships, as distinguished from equipping, is not within section 7. This statute was much discussed during the late American war, and in 1867 a Royal Commission was issued "to inquire into and consider the character, working and effect of the laws of the realm available for the enforcement of neutrality. . . . and to report whether any and what changes ought to be made in such laws for the purpose of giving to them increased efficiency and bringing them into full conformity with our international obligations." In the following year the commissioners made the report to which Mr. Gladstone referred. In our next article we shall examine this report and the bill of the Government, which is chiefly based upon the recommendations of this report.

THE JUDICATURE COMMISSION AND THE COUNTY COURTS.

"Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth" is a maxim which may be misapplied; and the Judicature Commission have misapplied it. Soon after the supplementary commission was issued which empowered them to inquire into the working of the county court system, they appointed, as our readers know, a committee of their own number to take evidence and collect materials from which they might arrive at a conclusion upon this subject, and certainly no course could have been more reasonable than this. But this is not all that they have done. Two documents have been brought into the world at the same moment, under the auspices of the Commission: a memorandum of the committee, laying down certain principles and recommending certain changes with respect to the county court system; and a draft bill to consolidate and amend the law relating to county courts, framed upon wholly different principles from those of the committee, embodying none of the changes which they recommend, and containing changes of great importance of which they know nothing. This is a result hardly likely, we fear, to increase public confidence in the Judicature Commission. We commented at some length last week upon the one document, the committee's memorandum; we have a few words now to say upon the conflicting document, the draft bill.

The committee's recommendations are framed upon the principle of reducing the ordinary county courts to comparative insignificance, and creating a few provincial courts to do all the work now done by the county courts, and most, if not all, of that now done by the superior courts. The principle of the bill is to have the county courts constituted precisely as they are, merely altering their procedure in some smaller details, but at the same time to increase their jurisdiction enormously. In accordance with this fundamental difference of view, it will be found that the bill has not a word about reducing the importance of the ordinary courts or lowering the salaries of the judges. On the contrary, it expressly leaves these things unchanged. It has nothing about provincial judges at high salaries; nothing about abolishing the office of registrar except in the central courts; nothing about re-arrangement of circuits. Upon the question of default summonses it is true that the two parties are substantially agreed; both would extend the system to all cases above five pounds. But even here the only practical suggestion of the committee—namely, to print such summonses on paper of a particular colour—is not adopted in the bill.

On the other hand, there are several very important points on which the committee have not committed themselves to an opinion. They have not said whether the jurisdiction even of their amended county courts should be unlimited or whether it should have a pecuniary limit, and, if so, what that limit should be. This is the very point upon which the bill is boldest. It proposes to make the jurisdiction of the county court unlimited as to amount in common law, equity, and admiralty. And it would fix the compulsory limit—that is to say, the amount than which if less be recovered in a superior court the plaintiff is to lose his costs—at £50. Another point as to which the committee have been silent, and, we think, rather strangely silent, is the question of establishing one uniform method of procedure in place of the several distinct systems now in use in the courts. The bill would establish such a uniform system. And if we had space to compare the two in detail, this other inconsistency between the memorandum of the committee and the draft bill would be even more apparent.

But we will consider this bill upon its own merits. It is in the main a consolidation bill, bringing together into one Act nearly all the provisions of the County Court Acts, Rules, Orders, and the like. And so far, if adopted, it would be a great improvement on the existing state of things. A carefully drawn consolidation Act is generally the most useful of all Acts. We may observe, however, that this bill exactly reverses the course now usually taken in such cases. The plan always taken of late has been to let the Act deal in generalities, leaving all details of practice to be worked out by rule. This bill, on the other hand, seeks to embody in itself nearly everything that has hitherto been dealt with by rule.

Again, the bill contains a number of smaller changes in the rules of evidence to be applied in the county courts, many of which would no doubt be changes for the better, as, for instance, that which would dispense with the necessity of a notice to produce documents in the possession of the opposite party. And there are clauses aimed at the fusion of law and equity in the county courts. But we shall not examine either of these classes of clauses at present, for two reasons: first, because the bill in its embryo state is too far off from becoming law to make detailed criticism of any importance at present; and secondly, because it seems to us evidently the better course to wait and see how all such matters are dealt with in the new Supreme Court, and then try and assimilate the law of the county courts as far as may be to that of the superior courts, rather than adopt the course which this bill suggests.

But the real importance of this bill lies in what it proposes with respect to jurisdiction. The evils which have to be met are easily stated. The efficient and satisfactory determination of causes is at present too slow and too expensive, and we want to make justice, as far as possible, cheap and rapid, but, at the same time, efficient. To attain this end three courses have been suggested. One is to transfer to the existing county courts much, if not most, of the legal business of the country. The second is to establish a new class of courts at the greater provincial centres, resembling in their constitution and dignity the superior courts; this is what is called the provincial system. The third is to maintain the existing system in principle, but doing everything that can be done to cheapen, hasten and simplify proceedings in the superior courts for the trial of real controversies, leaving the county courts to discharge their original duties as small debt courts.

This third course is the one we have always advocated. We have shown in many detailed instances how proceedings in the superior courts might be cheapened; and it is our firm conviction that a far larger proportion of the expenses of a cause than is generally suspected are rendered necessary solely through defects of procedure easily remedied. And as to delay in the trial of causes, we believe this to arise almost entirely from want of organisation, and of a due economy of judicial force.

The second course proposed, the provincial system, is substantially that proposed by the committee. We disapprove this plan, because we think it unnecessary and expensive, inevitably involving serious evils. It would, among other things, break up the unity of the Bench, and so distort the uniformity of decision and certainty in the law. This course, however, would be incomparably preferable to the other which has been proposed—namely, the transfer to the existing county courts of a large quantity of the legal business of the country. Yet this is the plan proposed by this bill; and a more mischievous proposal has never, we think, been made.

It is easy to state in a very few words the conditions absolutely essential to the efficiency of a tribunal which is to try substantial questions in litigation.

First, you must have a highly qualified judge. Some of the county court judges are eminently so, but a very large number are not. There are sixty county court judges; they are chosen from the Bar; their salary is £1,500 a-year. We have no hesitation in saying that, even if the selection were always made with a sole desire to secure the fittest man, which has not always been the case, it would be impossible to find sixty judges competent to try difficult questions of law and fact and willing to accept £1,500 a-year for their work.

Secondly, you must have a competent jury in cases fit to be tried by a jury. The jury system in the county courts is confessedly a ridiculous failure. Nor can it be otherwise. Even five fit jurymen could not be found in every place in which a county court sits.

Thirdly, you must have an efficient body of advocates, especially for the argument of questions of law. This, of course, is always attainable under any system in a few large places. But to suppose that such a body, drawn from any branch of the profession, could attend the five hundred and twenty-one county courts scattered over England and Wales would show a degree of ignorance which we shall certainly not presume in our readers.

Fourthly, you must have ready access to the judge at all reasonable times for the purpose of interlocutory applications. This cannot be had in the case of a judge who lives in London, except while he is spinning round from court to court on his circuit.

Fifthly, you must have power in your judge to reserve questions of law for deliberate argument and decision before a bench of judges. This cannot be had under the county court system.

Sixthly, you must have a condition of surpassing importance, publicity and the full light of day. We do not mean the publicity which comes of an ignorant mob in a gallery. We want that daylight and publicity which comes of a judge having to administer justice perpetually in the presence of qualified persons, whose knowledge and judgment he must respect, and whose criticism he cannot but regard. This kind of publicity is incomparably the greatest security for good conduct in judge and trustworthy administration of justice. No other control has even yet been found effectual in this country. This control in the case of the superior courts is maintained in great efficiency by the perpetual presence of the Bar and of the attorneys practising in those courts. And the voice of the public press, expressing as it does in such matters the opinions of men well qualified to judge, contributes to the same end. Can anything like this be found in the five hundred and twenty towns and villages where the county courts sit? Manifestly not. And without this felt responsibility to enlightened public opinion—the opinion, that is, of those qualified to judge—we say deliberately that we would not trust any Court that ever sat.

The county courts are radically deficient in every qualification necessary to secure the satisfactory trial of important questions of law or fact, and any attempt to force such work upon them can only end in failure. And further, it must never be forgotten that every case of complication or length sent into a county court tends to spoil its efficiency for its real work, the recovery of small debts, for it blocks the way, creates arrears, delay, and uncertainty. Already this evil has been felt, and if the proposed bill were to pass the evil would become gigantic. The fact is, penny steamers are most useful things on the Thames, but if we were to listen to some ambitious captain, and send half a dozen of them across the Atlantic, we should wreck the boats and drown the passengers; we should likewise disarrange the traffic on the Thames. This is exactly how it is with the county courts.

AMERICAN INVESTMENTS.

It has recently become quite customary to warn Englishmen against investing in American securities, and to denounce the American Courts as either unwilling or incompetent to afford adequate redress to injured creditors. The case of the Erie shareholders is held up in terrorem as an example, and people are thus deterred from making safe and profitable investments, when the exercise of a little discretion would suffice to discriminate between secure and precarious methods of obtaining fair returns for outlay. Before entering into the subject of the various classes of American securities it is well to recall the peculiar features of the system under which the laws are administered in America, as much confusion prevails in the public mind on this point.

In every State in the United States there are two sets of Courts, entirely distinct from each other. One set is established by the general Government at Washington and the other by the State Governments. The former are called United States Courts, or more commonly Federal Courts. The judges are appointed for life by the President and Senate at Washington, and are thus totally independent of popular feeling, and the appeal from their judgments lies to the Supreme Court of the United States at Washington. Their jurisdiction extends to all international questions and questions arising under the laws of the general Government—that is, the laws of the United States as distinguished from the laws passed by each separate State. But the main point of interest is this, that to avoid any prejudice or partiality of the State tribunals in favour of their own citizens the Federal Courts have jurisdiction over all suits brought by foreigners against the citizens of any State within that State.

Now these Federal Courts have at all times been presided over by men of unimpeached character and integrity, and from the nature of the appointments and the permanency of their tenure of office the judges are quite as trustworthy as those of any country.

The second set of Courts are those which each State of the Union establishes for itself, with all grades of jurisdiction, including Supreme Courts and Courts of Appeal. The confusion in England arises from the use of these names as applied to the State tribunals. When we are told that a certain decision has been rendered in New York by the Supreme Court, we jump at once to the false conclusion that the Supreme Court of the United States is meant. We are specially liable to be misled by the absurd nomenclature of the State of New York in this respect. What they call their Supreme Court is really a system of district or county courts scattered over the State, all subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals, which sits at Albany, the capital of the State. The famous or infamous Judge Barnard, of Erie notoriety, is one of these misnamed supreme judges, although his jurisdiction really extends only to the city of New York, not the rest of the State.

In much the larger part of the Union the State judges are quite as incorruptible and independent as the Federal judges, but by a deplorable excess of what are supposed to be democratic principles, an experiment was made some years ago in a certain number of the States, and the judges were made elective by the people. To add to the mischief of such a system the tenure of office was fixed at a few years, generally four or five, so that not only was the election originally dependent upon popular favour, but the judge was constantly tempted to pander to popular passion or prejudice in order to secure reelection. It is of course superfluous to comment on the inevitable results of so pernicious a system, of which Judge Barnard is one of the choice fruits, matured under the genial warmth of friendly sympathies entertained in his favour by the lowest classes of Irish and German emigrants, who labour in the docks and quays of New York. Our purpose is attained when we point out that foreign creditors are entirely independent of these State tribunals, and have an unexceptionable recourse to the Federal Courts, on which implicit reliance may be placed.

Recurring now to the subject of investments, the first remark to be made is the singular absence of discrimination observable in the writings of those best informed on the subject (such, for instance, as the able writer of the financial columns of the Times) between investments in the shares of American companies and in their bonds or debentures. We may say at once that we would strenuously dissuade any Englishman from becoming a shareholder in an American company, for the simple and obvious reason that he thereby becomes a quasi partner—that in companies, as a general rule, the majority must govern, and the minority are powerless to help themselves. We know here at home how excessively difficult it is for the Courts to assist unfortunate shareholders against the action of directors when supported by a majority of votes, and it appears to us rash in the extreme as a mere matter of investment to become a partner in an enterprise in a foreign country. This is the position of the Erie shareholders. The railway company is a local corporation, established by the laws of the State of New York, not of the General Government, and Englishmen have been imprudent enough to become partners with such men as Gould and Fisk, and are now paying the price of their rash confidence. We do not mean by this that they are without remedy, for we cannot for an instant doubt that their wrongs will be redressed, so far as that is possible, by the Superior Courts of Justice, either State or Federal. But the position of a creditor, such as a bondholder or debenture-holder, is entirely different. It is in his power instantly, without combination with any one else, to bring his suit in a Federal Court, and to enforce payment of his debt with as much promptness and certainty as he could by a suit out of one of our Superior Courts; or if his bond be secured by a mortgage or trust-deed he may file his bill in chancery in a Federal Court just as he could do in England, and claim in behalf of himself and all other creditors jointly interested the foreclosure of the mortgage or the execution of the trust-deed. In this very Erie Railway case, while "the ring" or "Jay, Gould & Co." have set shareholders at defiance and plundered them at will, they have never dared to make default towards a bond-holder, knowing the immediate and inevitable result.

If this distinction between shares and bonds be kept constantly in view the difficulty in choosing safe investments in the United States is greatly restricted. When a bond or debenture is offered the first question to be asked is whether it is secured by a first mortgage or trust-deed. The mode of foreclosing mortgages on railways in the United States is shortly this: Whenever a property is offered for sale at the suit of a second, third, or fourth mortgagee, as the case may be, it is sold upon the terms of its remaining subject, in the hands of the purchaser, to all mortgages prior in rank to that of the pursuing creditor. It thus becomes a matter of perfect indifference to a first mortgagee what proceedings are taken by puisne incumbrancers. They affect his rights in no way. He is not involved in liquidation proceedings, nor is he called into court to claim his dues out of the proceeds of the sale, for the sale does not take place unless the bid has been in excess of the first mortgage, and the purchaser pays only the surplus, retaining in his own hands the amount of the first mortgage. The first mortgagee thus remains entirely free from any involvement in litigation, unless he chooses to act for himself in forcing a sale under his own security, upon default of payment of principal or interest. The registration laws which universally prevail in the United States render it a matter perfectly simple and easy to ascertain the rank and priority of mortgages, for none are valid without registry.

If, then, an Englishman desirous of obtaining a good interest for his money will take care to buy no shares, and confine himself to first mortgage bonds, he cannot run any of the risks which are depicted in such alarming colours by some of our public journals. Of course the intending investor must satisfy himself that the property mortgaged is of sufficient value to render the payment of the debt secure. Our remarks will scarcely benefit men sanguine or careless enough to lend their money even on first mortgage on railways projected in wild districts of country, where not a pound of iron has yet been placed on the road, nor perhaps a mile of road-way graded. But a man who conducts his business with ordinary prudence and who inquires into the value of the security need not be deterred from American investments by any fear of inadequacy of legal remedies for the recovery of his money.

The warning against investing in any bonds secured by puisne incumbrances is based on the consideration that it is always in the power of the first mortgagees to foreclose and force a sale in case of default. So it might well happen that property amply sufficient in value to satisfy first and second mortgages might be sacrificed at a forced sale and leave nothing for second mortgagees unless they combined to pay off the first incumbrancers, or to buy the property at the forced sale. Such combinations are readily formed in America, where the people seem endowed with a natural genius for associated action, but with us there are so many difficulties in the way of uniting a scattered body of bondholders into a compact union of men devising measures in concert for the protection of their common interests, that a prudent investor ought not to place his money at the hazard of such contingencies.

On the whole, therefore, it may be concluded that it would be unwise for an Englishman to buy shares in American companies, or bonds secured by mortgage of inferior rank; but that where the property mortgaged is of sufficient value to cover the amount lent upon it, an investment in bonds of a railway or other company secured by first mortgage is as safe an investment in America as it would be in England, with the advantage of being recoverable by process of law more cheaply and expeditiously than in our own courts.

ENCLOSURES.—A Parliamentary return shows that since the passing of the Enclosure Act of 1845 there have been 856 enclosures in England and Wales. The total extent is 540,358 acres; 370,848 acres were subject to public allotments for recreation grounds or cottage gardens. The area actually allotted amounts in the whole to 1,633 acres for exercise and recreation grounds, and 2,113 acres for the labouring poor.—Times.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

MISDESCRIPTION OF TRANSFEREE.

Re Smith, Knight & Co., Battie's case, M.R., 18 W. R. 620.

The decision in this case that the register could not be rectified upon the application of the liquidator is owing to the fact that the directors had, under the articles of association, no power to refuse to register any transfer if they did not approve of the transferee. Parties are not entitled, when the facts come to be known, to retain any advantage acquired by a misdescription which the Court regards as fraudulent; but in this case the directors could not have refused to register if they had known all. In an otherwise similar case, where the directors had the power, Vice-Chancellor James held that the name of the transferee ought to be removed from the register of members and the list of contributories, and the name of the transferor substituted, on the ground that the deception vitiated the transaction (Payne's case, L. R. 9 Eq. 223). Where there is such a power, and a misdescription, either of the transferee or of the consideration, or of both, as in Battie's case, and the directors are thereby deceived, they have a right to say that they will have the transaction set aside (Williams's case, L. R. 9 Eq. 226 n.); and that right passes to the liquidator on the commencement of the winding-up. See, as to this, the observations of Lord Justice Giffard in Kintrea's case (18 W. R. 197, L. R. 5 Ch. 95).

In Poole v. Middleton (29 Beav. 646); Birmingham v. Sheridan (33 Beav. 660), Lord Romilly observed that even where directors have a discretion to refuse a transferee, they must exercise it reasonably, and that a mere capricious refusal would be controlled by the Court. But in a later case his Lordship expressed an opinion that, apart from any express power, directors have in their general function an inherent ability to refuse to register a transfer where, in their judgment, the same will not be for the benefit of the company (Weston's case, 16 W. R. 887). This latter position, however, is not maintainable (s.c., on appeal, 17 W. R. 62, L. R. 4 Ch. 20). It was disposed of in the court of appeal by the identical reason advanced by Lord Romilly in the two former cases in support of the other principle, viz., that a limited company is a sort of partnership from which the members can retire at once and get rid of all their liabilities (except the qualified liabilities of past members) by disposing of their shares, provided the disposal be out and out, and no interest be retained; and this appears to be the reason why such a transaction as that in Battie's case will hold water, provided the transfer be out and out, in the absence of the power to refuse to register which well-drawn articles of association ought to contain.

RESTRICTIVE STIPULATIONS—NOTICE.

Carter v. Williams, V.C.J., 18 W. R. 593.

A plot of land had been sold with the stipulation that no building to be erected thereon should be used for a beerhouse. The peculiarity of the case was that the foregoing stipulation was contained in a separate piece of paper, and was not recited in the conveyance. The purchaser sublet to D. as a yearly tenant, without notice, and he opened a beerhouse upon the plot. D. had no actual notice, and the Vice-Chancellor, holding that as the covenant did not appear upon the title-deed, D. could not be fixed with constructive notice, dismissed with costs, as against D., the bill which prayed an injunction against both D. and the purchaser.

Yearly tenants do not as a rule ask to see their lessor's title. The ratio decidendi seems to have been that if D. had seen everything which appeared to be necessary for him to see he would not have acquired any knowledge of the restrictive covenant. The doctrine of constructive notice, as the Vice-Chancellor observed, has been already carried far enough. A purchaser who does not inquire into his vendor's title is affected with notice of what appears upon it. This rule applies equally to a yearly tenant as to the purchaser of a greater interest (Wilson v. Hart, 14 W. R. 748, L. R. 1 Ch. 463). Clearly then a yearly tenant ought to inquire whether the property is subject to any restriction. If the restriction as to the use of the premises had been recited in the deed of conveyance to D.'s lessor, D. would unquestionably have been bound by it, if he had made no inquiry.

ON THE DUTY OF LIQUIDATORS UNDER SUPERVISION TO BRING IN THEIR ACCOUNTS.

Re Anglo-Romano Water Company, Ex parte Wright, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 777.

We are glad to see that the Lord Justice Giffard quite adopted the opinion of the Master of the Rolls that when a company is winding up under supervision the liquidator's duty is to bring in and pass his accounts at reasonable intervals, and that any contributory is entitled to require him to do so. The question whether the applicant was or was not a contributory, is one into which we need not enter; but inasmuch as it was decided that he was, his right to call on the liquidator followed as a matter of course. We do not see why a liquidator should have more indulgence shown him in this respect than a receiver. "Of all people," said the Lord Justice, "I do think that those who ought most easily to be called to account are liquidators of public companies." It is difficult, indeed to see what ground a liquidator can have for resisting an application for his accounts when he has nothing to conceal, unless the application be made with the object of causing annoyance or delay.

COSTS OF PREPARING LEASE.

Re The Ipswich Park Company, Ex parte Brough, V.C.J., 18 W. R. 285.

This case affords us an opportunity of recapitulating the law on a point of practice of much importance to solicitors.

There is a universal custom in conveyancing matters that a lease is prepared by the solicitor of the lessor at the cost of the lessee; similarly, the preparation of a mortgage deed (including the cost of examining the validity of the mortgagor's title and the sufficiency of the property in point of value), though conducted by the solicitor of the mortgagee, is paid for by the mortgagor; and similarly in other conveyancing matters. In practice these costs are generally paid by the lessee or mortgagor direct to the solicitor who did the work; in the case of a mortgage, for instance, the mortgagor's solicitor, being usually entrusted by the mortgagee with the money to be advanced, hands it over to the mortgagor, minus the amount of his own bill.

But the solicitor cannot, merely upon the above circumstances, compel the payment from the lessee or mortgagee, because there is no privity of contract between them (Rigley v. Daykin, 2 Y. & J. 86). The lessor or mortgagee from whom he received his instructions is liable to him, and after paying him can recover the amount from the lessee or mortgagor (Grissell v. Robinson, 3 Bing. N. C. 10). For the same reasons a mortgagee's solicitor has no lien on the mortgagor's deeds, arising from his having been employed by the mortgagee to inspect them, &c., Pratt v. Vizard (5 B. & Ad. 808), a case relating to this latter phase of the subject, affords a good exposition of the general principle. Plaintiff, an intending mortgagor, sent his deeds to R., the proposed mortgagee, for inspection, saying at the same time, "I shall pay with pleasure all expenses attending the same." R. handed the deeds to his own solicitors. Ultimately the transaction went off, and the plaintiff demanding back his deeds, the solicitors claimed a lien on them for their bill. The plaintiff paid the bill under protest, and recovered the amount from them in this action. Here there was no privity at all between the plaintiff and the solicitors, and the latter were strangers to the express promise which had passed between the plaintiff and R. Whether R. could, after paying the bill, recover the amount from the plaintiff, would be a question depending on the construction of the original agreement between him and the plaintiff. In Webb v. Rhodes (3 Bing. N. C. 732), the transaction having gone off, the solicitors of the intending lessor recovered from him, as for work done, the amount of their bill. But it is very important to remember that, though there is a recognised custom as between the two principals as to the incidence of the costs of completed transactions, there is none sufficient to support a claim to be reimbursed the costs of a negotiation which has proved abortive. In Melbourne v. Cottrell (5 W. R. 884), a treaty for a mortgage having gone off, and the proposed mortgagee having sued the proposed mortgagor for (inter alia) the costs incurred, it was held by Erie, C.J., that there was no custom raising an implied contract on the part of the defendant to produce such a title as should satisfy the plaintiff, or to pay the costs of investigating the title in the event of the transaction going off. Therefore, if a proposing lender wishes to be entitled to his costs in any event, he must stipulate (as is sometimes done) on opening the negotiation, that he shall be repaid, in any event, the expense of investigating the proposing borrower's title.

Similarly the lessor's or mortgagee's solicitor, if he wishes to have a claim directly on the lessee or mortgagor for his costs, must take care to get some retainer direct from the latter. For this purpose anything will be sufficient which proves an understanding arrived at between the lessor's or mortgagee's solicitor and the lessee or mortgagor, that the former is employed by the latter. See on this point Smith v. Clegg (6 W. R. C. L. Dig. 9, 27 L. J. Ex. 300).

Having thus fully expounded the principles which govern the claims of solicitors for the costs of preparing conveyances and the like, it only remains for us to notice the facts of the present case, which are exceedingly simple.

A company being in treaty for a lease, instructed their solicitor to prepare a draft; this solicitor wrote to the solicitor of the intending lessor, that in compliance with the etiquette of the profession, he wished to hand the work over to him. The lessor's solicitor accordingly prepared the draft. The company afterwards going into liquidation, he made a claim under the winding-up for his costs, which was disallowed by Vice-Chancellor James, because there was obviously no privity whatever between him and the company. In this case it is very possible that the solicitor who prepared the draft had no claim on anyone.

COMMON LAW.

PRACTICE—JUSTIFICATION UNDER JUDGMENT WHICH HAS BEEN SET ASIDE.

Smith v. Sidney, Q.B., 18 W. R. 628.

The rule laid down in this case is, that an act done under a judgment which is afterwards set aside is not necessarily regarded as if there never had been a judgment—or, in other words, a defendant may justify, under a judgment which does not exist at the time of his plea. The Court will, in these cases, look into the cause for which the judgment was set aside.

If a judgment were improperly obtained—as, for instance, if obtained by fraud—and execution was issued and enforced, and the judgment were then set aside, the party issuing the execution could not rely upon the judgment as any justification of his act. The mere fact, however, that the judgment was set aside would not disentitle the person acting on it to justify under it, but it would be necessary to show that it had been set aside because obtained by fraud. If, on the other hand, a judgment is properly obtained and acted on, and then set aside as a favour to the person against whom it was obtained, such person could not bring an action for anything done regularly under the judgment.

Smith v. Sidney fell under the latter class of cases, and it was held that an arrest of the plaintiff by the defendant upon a judgment obtained by the defendant in another action against the plaintiff might be properly justified under such judgment, although the judgment had been set aside; because the facts showed that the judgment was set aside only as a favour to the plaintiff. This point has not been before very clearly decided in any reported case, although the practice seems to have been well settled on the point.

The judgment of Hannen, J., puts the matter very clearly—"The fact that a judgment has been set aside does not deprive the party of its protection, otherwise the plea of null tiel record would be sufficient, but it is necessary to show why it was set aside. The reason of this rule is, that the Court may see from the facts which induced the setting aside whether the party is a wrong-doer."

In this case the trespass complained of was a trespass to the person committed under a ca. sa. This precise point cannot arise again in this way since the abolition of arrest for debt (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), but the same principle applies to cases of trespass to goods, and for these cases this decision is now an authority.

COURTS.

HOME CIRCUIT.

MAIDSTONE.

(Before Chief Justice BOVILL and a Common Jury.)

July 26, 27.—Norton v. Dudlaw.

This was an action of slander.

The plaintiff was a solicitor practising at Malling, and the defendant was also a solicitor, and clerk to the board of guardians of the Malling Union. It appeared that the board had taken legal proceedings to recover the amount of a surety bond, and the present plaintiff acted as the solicitor for the defendant, the result being that the board of guardians were defeated on a point of law, and became liable for the costs of the defendant in the action. The costs were taxed in due course, and ultimately an execution was put into the workhouse. The slander complained of was a statement made by the defendant at a subsequent meeting of the board of guardians, to the effect that the plaintiff had been guilty of sharp practice, and had been actuated in the proceedings in question by spite. So far from there being any foundation for that statement however, it appeared that the plaintiff had, some three or four weeks before the execution, written to the attorney of the board, asking when the costs would be paid. From some cause, however, which was not explained, this letter never reached its destination.

Denman, Q.C., and Hayman, for the plaintiff.

Prentice, Q.C., for the defendant.

BOVILL, C.J., said it was clear that the statement had been made under a misapprehension as to the course that was actually taken by the plaintiff, and there did not appear to be the slightest pretence for saying that the plaintiff had been guilty of sharp practice.

Prentice, Q.C., after conferring with his client, said he felt the force of his Lordship's observation, and was ready to withdraw all imputations upon the character of the plaintiff and to apologise for having made the statement complained of.

A juror was then withdrawn.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN-FIELDS.

(Before Mr. REGISTRAR PEPPYS, acting for the Chief Judge.)

Solicitors' clerks as receivers.

July 23.—Anonymous.

Mr. A. J. Murray, solicitor, made an application to the Court for the appointment of a receiver under a petition which had been filed by debtors with a view to arrangement of their affairs. It was proposed that a person named Sydney, residing in Fentonville-road, should be appointed receiver in the matter.

The REGISTRAR, upon being informed that Mr. Sydney was a clerk to the solicitor making the application, who also presented the petition, said he did not think he was a proper person to be receiver, and declined to make the appointment.

July 26.—Re Hochstrasser.

This was a similar case, in which it was desired to appoint as receiver the clerk to the partner of the solicitor who presented the petition.

Brough, in support of the application said this was an exceptional case. The debtor was a German, and the great majority of the creditors resided abroad. The proposed receiver was conversant with the French and German languages, and it would be greatly to the advantage and convenience of the creditors that he should be appointed. Of five creditors resident in England, four had signed a requisition in his favour.

Mr. REGISTRAR PEPPYS said he understood that the Chief Judge had disapproved the appointment as receiver of the clerk to the solicitor presenting the petition, but the present seemed to be an exceptional case, and, as the majority of the English creditors desired the appointment, it would be made, to last until after the first meeting.

COUNTY COURT.

DARTFORD.

(Before J. J. LONSDALE, Esq., Judge.)

May 18, June 22, July 20.—Santler v. Founds and Clark, Friendly Society—Jurisdiction of County Court—Uncertified Society.

18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, ss. 41, 44.—Held, that under the above provisions the county court has or has not jurisdiction over disputes between friendly societies and their members, according as the rules had or had not been deposited with the Registrar at the time of the dispute.

Smith v. Pryor, 5 W. R. 294, examined.

The plaintiff was a member of a friendly society. A charge having been made against the plaintiff, of imposing upon the society, a meeting of the members was called, who heard the charge and decided to expel the plaintiff. By the rules the whole of the members of the society should have been summoned to such meeting, but it was proved in evidence that members then in receipt of sick pay from the society, who were by another rule prohibited from being away from home at so late an hour as that on which the meeting was held, were not summoned. Subsequently to the above meeting the rules of the society were deposited with the Registrar of Friendly Societies, under section 44 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, and at a meeting of the society held after the deposit of the rules, the plaintiff attended and was refused admittance to such meeting.

He now claimed to be reinstated. The defendants were the secretary and treasurer of the society.

Mr. C. R. Gibson (Dartford) for the plaintiff.

Mr. W. Venn (New Inn) for the defendant.

Mr. LONSDALE delivered judgment on the 20th of July, as follows:—

John Santler, the plaintiff, is a member of the Perseverance Benefit Society, a society established for one of the purposes mentioned in the 9th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63 (the Friendly Societies Consolidation Act), whose rules have not been certified by the Registrar, have been deposited with him; and having been excluded from the benefits of such society after such rules were so deposited, he claims by the present proceeding that the defendants, who are respectively the secretary and treasurer of such society, be ordered to reinstate him and to pay and allow him all moneys, rights, and privileges appertaining to a member of such society, or in default of so doing to pay him £50.

The only cause for which the society by their rules have power to exclude a member is "imposing on the society while in receipt of the sick gift," and the rules contain no mode of settling disputes in any other case. The county court, therefore, in all such other cases has jurisdiction,—as regards certified societies, under section 41 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63,—and as regards uncertified societies, provided a copy of their rules has been deposited with the Registrar, under section 44 of the same Act. The Perseverance Benefit Society has never had its rules certified by the Registrar.

trar, but a copy of the rules was deposited with him on the 6th April last. At the hearing it was contended that the copy was not deposited till the 2nd May, and that, therefore, upon the authority of Smith v. Pryor (5 W. R. 294)—the dispute having arisen (as alleged by the defendants) on the 30th March, when a resolution of the society was passed professing to exclude the plaintiff from the society; or as (alleged by the plaintiff) not until the 20th April, a club night, when the stewards refused to admit him into the club room or to receive his contribution money; both dates being prior to the deposit of a copy of the rules—this Court had no jurisdiction.

But I come to the conclusion upon the evidence that the rules were deposited on the 6th April. If, therefore, as contended by the plaintiff, the dispute between him and the defendants arose after the rules had been deposited, I am of opinion that this Court has jurisdiction. The case of Smith v. Pryor, relied upon by the defendants, was one in which a dispute arose in an uncertified society before its rules had been deposited with the Registrar, and the jurisdiction of the county court to decide such dispute was on that account objected to. Lord Campbell, C.J., is reported in the Weekly Reporter to have said: "The county court had no jurisdiction except under the statute; but this is not a society to which that statute applies;" and Coleridge, Wightman and Crompton, JJ., concurred. It is difficult to understand the ground upon which the Court held that the society there in question was not a society to which the 18 & 19 Viet. c. 63, applied. It would appear from the argument which was being used by counsel when he was stopped by the Court—viz., "that the Legislature only intended to confer the privileges given by the Act upon certified societies; but it was foreseen that disputes might arise between the deposit of the rules and complete registration, and therefore section 44 was introduced to provide against that contingency. It could not have been intended that these provisions should apply to uncertified societies"—as if the Court thought that the Act applied only to certified societies; that is, that no society, unless certified at the time of making application to the county court, was within the meaning of the Act, even although its rules had been deposited with the Registrar before the dispute. Of course if the statute only applies to certified societies, the county court has no jurisdiction in this case. But I do not think that can have been the ground of the decision, as the words of the 44th section clearly contemplate others than societies, the rules of which are required to be certified, and the objects of which are specified in section 9. In addition to such societies, it mentions societies "for any purpose which is not illegal." Therefore, the only other apparent ground of the decision in that case is that the society was not one to which the statute applies, because its rules had not been deposited with the registrar at the time when the dispute arose.

Taking this latter to be the ground of the decision (and it was the one relied upon for the defendants at the hearing), did the dispute, the foundation of the present application to this Court, arise after the deposit of the rules with the Registrar? I am of opinion that it did. The dispute which was intended to be decided by the special meeting of the 30th March was the alleged imposition on the society by the plaintiff while in the receipt of the sick gift. A majority of the members summoned to that meeting decided that the plaintiff was guilty, and that he should be excluded. By rule 12, however, the whole of the members are required to be summoned before a member can be excluded. This was not done in this case, the plaintiff's expulsion was, therefore, a nullity, and he still remains a member. If the rules of the society had been deposited with the registrar at the time of the meeting, and all the members had been summoned, the decision of the majority of the members present having found him guilty, and the rule making such decision final, I doubt whether this Court could have interfered. But afterwards, on the 20th April, a club night, the plaintiff being still a member of the society, the stewards refused him admission to the club room, and declined to receive his contribution money, telling him that he was no longer a member of the society. It is on this account that the plaintiff now applies to this Court for relief, and I think I have power to grant it, he being still a member of the society, and there being no evidence before me of his having been guilty of the only act which, under the rules of the society, would justify his expulsion (viz., imposing on the society while in the receipt of the sick gift), beyond his own admission that he was one day found cleaning one of his own windows, which in my opinion, as I intimated at the hearing, could no more support such a charge than if he had been found brushing his own clothes. The order of the Court is therefore that the defendants pay and allow to the plaintiff all the moneys, rights, and privileges appertaining to a member of the Perseverance Benefit Society, or in default of so doing, pay him the sum of £50. No objection was made to the amount of this sum at the hearing, and it appearing to me to be based upon a fair calculation, I see no reason to reduce it. I also order the defendants to pay to the plaintiff his costs.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. SAMUEL GEORGE JOHNSON, solicitor, and Town Clerk of Faversham, in Kent, has been elected Town Clerk of the borough of Nottingham, in the room of Mr. William Enfield, who has resigned, after holding the office for twenty-five years. Mr. Johnson was admitted in 1854, and was a member of the Town Council of Faversham, having twice filled the office of mayor of that borough. He afterwards became Town Clerk, on the resignation of the late Mr. John Phillips, and also filled the office of Clerk of the Peace for Faversham, which appointments will be rendered vacant by his transfer to Nottingham. Mr. Richard Enfield has been appointed to act as Deputy Town Clerk of Nottingham, until Mr. Johnson can enter upon his duties.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

VESTRY MEETINGS.

Sir,—I should feel much obliged if you would favour me with answers to the enclosed questions in the Solicitors' Journal.

July 18, 1870.

INQUIRER.

In the town of C. a vestry meeting has lately been held in consequence of the resignation of the organist of the parish church.

There were about forty candidates for the vacant office, and the vestry appointed a committee to consider the merits of the several candidates, and to report thereon at a future meeting, with a view to the selection and appointment of one of the candidates.

The minister and churchwardens were among the members of the committee.

The adjourned vestry for receiving the report of the committee has just been held after notice, of which the following is a copy:—

"Notice is hereby given, that an adjourned vestry meeting will be held in the parish church of C. on Thursday, the 14th instant, at eleven o'clock, to receive the report of the committee, and to take such steps as may be deemed proper for the appointment of an organist.

"And notice is hereby further given that an offer made by Mr. S. to the C. Highway Board to sell to the parish a portion of the premises in the market-place, lately occupied by Mr. P., for widening the pavement, will be laid before the meeting.

"Dated July 12, 1870."

(Signed by the Churchwardens.)

It will be seen that another object was introduced in the notice.

A church-rate has been granted in the parish (from which the organist's salary is paid) and the church-rate is paid by many of the ratepayers; but the minister is not rated and pays no church-rate, and some ratepayers refuse (as any ratepayer may do under the 31 & 32 Viet. c. 109) to pay the church-rate.

The minister attended the adjourned meeting, and took the chair as an assumed matter of right, which proceeding was objected to by many persons at the meeting as well on expressed general grounds—inasmuch as it was alleged the minister is not an integral part of the parish but only a mere individual of the vestry—as on expressed special grounds; inasmuch as, it was alleged, the fact of his not paying church-rates disqualified him from voting and from taking the chair (unless elected to it) at meetings on church-rate matters, and that the vestry meeting being for two objects, what might possibly be right for one might not be right for the other.

Other persons supported the minister's claim to the chair on the alleged ground that the vestry was an ordinary one.

Your opinion would oblige—

1st. Whether under the "Compulsory Church Rates Abolition Act, 1868, or under any other Act or sufficient legal authority the minister who does not pay church-rates can claim as a right to preside and to vote in vestries at which matters regarding the application of church-rates are discussed and to be decided?

2nd. Also, whether at ordinary vestries there is any ground for the claim of the minister to take the chair as a right, seeing that in many Acts of Parliament (such as the Watching and Lighting Act, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90) references are made to vestries electing a chairman, which would hardly be necessary if the minister were really, in virtue of his office, vestry-president?

[It is no part of our business to answer cases for opinion, but we will remind this correspondent that the minister has by common law, an undoubted right to preside at vestry meetings virtute officii, though exceptions appear to have been caused by 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90, and some similar Acts. The Compulsory Church Rates Abolition Act is irrelevant to the matter.—ED. S. J.]

THE LAW LIST—ACADEMICAL DEGREES.

Sir,—If you have any voice in the arrangements of the Law List, may I ask your attention to the following perhaps rather minor point in connection with the list of attorneys and solicitors.

When looking through the list I occasionally observe after a name some such indication of a university degree belonging to it as is conveyed by the letters M.A., B.A., LL.B., &c., &c. I happen myself to be a Cambridge M.A. but it has always appeared to me that unless it were the general usage to add the degree to the name it is rather pretentious, if not coxcombical, in persons to do so. It would be easy for the publisher to add degrees in every case by reference to the Incorporated Law Society's records; whether it be desirable or not may be a question, especially as no such addition is made in the case of barristers, a larger number of whom are university men.

All I venture to suggest is that either no such additions be made at all, or pains be taken to ascertain all the cases where the right to have them exists. I believe the number of instances where the degree has not been added through a feeling akin to my own is very considerable.

July 27. A LONDON SOLICITOR.

[We have no voice in the arrangements of the Law List, but we entirely agree with "A London Solicitor" that if degrees are inserted at all, they should be inserted invariably, and for both branches of the profession. To go no further than the statements forwarded by a few individuals is gross neglect.—ED. S. J.]

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

July 23.—The Life Assurance Companies Bill passed through committee.

The Law of Evidence Further Amendment Act (1869) Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Married Women's Property Bill was read a third time and passed.

Contraband of War.—In reply to a question by the Earl of Malmesbury, whether horses are contraband of war, Earl Granville said the Government could not attempt any definitions of what is or is not contraband of war. That question, as to horses, coal, timber, sails, rope, and various other articles, must depend on the destination and a thousand circumstances which cannot be defined beforehand; the question could only be decided in the Prize Court of the captors.

July 25.—The Irish Land Bill. The Commons' amendments were finally agreed to, excepting that one or two verbal alterations were made.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council Bill.—Lord Romilly took occasion to insist, on the third reading of this bill, on the necessity of appointing the best judges whose services could be secured. There were three modes of obtaining judges. The person of the greatest experience might be selected and paid the price necessary for what might be regarded as his adequate remuneration. Another mode was to get the cheapest man, and a man of that kind might be got at a very low rate, but he would have to be subjected to a severe examination to show that he was at all fit for the discharge of his duties. Again, a person might be selected to fill the office of judge who had failed in his profession; but the very worst judges would be those who were selected from that class. He observed that a proposal had been brought under the notice of the other House for increasing the pay of her Majesty's Ministers, and he, for one, did not think any of them were overpaid; but there was no doubt that if their places were put up to auction persons would be found for much smaller salaries to undertake their duties. Then, however, would arise the question whether they would be at all fit to discharge those duties. He, for one, was opposed to anything like parsimony and niggardliness under such circumstances. It was of the greatest importance, not only that we should get the best judges, but also that they should be able to gain the confidence of the public by showing that they had previously gained the confidence of their clients, and occupied a considerable position in the legal profession. A standing of so many years would not be a proper qualification. Indeed, it would be better to insist upon a money qualification, and say that no man should be appointed a judge who had not made £3,000 or £4,000 a-year by his profession. In conclusion, he appealed to the Lord Chancellor to make this bill an experimental one, and confine its operation to two or three years, at the expiration of which period we should see what results it had brought about.—The Lord Chancellor repelled the accusation that he was endeavouring to get money out of the appointment of judges. He proceeded to point out that there were often circumstances connected with an office which rendered it a desirable one apart from the mere question of salary. It had been an almost invariable custom that a judge, after fifteen years' service, became an ex officio member of the Judicial Committee, and the object of the bill was to give to such judges £500 a-year, in addition to their present salary.—The bill was read a third time.—On the question that the bill do pass, Lord Cairns moved a clause limiting the operation of the bill to the 1st of January, 1873. The amendment was negatived by a majority of 27 to 16, and the bill passed.

July 26.—The Settled Estates (Mansions) Bill passed through committee.

The Juries Bill passed through committee.

The Stamp Duty on Leases Bill was read a third time and passed.

July 28.—The Life Assurance Companies Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Clerical Disabilities Bill.—Committee.—Earl Beauchamp opposed, on the ground that the measure had been insufficiently considered, that clergymen were already eligible for admission to the bar, and that young men would take orders with too little reflection if they were able at pleasure to resume the status of laymen.—The Bishop of Gloucester, in seconding the opposition, urged that the only civil disabilities under which clergymen laboured—ineligibility for parliamentary or municipal offices—might, if desirable, be removed in an easier manner than the bill proposed.—Lord Houghton said the bill was one of great importance, both to many excellent and respectable persons and to the Church, and he believed that if their lordships allowed the bill to pass they would do a service to the Church itself.—The Earl of Carnarvon said the bill was one which completely altered the status of the clergy, and the House ought to think twice before proceeding with such a measure at this period of the session, when it could not possibly receive the consideration it deserved. Consideration by a select committee would be the best it could receive, and that was now out of the question.—The Bishop of Llandaff trusted that their lordships would proceed with the bill.—The Bishop of Ely thought their lordships should pause before they passed the bill.—On a division a majority of 52 to 29 were for going into committee.—The House then went into committee, and the first six clauses were agreed to.—The Bishop of London moved the omission of clause 7.—The Bishop of Llandaff supported the clause, observing that it would obviate in some measure the objection which had been taken to the bill, that it would operate in deciding the question of the delibility of Holy Orders, inasmuch as the clause provided that the archbishop might restore a clergyman who had resigned without re-ordaining him. There were two safeguards provided by the bill. In the first place, the archbishop was required, before re-admitting such a young man to the ministry, to inquire into the circumstances under which he was led astray, his present opinions and his moral conduct. It was further provided that the applicant should not be capable of holding any preferment until after the expiration of two years. In addition to this, when at length he obtained a preferment, he must, like any other person similarly situated, present to the bishop of the diocese a testimonial to the effect that for three years he has neither held nor taught anything contrary to the doctrine or discipline of the Church of England. Surely these safeguards were amply sufficient, and their Lordships might with perfect security for the interests of the Church and of religion allow a locus penitentie for these young men.—The Marquis of Salisbury thought the State ought to act towards the Church as it did towards the other professions of which it held itself to be the guardian. If a barrister retired from the bar he gave up all claim to be a barrister. His opinion was that in the event of the clause being passed, many a clergyman who did not get on very well in his profession would take a secular employment, and at the same time keep a second string to his bow: for, if the clerical profession improved, or if he had a prospect of obtaining a good living, he might return to the Church.—Earl Beauchamp supported the clause.—Lord Lyveden said the clause would allow a person to play fast and loose, which would be highly discreditable to the clerical profession.—The clause was rejected by a majority of 71 to 13.—The remaining clauses were agreed to.

The Absconding Debtors Bill.—Committee.—On the motion of Lord Penzance, approved by the Lord Chancellor, the first six clauses were replaced by others, providing, with checks, that the court might order a debtor to be arrested if, after a debtor's summons had been served upon him, and before a petition of bankruptcy could be presented against him, there was reason to believe he intended to go abroad or to quit his house to avoid service.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

July 23.—Licences for Carriages Lent.—Mr. Salt asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it was necessary, under the present law, that a coachmaker who lends (as a matter of courtesy, not of profit) a carriage to a customer for a few days, during the repairs of another carriage, upon which duty had been paid, should take out a fresh licence for the carriage so lent.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer.—The rule is that a licence must be taken out for every carriage used by the person who makes use of it. The coachmaker keeps it and uses it by lending it to another person, and therefore he must take out a licence for it.

July 25.—The Appellate Jurisdiction and High Court of Justice Bills.—In reply to Mr. G. Gregory, Mr. Gladstone was sorry to say the Government had been obliged to abandon the hope of being able to proceed with these Bills; but they proposed to call the attention of Parliament to the subject early next session.

The Resignation of Benefices, the Union of Benefices, and the Sequestration Bills.—In reply to Sir George Grey, Mr. Bruce said it was now too late to proceed with either of these three bills, which had come down from the Upper House.

The Habitual Drunkards Bill, the Charities, &c., Exemption Bill, and the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations (No. 2) Bill were withdrawn.

The Corrupt Practices Act Amendment Bill was read a second time.

The Lords' amendments to the Liverpool Admiralty Districts Registrar Bill were agreed to.

The Government Law Charges.—In committee of supply, on the vote of £44,615 for law charges, Mr. Alderman Lusk said this item for law expenses became heavier every year.—Mr. Rylands urged an inquiry into the whole subject, and suggested an amalgamation of the several departments as regards legal officers. The expense was augmented by the Foreign Office practice of sending whole sacks full of papers to the law officers relating to a case upon which their opinion was sought.—Mr. Watkin Williams said that no legal business was so troublesome as Government business, none was so badly paid for, and none so little sought after.—Mr. Stansfeld said that a great part of the charge arose under statute; and the increase was accounted for by a series of fresh charges, such as the costs of the Courts of Chancery and Bankruptcy.—Mr. Otway said the Foreign office, unlike the Home and Colonial Offices, had no legal adviser; and in dealing with delicate questions, such as those arising out of naturalisation and shipping, it was better to submit the whole of the papers in the case to the legal adviser instead of drawing up a case.—Sir Roundell Palmer said that although submitting the whole of the papers in a case to the law officers entailed upon them greater labour, it was more satisfactory to them than to be asked to give an opinion on a case drawn up by another. The vote was agreed to, as were the following votes:—£200,633 for criminal prosecutions; £173,831 for the Chancery Courts; £62,315 for the Common Law Courts; and £79,377 for the Bankruptcy Court.

Salaries of County Court Judges.—On the vote necessary to complete the sum of £420,632 for county courts, Mr. Norwood asked what extra pay it was proposed to give to the county court judges who had had extra business imposed upon them in consequence of their having an admiralty jurisdiction conferred upon them.—Mr. West remarked that not quite six admiralty cases per judge had come before the county court judges during the past six months. If the county court judges sat four days a week they would not do as much work as the judges of the superior courts, and four days a week would not be more than the public had a right to get in the shape of service from these learned gentlemen.—Sir Roundell Palmer considered that the Legislature was entitled to add to the business discharged by all the judges of the land any other business of a similar nature which these judges were qualified to perform, and which they had time to perform, and he could not think that whenever it was proposed to give them additional jurisdiction there ought to be a demand for increased remuneration. If the Legislature threw on the judges business of a totally different nature from that which they had been in the habit of performing, and involving other qualifications than those which they might be supposed to possess, the case would be different, because that would be asking them to enter into a new contract. He did not think, however, that the Legislature was ever likely to do anything of that kind.—Mr. Cross said the real question to be considered was this, when they had enormously increased the responsibilities and duties of the county court judges, whether the salaries were sufficient to draw from the bar men of sufficient standing and ability to discharge those duties.—Mr. Locke thought it a great mistake that larger salaries had not been given to those who had more important duties to perform. The number of days that a judge sat was not the criterion, but the duties which he had to perform.—Mr. Walpole remarked that if they required more arduous duties to be performed, and a greater amount of ability than the county court judges at present possessed, it would be reasonable to increase the salary in proportion to the extra work and acquirements which were expected.—The vote was agreed to, as were also votes of £91,520 for the Court of Probate and Divorce, and of £13,200 for the registry of the Admiralty Court.

The Land Registry Office.—On the vote of £5,570 for the Land Registry Office, Mr. Goldney said that two or three years ago an indirect promise was made that it should be ascertained whether this office could not be amalgamated with some other. The office had been a failure, because it was ineffectual for its purpose, and while the profession generally had set themselves against it, the office had not been advantageous to the owners of land. The amount of the officers' salaries was fixed by the Act which created the office, and therefore it was impossible to reduce the vote, but if the office could not be amalgamated it would be more economical to abolish it and give some compensation to the officers for the loss of their posts.—Sir Roundell Palmer admitted that the office had not been extensively used, but the committee had not now to consider the repeal of the Act which created it. He, however, believed that it contained the germs of usefulness, and that it would lead to the simplification of titles, while the opposition to it was not wholly disinterested. He was told that the Lord Chief Baron had personally, and without the assistance of a solicitor, passed through that office the title to some land in which he was interested, at a very insignificant expense. He (Sir Roundell Palmer) endeavoured to register the title to an estate that he bought, but was not successful owing to his having to wait until some special conditions had worked themselves out, but if he lived long enough he would carry the matter through. Before many years had elapsed the House would have to take further steps towards the simplification of the law of real property, and then this office would prove useful.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer said there was much justice in the criticisms which had been passed on this office, but he hoped that hon. members would not persevere in their endeavours to break it up. He was one of the three commissioners on whose report the office was founded, and they thought that land should be dealt with on the same principle as money in the funds. Their report found favour with the legal authorities, but in carrying it into law Lord Westbury made a deviation which had been utterly fatal to the working of the office. It was with great sorrow that he found the office had not been successful, and it was quite right to say that the public did not get value for the money which was expended upon it. A commission, however, had been appointed to consider the matter, and their report, which recommended a return to the plan of the former commission, had been adopted by the Government, who had prepared a bill on the subject. Owing to the extraordinary pressure of business this session they had not had an opportunity of carrying that bill through the House, but if hon. members would be patient he trusted that another session would bring the bill before them.—Dr. Ball thought the office might be constituted on the principle of the Landed Estates Court, in which one-fifth of the land of Ireland had been sold. Perfect security was afforded, and the whole community derived great advantages.—The vote was then agreed to.

The Brokers (City of London) Bill was read a second time, it being stated that the Corporation would offer no further opposition.

The Ballot Bill (Mr. Leatham's bill). Debate on second reading, adjourned from March 16.—Mr. Gladstone having stated the reasons which had converted him from an opponent to an advocate of the ballot, and Mr. Disraeli having criticised those reasons and the withdrawal of the Government bill, the bill was read a second time.

The Benefit Building Societies and the Corrupt Practices Act Amendment Bills passed through committee.

July 28.—The New Law Courts.—Mr. G. Gregory moved —“That in the opinion of this House the building of the new Law Courts should be proceeded with without further delay.” He should not trouble the House at any length with this subject, for he hoped that the First Commissioner was substantially of the same opinion as himself, that he would accept the motion, and was prepared, on behalf of the Government, to say that they would place on the votes an estimate for proceeding with the works. If that were so it would be unnecessary for him to proceed with the motion.—Mr. Ayrton said he was anxious to see the building of the new courts of law proceeded with at the earliest possible period. It was the intention of the Government to lay on the table that evening an estimate for taking the preliminary steps and what could be done between this and the meeting of Parliament next year. Therefore it was not expedient to anticipate the discussion that would arise when that estimate was considered in committee. He hoped to proceed with the estimate on Monday.

The Irish Land Bill.—The Lords' re-amendments were agreed to.

The Brokers (City of London) Bill passed through committee.

Neutrality Law—Merchant Ships Bought from Belligerents.—Admiral Erskine asked the Attorney-General whether a French or Prussian merchant ship, now in a British port, if purchased bona fide by a British subject, and duly registered, would be exempt from liability to capture, as being indisputably British property.—The Attorney-General: I am not entitled to give an authoritative opinion on this question. Moreover, it is obvious that these queries on points of international law cannot decide the questions involved, and may lead to embarrassing discussions with foreign powers. According to my understanding of the decisions of the British courts, such a vessel would be held exempt from capture, and I believe that is also the American doctrine. But I am bound also to state that the French have maintained a different doctrine. The French have maintained that if the subject of a belligerent state possesses a vessel liable to capture he cannot get rid of it by sale; and if a Prussian ship is captured the tribunal to decide the question would be French. Transactions of this kind are always looked on with a certain amount of suspicion by Prize Courts, which are very careful to inquire whether the transactions are altogether bona fide or only colourable; and if they come to the conclusion that the transactions are colourable, notwithstanding the apparent sale, the original owner retaining some interest, or having made some bargain to have the vessel restored after the cessation of hostilities, if the sale was not out and out, it is liable to capture.

MORTGAGES BILL.

Very early in the session a bill was introduced into the House of Commons to facilitate the reinvesting of mortgaged estates in mortgagors. It was provided by the bill that a receipt endorsed on the mortgage deed for all moneys intended to be secured thereby, should be sufficient to vacate the same, and re-vest the estate in the person or persons for the time being entitled to the equity of redemption.

As might have been expected, a measure of such an imperfect character was very soon withdrawn. Very shortly afterwards, a second bill, of a similar character, was introduced, the object of it being; as stated in the preamble, to exonerate the owners of real property from the expense of getting a re-conveyance of a satisfied mortgaged estate.

By this bill it is provided that when any person competent to give a discharge for moneys due on any mortgage or other security shall, “by some writing,” acknowledge or declare that the same has been paid or satisfied, then and from thenceforth the mortgaged hereditaments shall be held for the same estates, and in the same manner and right in all respects as the same would have been held had the mortgage never been made. Then with regard to copyholds, such “writing” is not to extinguish the estate of the satisfied mortgagee until endorsement of a memorandum of satisfaction on the court roll, and such memorandum shall be so endorsed by the steward, on production of such “writing” as aforesaid, the signature thereto being verified by affidavit, the lord and steward being entitled to the same fees as they would have been entitled to in case the mortgaged security had been transferred instead of extinguished.

The council have before expressed an opinion, when Parliamentary measures affecting the law of conveyancing have been under consideration, that legislation on isolated points is extremely mischievous, and they have often deprecated the practice of making important measures of conveyancing the subject of fragmentary legislation. It was, therefore, thought desirable once again to give expression to this view, and to point out, in addition, the objections they entertained to the mode in which it is proposed to carry into effect the objects contemplated by the preamble of the bill.

The council accordingly forwarded some observations to the Attorney and Solicitor-General, Mr. Jessel and Mr. Dodds, in which they directed attention to the following points, viz.—

The proposed “writing” must be founded on a previous investigation as to who is a “person competent to give a discharge,” which is the main expense incurred in paying off a mortgage of long standing, and which expense, therefore, will not be saved if the bill passes.

In a simple case where there has not been any intermediate dealing with a mortgage, the deed reconveying the property is very short, and is usually endorsed on the mortgage; and in such cases there is no necessity for the proposed legislation, as the owner incurs but little expense beyond the stamp, which is equally chargeable on the writing proposed to be substituted for the reconveyance.

If a tenant for life pays off a mortgage charged on the corpus of a settled estate, and the mortgagee gives a receipt for the mortgage money, the mortgaged hereditaments would by the bill be excluded from the charge, as if the mortgage had never been made, to the detriment of the tenant for life, and those who claim under him.

The bill does not meet the case of a mortgage registered in any of the register counties in England, nor of mortgages in Ireland. A written acknowledgment or declaration could not have been the subject of a memorial for registry, and it may be doubted whether a writing without registration would in those counties, or in Ireland, have the effect intended. The document, moreover, designated as "some writing," if it be a mere receipt, would be very liable to be lost or mislaid.

That part of the bill which is applicable only to lands of copyhold or customary tenure, contemplates the transfer of a mortgage. The bill does not, apparently, apply to transfers of mortgages generally, but is limited to re-conveyances or re-assignments, and to surrenders on payment or satisfaction of the mortgage debt.

In the case of copyholds, where the mortgage is effected by covenant to surrender only, no notice of it appears on the court rolls, and if the covenant has been fulfilled by a conditional surrender, all that is now necessary is an acknowledgment of satisfaction of such surrender on the court rolls, and the bill provides nothing more, except the additional affidavit verifying the acknowledgment and, with it, consequent additional expense; moreover, the fee to the steward is now only 6s. 8d. or 13s. 4d. for enrolling the acknowledgment of satisfaction. Under the bill he will be entitled to fees as if the mortgage were assigned. This would involve the admission of the surrenderee, and a surrender by him, and a second admission.

If the first clause of the bill be held to apply to transfers of mortgages (and it possibly may so be held, because the mortgagee transferring acknowledges the receipt of his mortgage money), the latter part of the clause, vesting the estate as if the mortgage had never been made, might operate to exclude the transferee; and the result might be to prevent, in future, the transfer of a mortgage, and involve the necessity of a further mortgage whenever a transfer is required.

If the mortgage is to be dealt with as if it had never existed, very serious questions will necessarily arise as to the operation of this provision on the right of tacking, and as to the dealings with the equity of redemption during the existence of the mortgage; the rights and priorities of persons dealing with an equitable estate being materially different to those of persons dealing with a legal estate.

The bill was withdrawn on the 7th of July.

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY BILL.

Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Headlam, and Mr. Jacob Bright, the members who introduced this bill into the House of Commons, were members of the select committee to whom a bill, having the same object, was referred by the House in 1868. That committee examined witnesses as to the present state of the law in England, and the corresponding law in the United States and Canada; the objections to the former, and the benefit derived from the changes effected by the latter.

It would seem, on perusal of the appendix to the report of the select committee, that the evidence was, in a great measure, confined to witnesses from America and Canada, and some other persons whose evidence was almost exclusively confined to their experience amongst the working classes in London, and in some of the manufacturing towns. In their report, the select committee advocated a change in the law of England with reference both to the property and earnings of married women. The bill was brought in and read a second time in the year 1869, and referred again to a select committee, and as amended in that committee is the one introduced into the House in the present session.

The bill consists of three parts:—1st. It creates separate property for married women, to be recognised, and dealt with, as such, by the courts of common law. 2nd. It empowers married women to incur legal obligations, either by way of contract or tort, and defines the consequences of their so doing. 3rd. It amends the existing law in certain minor miscellaneous points.

It will be seen, therefore, that the bill effects a most complete alteration in the whole law as regards the property of married women, and although it is a measure that is entitled to great respect and consideration, reflecting as it does the opinion of so many able and eminent men, members of the select committee above referred to, yet it is confessedly a measure intended not for women who are possessed of property by inheritance or otherwise, but for those who have to struggle day by day with the hardships of life; such for instance as those engaged in mills or factories, or in a small way of business, to whom the law, protecting their earnings against dissolute husbands and securing to them the control of the fruits of their own labour, must obviously be a great advantage.

The more closely, however, the council examined this measure, the more serious appeared to be the disturbance of the existing social relations and legal system of this country, and it seemed to them that the bill ought not to become law until public opinion is prepared for so vast an alteration in the status of married women. The council did not, however, think it fitting that they should, on behalf of the profession, oppose the bill; for it is more within the province of legislators than legal practitioners to criticise its principle. It appeared to them desirable that they should confine themselves to stating the legal objections to the measure, and to an expression of opinion in favour of protecting the earnings of married women who are deserted or ill-used by their husbands.

The council accordingly presented a petition to the House of Commons to that effect, which Mr. George Gregory was kind enough to present; and they subsequently communicated their views to several leading members of the House of Lords.*

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEEDS BY MARRIED WOMEN'S BILL.

The object of the bill is, according to the preamble, to facilitate the execution and acknowledgment of deeds by married women.

It is proposed by the bill, in the first instance to repeal all the provisions in the 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 74, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 75, and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 67, with regard to the acknowledgments of deeds by married women before a judge, or a master in Chancery, or before two perpetual commissioners, or two special commissioners, and the making, returning, filing, and completing the certificate of acknowledgment. And the bill proceeds to enact, that in future every such deed required by the above acts to be acknowledged by a married woman, shall be valid and effectual if acknowledged by her before a judge, or before any perpetual commissioner or any commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery, or any special commissioner to be appointed under the proposed Act; and a provision is inserted for the issue of a special commission in any case where, by reason of the residence abroad, ill-health, or any other sufficient cause, any married woman shall be prevented from making an acknowledgment in the manner provided by the proposed Act.

Also, that no commissioner shall be appointed to take acknowledgments who is in any manner interested or concerned in the transaction, or who is concerned as attorney, solicitor, or agent, or as clerk to the attorney, solicitor, or agent so interested or concerned.

The married woman is to be examined apart from her husband, in accordance with the existing system, and the judge or commissioner is to sign a memorandum on the deed, in the form contained in the schedule, and such memorandum, when so signed, is to be conclusive evidence of the acknowledgment, and that all the provisions of the Act have been observed and complied with.

The fee to be taken by the commissioners is the same fee as that now allowed by law to each separate commissioner on taking acknowledgments of married women.

This bill is practically the same as the Execution of Deeds Bill introduced by Mr. Goldney in the year 1867, and on which, on the invitation of Mr. Goldney, the council expressed their opinion.

The council adhered to the opinion they have already expressed, the effect of which is as follows:—They concurred in the desirability of reducing the expenses of the present system, which undoubtedly bear hardly on parties transferring property of small value. They also thought that the filing of the certificate and affidavit, and taking an office copy of the certificate, might be safely abolished, and that the endorsement on the deed proposed by the bill would be sufficient for all purposes. They considered that the power to take acknowledgments should not be extended to the commissioners for taking affidavits in Chancery, but that such acknowledgments should continue to be taken by perpetual commissioners selected by the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas as persons of standing and experience; that one perpetual commissioner, however, should suffice to take an acknowledgment instead of two, as is now the practice.

In communicating their views to Mr. Goldney, the council pointed out that they knew from experience that much care and knowledge on the part of perpetual commissioners are often required to ascertain and explain the full effect of deeds submitted for execution by married women, and that the fee payable to the commissioners ought not to be fixed at any lower sum than that authorised to be taken under the existing regulations. This latter suggestion has been adopted in the present bill.

The council also observed that there was no provision for compensating the registrar and clerks in the offices proposed to be abolished, and that no provision to this effect is inserted in the bill now before the House of Commons.

That portion of the present bill which points out the mode of examination of a married woman, omits, in the opinion of the council, to provide that the commissioner shall ascertain on the examination whether any provision is made for her in lieu of any interest she may have in the property dealt with, and that if so it should be certified that such a provision has actually been made.

Subject to these observations, the present bill, so far as it tends to reduce the technicalities and expense of the present system, seems to the council to be unobjectionable, and they made a communication to that effect to the members having charge of the bill, and to some other members likely to take an interest in the subject.*

LEGAL EDUCATION AND STATUS OF THE PROFESSION.

In their last report the council explained very fully the course they had taken with reference to a scheme for the establishment of a law university common to both branches of the profession, and they expressed their opinion that the subject is too large to be disposed of without the most anxious discussion, to which the council will always willingly be parties; but they considered that the opinion of the profession and the public is not at present sufficiently pronounced to justify them in attempting to procure legislation on the subject.

Since that time the following correspondence has taken place between the council and an association which has been formed, called the Legal Education Association:—

“Legal Education Association.

1st June, 1870.

Sir,—We are instructed by the Committee of the Legal Education Association to hand you copies of the circular in which is contained a statement of the objects of the association and a list of those who have already consented to become members of its council.

We are directed to ask the favour of your submitting the circular to the council of your society, and to express, on behalf of the association, the hope that they will approve of the objects which the association have in view, and will nominate some of their body as members of the council of the association.—We have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servants,

ARTHUR JOHN WILLIAMS,

WILLIAM A. JEVONS,

FRANK R. PARKER,

E. W. Williamson, Esq. Hon. Secretaries.”

“Incorporated Law Society, U.K.

Chancery-lane, London, W.C.,

11th June, 1870.

Dear Sirs,—I am directed by the Council of the Incorporated Law Society to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 1st instant, enclosing a circular in which is contained a statement of the objects of the Legal Education Association, and a list of those who have already consented to become members of its council; also expressing a hope that the council of this society will approve of the objects which the association has in view, and will nominate some of their body as members of the council of the association.

The education of our branch of the profession is a measure of the greatest importance, and deserves the full consideration which the council of this society have always given to it. The improvements which have been made at the instance of this society during the last few years, by the establishment of the preliminary and intermediate examinations and law classes, afford evidence of the anxiety of the council on the subject.

The change proposed in your circular is so extensive, that the council consider they ought not, in their corporate character, and as representing so large a proportion of the practising attorneys and solicitors, to express their approval of the object of the association, without ascertaining, as far as practicable, the views and opinions of the profession. When the details of the proposed scheme are laid before the council, they will give them their best consideration.

The council consider that it would be premature for them now to nominate any of their body as members of the council of the association.—I am, dear Sirs, yours faithfully,

E. W. WILLIAMSON, Secretary.

Arthur Jno. Williams, Esq.,

William A. Jevons, Esq.,

Frank R. Parker, Esq.,

COMMISSIONERS TO ADMINISTER OATHS IN CHANCERY.

At the annual general meeting of the society, held on the 10th of July, 1868, the members were informed that the council had supported the Committee of Management of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association in a memorial to Lord Chancellor Cairns, praying that his Lordship would be pleased to grant commissions to administer oaths in Chancery, upon the application of all solicitors of ten years' standing, who could produce the requisite certificates of respectability, although they resided or carried on their business within one mile of Lincoln's-inn Hall.

At the same meeting, a letter was read from the secretary to the Lord Chancellor to the secretary of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, stating that the view which the Lord Chancellor took of the measure was, that when it could be done it was very desirable that all affidavits and declarations should be made at some public office, and that the appointment of commissioners was to be regarded in the light of an indulgence to those suitors and others who, from the circumstance of their residence or otherwise, are unable to obtain reasonable and easy access to such public offices. That, as the Record and Writ Clerk's Office is close to Lincoln's-inn Hall, and is open for some part of the day during the whole year, no necessity exists for the relaxation of what his Lordship considered to be the better practice, by the appointment of commissioners in the immediate neighbourhood; and that, entertaining this opinion, the Lord Chancellor declined to enter further into the question.

In May last, the council received a letter from the secretary to the present Lord Chancellor asking whether, in the opinion of the council, the rule which limits the granting of applications to such solicitors as reside within the prescribed distance of Lincoln's-inn might not properly be rescinded, and also whether the procedure for obtaining commissions to administer oaths in the country might not be assimilated to the more simple procedure with regard to applications in London; and whether, in fact, the appointment of a commissioner might not be properly given to any solicitor whose respectability is established, without reference to distance from Lincoln's-inn or the number of other commissioners in the immediate neighbourhood of his office. The Lord Chancellor's secretary also observed that should the appointments be thus generally made, and the procedure as to country commissions thus simplified, it had been suggested that in lieu of the present stamp of £1 a stamp of £5 should be impressed upon every appointment to be so made.

The council, in answer to this inquiry, addressed a letter to the Lord Chancellor's secretary expressing their entire concurrence in the suggestions made with reference to granting commissions to all solicitors of known respectability who had been ten years in practice, without reference to the rule above referred to, and stating that the council failed to perceive any reason why the procedure with reference to commissions granted to country solicitors might not be assimilated to the more simple procedure adopted with regard to commissions granted in London. The council also referred to the correspondence with Lord Cairns on the subject in the year 1868, and observed, with regard to the suggested increase of the stamp, that such increase was inexpedient and unnecessary, as appointments to administer oaths are not granted for the personal benefit of the solicitors to whom they may be given, but for the convenience of the suitors and the profession generally.

* The bill was withdrawn on the 7th July.

OBITUARY.

MR. S. HATCHARD.

Mr. Samuel Hatchard, barrister-at-law, died suddenly in London on the 25th of July. He was the third son of the late Rev. John Hatchard, M.A., Vicar of St. Andrew's, Plymouth. His three surviving brothers are the Rev. J. Alton Hatchard, of St. Leonard's-on-Sea, Dr. Thomas Hatchard, and Commander Josiah Hatchard, R.N., now in command of H.M.S. Camelion. Mr. S. Hatchard was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in April, 1853, and practised at the chancery bar as a draughtsman and conveyancer.

MR. F. H. NEWELL.

Mr. Frederick Hasell Newell, solicitor, of North-hill, Colchester, died on Sunday evening, July 10, at the age of eighty-two, having been admitted in the year 1815. We take the following from the Essex Standard:—"Remarkable as he was for high-minded conscientiousness in the discharge of his varied professional duties, and for his moderation and wisdom as a counsellor and adviser, he will be still better remembered for the constancy and earnestness with which he aided every religious and benevolent movement in this town and neighbourhood for upwards of half a century. For 25 years he was the active Secretary of the Colchester and East Essex Church Missionary Association; and other kindred societies, e.g., the Bible Society, the Society for Promoting Christianity Amongst the Jews, the Religious Tract Society, Church Pastoral-Aid Society, &c., ever reckoned on his devotion, and never reckoned in vain. He was a member of the Hospital Committee from its formation: indeed that excellent institution will lose in him a most steady and faithful friend—for during many years, and until his last illness, he employed every Sunday afternoon in reading to and conversing with the patients. . . . By his decease the Original Winstree Association for the Prosecution of Felons will lose a faithful solicitor and treasurer, Mr. Newell having being associated with the society in that capacity for upwards of fifty years. . . . Mr. Newell was of an ancient family originally seated in Yorkshire, but for many generations resident in the Low Countries. He was the youngest son of Dr. Robert Newell, of Colchester, a man of great celebrity in his profession, and associated with Dr. Jenner in his researches and discoveries. At the weekly meeting of the committee of the Essex and Colchester Hospital on Thursday the following resolution was passed, and ordered to be entered on the minutes:—"The weekly committee have heard with the deepest regret of the death, since their last meeting, of one of their oldest members, indeed, one of the founders of the hospital, that of Mr. F. H. Newell, who for the long period of fifty years has uninterruptedly attended to the affairs of the institution, taking a lively interest in the conduct of the business, in the welfare of the officers of the establishment, and in the comfort of the patients, not only visiting them frequently during the week, but also for many years regularly on the Sabbath. The loss of this gentleman will be greatly felt, and it is the wish of the board that their sympathy and condolence on the melancholy occurrence be suitably presented to Mrs. Newell."

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE ACTS.

EXTENSION TO "THE COURT OF PENTICE" AND "THE COURT OF PORTMOTE," CHESTER.

1870. July 6. Whereas by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, it is enacted, that it shall be lawful for her Majesty from time to time, by an Order in Council, to direct that all or any part of the provisions of the said Acts respectively shall apply to all or any courts or court of record in England and Wales, and that within one month after such order shall have been made and published in the London Gazette, such provisions shall extend and apply in manner directed by such order, and by the Acts secondly and thirdly mentioned it is further provided that in and by such order her Majesty may direct by whom any powers or duties incident to the provisions applied under the said three Acts respectively, shall and may be exercised with respect to such court or courts, and may make any order or regulations which may be deemed requisite for carrying into operation in such court or courts the provisions so applied; and whereas it has seemed fit to her Majesty, by and with the advice of her Privy Council, that the provisions hereinafter mentioned of the said Acts should be extended and applied to the courts of record of the city and borough of Chester, called "The Court of Pentice" and "The Court of Portmote":

Now, therefore, her Majesty, by and with the advice aforesaid, is pleased to order and direct, and it is hereby ordered and directed, that within one month after this order shall have been published in the London Gazette, the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, contained in the sections of the said Act numbered respectively 2 to 8 (both inclusive), 11, 13, 15, 16, 17, 20, 25 to 40 (both inclusive), 41, except so much thereof as relates to causes of action in different counties, 42 to 81 (both inclusive), 83 to 96 (both inclusive), 117, 118, 119, 123, 126, 128, 129, 130, 131, so far as (and inclusive) of the words "or to the like effect," in that section, 133 to 138 (both inclusive), 139, except the words "two terms," which shall be read as if they were "three months," 140, 141, 142, 143, except so much thereof as relates to a motion in arrest of judgment, pursuant to 1 Will. 4, c. 7, 144, 145, 168 to 177 (both inclusive), 178, except so much thereof as relates to the sheriff being directed to summon a jury, 179, 180, 181, 183, 187 to 201 (both inclusive), 203 to 207 (both inclusive), 209 to 214 (both inclusive), and 218 to 222 (both inclusive); and also that the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, contained in the sections of the said Act numbered respectively 18 to 31 (both inclusive), 83 to 86 (both inclusive), and 96; and also that the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, contained in the sections of the said Act numbered respectively 19, 20, and 21, shall apply and be extended to the said courts of record called the "Court of Pentice" and the "Court of Portmote." And her Majesty is further pleased, by and with the advice aforesaid, to order and direct that all the powers and duties incident to the above-mentioned provisions, hereby applied and extended to the said Courts of Pentice and Portmote, and exercisable under any of the said provisions by the Court or a judge, shall and may, with respect to matters in the said Courts of Pentice and Portmote, be exercised by the recorder for the time being of the said city and borough of Chester, or by his duly appointed deputy; and that the powers and duties incident to the above-mentioned provisions, and exercisable under any of the said provisions by a master, shall and may, with respect to matters in the said Courts of Pentice and Portmote, be exercised by the registrar for the time being of the said courts, or by his duly appointed deputy.

COURT OF PROBATE.

DEBTORS ACT, 1869.

Rules for regulating the Practice under and carrying into effect the First Part of the said Act.

In pursuance of the Debtors Act, 1869, it is ordered, that on and after the day mentioned at the foot of these rules, the following rules shall be in force for regulating the practice under and carrying into effect the first part of the said Debtors Act, 1869.

1. All applications to commit to prison under sect. 5 shall in the first instance be made by summons before the judge, which shall specify the date and other particulars of the order for non-payment of which the application is made, together with the amount due, and be indorsed with the name and place of abode or office of business of the proctor or attorney actually suing out the summons, and in case such attorney shall not be an attorney of this court, then also with the name and place of abode or office of business of the attorney in whose name such summons shall be taken out, and when the attorney actually suing out such summons shall sue out the same as agent for an attorney in the country, the name and place of such attorney in the country shall also be indorsed upon the said summons, and in case no attorney shall be employed to issue the summons then it shall be indorsed with a memorandum expressing that the same has been sued out by the plaintiff or defendant in person, as the case may be, mentioning the city, town, or parish, and also the name of the hamlet, street, and number of the house of such plaintiff's or defendant's residence, if any such there be.

2. The service of the summons, wherever it may be practicable, shall be personal; but if it appear to the judge that reasonable efforts have been made to effect personal service, and either that the summons has come to the knowledge of the debtor, or that he wilfully evades service, an order may be made as if personal service had been effected upon such terms as to the judge may seem fit.

3. Proof of the means of the debtor shall, whenever practicable, be given by affidavit; but if it appear to the judge, either before or at the hearing, that a visa voce examination, either of the debtor or of any other person, or the production of any document, is necessary or expedient, an order may be made commanding the attendance of any such person before the judge at a time and place to be therein mentioned for the purpose of being examined on oath touching the matter in question (or and) for the production of any such document, subject to such terms and conditions as to the judge may seem fit. The disobedience to any such order shall be deemed a contempt of court and punishable accordingly.

4. The order of committal (which may be in the form A in the schedule or to the like effect) shall, before delivery to the sheriff, be indorsed with the particulars required by rule 1 of these rules. Concurrent orders may be issued for execution in different counties. The sheriff shall be entitled to the same fees in respect thereof as are now payable upon a ca. sa.

5. Upon payment of the sum or sums mentioned in the order (including the sheriff's fees, in like manner as upon a ca. sa.) the debtor shall be entitled to a certificate in the form B in the schedule, or to the like effect, signed by the proctor or attorney in the cause of the plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, or signed by the plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, and attested by an attorney or justice of the peace.

6. The sheriff or other officer named in an order of committal shall, within two days after the arrest, indorse upon the order the true date of such arrest.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

With the exception of the advance in the Bank discount rate, which has now mounted to five per cent., the week has been very much like the preceding one. The amount of distrust with which the various markets have been regarded has varied from day to day, and prices rule much as last week. They will go up as soon as the end of the war arrives, and they may in the meantime fall lower than they now are. The last rise in the Bank rate may be regarded more as a precaution than as a measure prompted by any shortness in the supply of money.

THE WAR.

The following have been issued by France and Prussia respectively:—

FRANCE.

His Majesty the Emperor of the French has felt himself obliged, in order to defend the honour and interests of France, as well as to protect the balance of power in Europe, to declare war against Prussia and against the Allied States which afford her the co-operation of their arms against us.

His Majesty has given orders that, in the prosecution of this war, the commanders of his forces, by land and sea, shall scrupulously observe towards such powers as shall remain neutral the rules of international law, and shall especially conform to the principles laid down in the Declaration of the Congress of Paris of the 16th of April, 1856, which are as follows:—

1. Privateering is and remains abolished.
2. A neutral flag covers enemy's merchandise, with the exception of contraband of war.
3. Merchandise of neutrals, except contraband of war, sailing under an enemy's flag is not seizable.
4. Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effectual; that is, they must be maintained by a force really sufficient to prevent the enemy from obtaining access to the coast.

Although Spain and the United States did not adhere to the treaty of 1856, his Majesty's ships will not seize enemy's property sailing on board an American or Spanish vessel, unless such property is contraband of war.

Moreover, his Majesty does not intend to vindicate his right of confiscating the property of American or Spanish subjects which may be found on board an enemy's vessel.

The Emperor is confident that, in just reciprocity, her Majesty's Government will have the goodness to prescribe measures for the exact observance on their part by the British authorities and subjects of the duties of strict neutrality during this war.

PRUSSIA.

Decree respecting the capture and seizure as prize of war of French merchant vessels. July 18, 1870.

French merchant vessels shall not be subject to be captured or seized as prizes of war by vessels of the Royal Navy of the Confederation. This rule does not, of course, apply to those vessels which would be subject to capture or seizure if they were neutral vessels.

As to the case of vessels purchased by neutrals of subjects of the belligerents, see Parliament, House of Commons, July 28.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT.

Amsterdam Exhibition, 1869. First Prize, being above the Gold Medal. Supplied to the British, French, Prussian, Russian, Italian, Dutch, and other Governments. Dr. Lankester writes regarding Extract of Meat:—"But there is a difference in flavour, and here, as in all other kinds of food, it is the flavour that makes the quality." It is essentially on account of the fine meaty flavour, as distinguished from the burnt taste of other Extracts, the LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT defeated all Australian and other sorts at Paris, Havre and Amsterdam, and is so universally preferred in all European markets.

One pint of fine-flavoured Beef-tea at 2½d. Most convenient and economic "stock."

CUTION.—Require Baron Liebig's, the inventor's, signature on every Jar, and ask distinctly for LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT.

The Solicitors' Journal.

LONDON, AUGUST 6, 1870.

MR. MERRIMAN'S PROPOSED BILL for the admission of solicitors to certain offices at present confined to the bar seems likely to be productive of a good deal of controversy. Our own opinion on the question pretty nearly coincides with that of Mr. John Daw, whose very sensible letter on this subject will be found in another column. We can see no reason whatever for the exclusion of anyone, solicitor or barrister, from any office which he is qualified to hold, and we would gladly welcome a provision opening any office in the profession, judicial or otherwise, to such solicitors as may be qualified to fill them; and there must be many such, at any rate so far as regards the minor offices, up to and including that of county court judge. On the qualifications of solicitors for the superior judgeships we desire to express no opinion; we think it likely that few men qualified for such a position should have continued to practice as solicitors instead of "emigrating" to the bar; but if any such there be, we see no reason for their exclusion merely because they are solicitors.

On the other hand, we cannot accede to the proposal to confine the qualification to such solicitors as have chosen to become members of the Incorporated Law Society—a test at most of readiness to spend a small sum of money in return for the advantages of a convenient club. Looking at the circumstances under which Mr. Merriman brought forward his proposal, we can not but look upon this provision as—we use the term in no invidious sense—somewhat of the nature of clap-net. Some time ago it might indeed have been argued that this membership was at least a guarantee of professional honour, because the council of that society exercised, or got the credit of exercising, the most stringent supervision over the conduct of its members; but unless we have been misinformed, and that from the most authentic sources, the council have lately refused to take this course, and have said that it was no part of their business to interfere with their members so long as they did nothing of which the courts could take cognizance; and if this be so, the condition of membership reduces itself to a mere money payment and ought not, therefore, to enter into the proposed qualification.

Still less can we concur in the proposal to disqualify the bar for any offices which they at present hold, and we should hope that any so illiberal and narrow-minded proposition of persevered in, would ensure the failure of the whole scheme. On the contrary, our idea is one of entire reciprocity; we would open all offices, not only those now confined to the bar but also those now exclusively in the hands of solicitors, to the whole profession indistinctly, only hoping that the best man would be appointed; so that, while we would gladly see a properly qualified solicitor appointed a county court judge, or to any higher office, we would equally desire to see the best qualified candidate, though he should happen to be a barrister, appointed to a vacant chief clerkship, or a taxing master, or registrar in chancery. It is most unlikely that the fittest candidate for any of these offices could ever be a barrister, but if he were, we should be glad to see his technical disqualification removed or disregarded. In one word, our desire is to see the fittest man appointed to every vacancy without regard to his previous professional status, except in so far as that may furnish some sort of test of fitness for the post, and we look upon all statutory disqualifications, existing or proposed, with disfavour.

IT SCARCELY LIES IN THE MOUTH of Prussia to complain of the export of coal from this kingdom to France during the present war, considering that during our own Crimean war Prussia carried on a large trade in the export of "munitions of war" for Russia. It has never been the custom for neutral Governments to interfere with the details of their subjects' trade. The utmost that is done is to pass a foreign enlistment bill and to admonish subjects not to trade to the belligerents in general matters material to the struggle, and to warn them that if they do it will be at their own risk. America, for instance—mentioned this week in the House of Commons as a country which carried out the principle of neutrality to its proper limits—has not done more than pass an Act similar to that which our own Legislature has just completed (though our own Act goes a trifle further in detail), forbidding the furnishing of men and of ships in certain capacities. And the reader will understand our recent remarks as to insurances as restricted to those cases in which the traffic is actually prohibited by our own municipal law; as, for instance, by the new Foreign Enlistment Act. It was indeed once considered to be law in this country, that the sovereign's proclamation admonishing his subjects not to do certain things as between two belligerents had the force of law. Consequently, it was held in innumerable cases that under such circumstances, blockade-running, &c., were absolutely illegal; which illegality, of course, carried with it the consequence that contracts relating to such acts were illegal likewise. This rule, however, has been, so far as English municipal law is concerned, definitely abandoned. On that point we need only refer to the case of Ex parte Chavasse, Re Grazebrook (13 W. R. 627), in which Lord Westbury distinctly laid down the principle that exportation to belligerents is not contrary to our municipal law unless in terms forbidden by it, and the Queen's proclamation does not make that unlawful which was not unlawful before. In that case Chavasse and Grazebrook joined each other as partners in a blockade-running venture. Chavasse having become bankrupt and Grazebrook having executed a deed of assignment, the trustees of the latter petitioned in the bankruptcy for an account of the partnership dealings. The Commissioners in bankruptcy dismissed the petition on the ground that the partnership was an illegal one, but the Lord Chancellor reversed that decision.

LAST TUESDAY a case was decided in the Court of Admiralty which might have given rise to some curious questions respecting the conflict of laws. It was a suit by the Submarine Telegraph Company against the ship Clara Kilham, for injury done to the company's cable. The ship anchored off Deal in rough weather, and she drove a considerable distance. When the anchors were raised to the surface they were found entangled with the telegraphic cable. The crew cut the cable to free the anchors. The only substantial defence to the ground of action appears to have been that it was impossible to extricate the anchors, "before the lapse of a considerable time, save by severing the cable." Sir R. Phillimore held that as the ship was not in danger at the time, the excuse afforded no justification for cutting the cable, and the Clara Kilham was held liable.

No question arose here about the law to be applied to the facts, but cases might be imagined, and, considering the great increase of submarine telegraphy, will probably arise, when the most curious points of law might be raised. For instance, suppose a French vessel lets her anchor down upon an English cable not within the jurisdiction of any state having recognised laws, and breaks the cable, and does great damage. By what law is the liability, if any, of the French vessel to be ascertained? Is the English law of trespass to prevail, and is the vessel to be liable even although she is not guilty of any negligence? Or would negligence be of the essence of the action according to English law? Or is the French law to govern the case? If neither the French nor English law applies, then what law applies?

Again, if the fact of liability is ascertained, by what law is the measure of damages to be regulated? If a telegraphic cable is broken, this is almost certain to be a most important question involving a consideration of loss of profits, time for repair, loss by rival lines, &c., in addition to the actual cost of repairing the damage.

These questions would be difficult enough when the system of law by which they are to be determined is ascertained. When, however, the facts arise in "no man's land" the difficulty is increased tenfold. If any number of such questions as these should arise, judges will be exposed to a great temptation to seek out some imaginary lex maris for their solution, as the Roman lawyers invoked the lex naturæ whenever they came upon a state of facts to which their own law could not be applied.

WHEN OUR NEW LAW COURTS have got themselves built at last, what a long and tedious history theirs will be to look back upon. Perhaps such an observation ought not to be made before we have got out of the wood, but we can imagine future lawyers and suitors ruminating within its walls over the long years of delay,—the perils the scheme has gone through,—its transformations,—the risk, at one time so imminent, of that most ridiculous of all bouleversements, the abandonment of this prepared site for one by the river,—and wondering how the new courts ever got built at all. The cleared site between Carey-street and the Strand has been undisturbed for a long time, affording to persons who peep through the hoarding a sort of sample of the view which that friend of hack writers, Macaulay's New Zealander, is to enjoy on a larger scale. It seems, however, that the work is really about to move forward at last.

On Tuesday Mr. Ayrton announced in the House of Commons, on taking a vote for £21,450 for laying the foundations, that, subject to the approval by the Royal Commissioners of the altered plan which Mr. Street had devised, the work might begin forthwith.

On Wednesday the Commission held its last sitting and approved the plan (which the Lord Chancellor signed as chairman of the Commission). The new plan is much like the one circulated among the M.P.'s two or three days ago, but with buildings (tower-staircases higher than the courts), which will protect the courts from the noise of the Strand. The chief conveniences for every court provided in the plans approved a year or two ago by the Commission are preserved in the final plan. The general public, the witnesses, the attorneys and officers, the bar, the jury, and the judges will each have their separate set of accesses to the courts. Each court will have or be able to have light on all its four sides, and also roof lights.

The block of courts and the central hall will run from north to south, not from east to west as in the plan formerly approved. The Central Hall will be on the level of the Strand, and the courts on the floor above—i.e., on the level of Carey-street, which is about seventeen feet above the level of the Strand. This change in the line of the Central Hall will let the sunshine on everyone of the courts some part of every sunny day—certainly an advantage.

The great block of offices will be placed parallel to and adjoining to Bell-yard, between it and the courts. There will have to be some offices excluded from the present (or first erected) block which it would have been well to have had placed there. But there will be ground to the west on which further offices can (and no doubt some day will) be erected.

Such are the main characteristics of the new plan, and altogether, though largely and not wisely curtailed, it will contain all the more important advantages presented by the plans approved above two years since by the Commission.

NEUTRALITY LAWS.

In our article last week upon the neutrality laws we stated the principal provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act (59 Geo. 3, c. 69), and that a royal commission appointed in 1867 to consider the working and effect of that statute had suggested several alterations in the law. Most of these suggested alterations have been embodied in the bill now introduced by the Government into the House of Commons, and entitled "a bill to prevent the enlisting or engagement of her Majesty's subjects to serve in the foreign service, and the building, fitting out or equipping in her Majesty's dominions vessels for warlike purposes without her Majesty's license." The bill, which was read a second time on Monday last, passed through the committee on Wednesday; the amended bill was considered on Thursday, and by this time has probably been read the third time.

By section 31, it repeals altogether the Foreign Enlistment Act, and it re-enacts such provisions of that statute as are to be retained, and introduces some important alterations. Sections 4—7 of the bill correspond with sections 2, 5, and 6, of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and forbid foreigners in British territories and British subjects everywhere from enlisting in the military service or naval service of any foreign state at war with any friendly state. The words and scope of these sections are much wider than these corresponding sections of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and section 6 is new and embodies one of the suggestions of the commission—viz., that it should be an offence to induce persons by misrepresentation to quit her Majesty's dominions or go on board any ship with intent that such persons should accept service with a state at war with a friendly state. This is aimed against a proceeding that was several times adopted during the American war by the Confederate Government whose agents shipped men for fictitious voyages, and then endeavoured to induce the men to serve on board the vessels, when they became Confederate cruisers. Out of ninety men shipped in this way in the Alabama, seventy afterwards took service in her as a Confederate cruiser.

Section 8 is the most important of the whole bill, and it answers to section 7 of the Foreign Enlistment Act. It provides that if any person within her Majesty's dominions (1) "builds or agrees to build, or causes to be built;" (2) or "issues or delivers any commission for;" (3) or "equips," (4) or "despatches, or causes, or allows to be despatched any ship with intent, or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe that the same shall or will be employed in the military and naval service of any foreign state at war with any friendly state" he shall be punished as therein specified and the ship shall be forfeited. This includes, but in more simple and intelligible language, the chief provisions of section 7 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and adds new ones.

The Foreign Enlistment Act does not prohibit the "building" of vessels (Attorney-General v. Sillem, 13 W. R. 257); nor does it contain the word "despatch." The material words of the statute are "equip, furnish, fit out, or arm, with intent or in order" that the vessel should be employed, &c., &c. Not only, therefore, does the bill add to the number of forbidden acts, but it provides that if done with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe that the vessel will be employed, &c., it will be an offence against the law. This section therefore proposes to extend very considerably the existing restrictions upon shipbuilding in time of war, and thus to increase the duty of the Government in the observance of neutrality. A clause was added to this section in committee for the protection of shipbuilders who before or never have contracted to build vessels for a foreign State.

By section 9, when any vessel is built for or delivered to a foreign state at war with a friendly state, and is used by such state in its naval or military service, the vessel shall, until the contrary is proved, be deemed to have been built in violation of the statute. Section 10 substantially re-enacts section 8 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, which forbids the adding to the warlike equipment of foreign vessels of war. By section 11 no ship in the service of a foreign state at war with a friendly state, built or despatched, &c., in contravention of the statute, shall be received in any British port, and any prize made by any vessel so built, &c., shall, if brought within the jurisdiction of the Crown, be restored to its owner (section 14). Section 11 was subsequently withdrawn by the Attorney-General, on the understanding that its principles should be carried out for the future by regulations to be laid down by the Government. The preparing or fitting out of any naval or military expedition against any friendly State is forbidden by section 12, and ships, arms, &c., used in such expedition are to be forfeited.

These provisions comprise all the substantive law in the bill. Sections 16—30 relate to procedure. Sections 16—18 relate to the venue of indictments and to other minor matters. By sections 19, 20, and 27 all proceedings for a forfeiture of a "ship" (the sections ought to include, but do not, all forfeitures under the bill, as, for instance, under section 12) require the sanction of a Secretary of State, and shall be had in the Court of Admiralty, with an appeal to the Privy Council. Officers of customs, and of the army and navy (called the "local authority") are authorised to seize ships liable to seizure (section 21), and—what seems to be an unnecessary amount of caution—they are authorised to use force if necessary, and are indemnified against any consequences of so doing (section 22). When it appears to a Secretary of State (section 23) that there is reasonable and probable cause for believing that a ship is about to be despatched in violation of the law, the Secretary may issue a warrant to the "local authority" directing them to detain such ship. The "local authority" also, without any warrant, having reasonable and probable cause for believing, &c., may detain such ship. A Secretary of State may also grant a search warrant to examine any dockyard, &c. (section 25). The powers given to a Secretary of State may be exercised out of Great Britain by the chief executive authority as defined in section 26. By sections 28 and 29 there shall be no civil or criminal proceedings against officers, Secretary of State, &c., for anything done under the powers conferred upon them, but the Court of Admiralty shall have power to award damages for the unreasonable detention of any vessel (section 23). The bill excepts (as does section 12 of the Foreign Enlistment Act) persons entering into the service of States in Asia. If any person does any of the forbidden acts he may be punished by fine or imprisonment not exceeding two years, at the discretion of the Court before which the offender is convicted. In addition to this offending vessels may be detained under section 7 and forfeited under sections 8 and 12.

The bill, as it now stands, may be roughly described as the Foreign Enlistment Act, plus the recommendations of the Commission of 1868, and it proposes two most important alterations. By section 8 it forbids (in accordance with the recommendations of the Commission) the "building" or "despatching" of vessels with even reasonable cause to believe that they will be employed in the service of a foreign state at war with a friendly state. This provision exactly meets such cases as those of the Alabama and the other three vessels (Shenandoah, Florida, and Georgia) which were despatched from English ports unarmed, but subsequently received armaments and commissions elsewhere and became Confederate cruisers. There was much doubt whether, under the Foreign Enlistment Act, the fitting out and despatching, &c., of the vessels was illegal, more especially of the three latter vessels. Under the present bill the despatching of such vessels would be clearly illegal.

Mr. Vernon Harcourt, one of the members of the Commission, dissented from the recommendation that the "building" of vessels should be made illegal. His objections are that this would impose a new duty not hitherto recognised in international law and therefore a new responsibility; that the execution of this duty would be odious in this country, and not to execute it after it had been created by our own legislation would be a just ground of complaint by foreign states; and also that it would seriously interfere with the shipbuilding trade of this country. These arguments he repeated in the debates on the bill. They certainly are not without weight. At the same time we think the Government were right in forbidding the building as well as the despatching of vessels. There is no doubt that the proposed legislation would extend the duty of neutrality beyond that hitherto required by international law, but this cannot be considered in itself an evil if such alteration would be an improvement, and especially when, as here, such alteration seems almost the only effectual way of stopping what are admitted to be breaches of international law—viz., the fitting out and despatching of armed vessels. If an improvement can be made in the law respecting the obligations of neutrals this country ought to be the last to shrink from the duty of carrying out such an improvement even on the lowest ground of self-interest, and we do not believe that there would be any practical difficulty in enforcing the proposed law nor do we think it would injure the general shipbuilding trade, although it might inflict some loss on shipbuilders who would be willing to imperil the neutrality of their country for their own pecuniary gain.

The second important proposed change is in the procedure (including as procedure the provisions of sections 9, 11, and 14), which is scarcely less important than the law itself. The bill gives summary authority to a Secretary of State, and also to the "local authority," to stop vessels, if they have reasonable cause to believe that the vessels are about to be despatched in violation of the statute. There is no civil or criminal liability for the exercise of this power, even if it should be wrongly exercised, and this power is in addition to that given to the "local authority" by section 21 to detain a ship which is in fact liable to be detained or seized under the Act.

This bill, which will probably become law next week, will be a valuable addition not only to our municipal law, but to international law, and we fully agree with the general scope of its provisions. One section, however (section 14), has hardly received the attention it deserves. It is at least doubtful whether its provisions could be enforced without a breach of international law. The prizes, when taken, would be lawful prizes, and could lawfully vest in the captors, and we do not see how the property in the prize can be re-vested in the owner by an English statute, or how jurisdiction could be enforced over such a prize in the possession of a commissioned vessel of a belligerent. It is clear that British ports might be closed to such prizes, but to assert a right to retain them is very different, and would inevitably tend to cause a collision with any State strong enough to resist such a proceeding.

The subject of this bill is so important and of such general interest that we have not occupied any space in noticing its form, or in verbal criticism of its provisions, which, however, are by no means free from the usual blemishes of English statutes. It is not unimportant to observe that if the provisions of this bill had been in force during the American war, and had been duly acted upon by the Government here, we should have had no Alabama claims at all, and but little of that feeling of irritation which still unfortunately exists between this country and America. If the bill becomes law, it can hardly fail to have an important bearing upon the future discussion of the Alabama claims.

ON THE CAPITALISATION OF PROFITS AS BETWEEN TENANT FOR LIFE AND REMAINDERMAN.

Where the profits of a company or partnership are capitalised, such profits are in general treated as capital, not income, as between tenant for life and remainderman. This was established by the leading case of Paris v. Paris (10 Ves. 185), where Lord Eldon, following, though disapproving, the former decisions, held that an extraordinary division of profits by the Bank of England, beyond the then usual rate of seven per cent. per annum, was to be considered as capital not income. It was the practice prior to 1861, whenever the half-yearly dividend on Bank Stock exceeded three and a half per cent., to issue a general order directing the Accountant-General to draw only for three and a half per cent. except where the dividends were to be laid out; but under the order of the 16th of August, 1861, the whole of such dividend is to be drawn for the future. The Court, in Paris v. Paris, was pressed with the fact that the bonus was given in the shape of cash, not of stock, and was asked to infer from that circumstance that such bonus was the result of profits earned since the last distribution, and therefore properly income, and the property of the tenant for life; but the Court declined to draw any distinction on that ground between the case and Brander v. Brander (4 Ves. 100), where stock, and not cash, was the thing distributed by way of bonus, and was held to fall into the corpus. In Clayton v. Gresham (10 Ves. 288) Lord Eldon pursued the same course.

In Re Ezekiel Barton's Trusts (16 W. R. 392, L. R. 5 Eq. 238) shares in a joint stock company were settled upon trust to pay to A. during her life the interest, dividends, share of profits, or annual proceeds, and after her death in trust for the settlor's children. During A.'s lifetime an addition of three new fully paid-up shares was made to the shares originally settled, out of a portion of the net earnings of the half-year not appropriated to the payment of dividend, and it was held by Vice-Chancellor Wood that these new shares were capital, not income, as between A. and the children. Here the shares were distinctly created out of the half-year's profits, to which, if the company had chosen to treat them as dividend, A. would unquestionably have been entitled; but it was competent for the company to capitalise this portion of their profits, and they had chosen to do so. It was therefore an act of which the tenant for life could not complain, though the effect of it was to vary the rights as between her and those entitled in remainder.

The same judge, in Baring v. Ashburton (16 W. R. 452), decided upon similar grounds that a stock dividend upon stock in the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, declared about six weeks after the testator died, was corpus as between tenant for life and those entitled in remainder, it being admitted that, unlike the preceding case, the stock dividend did not accrue out of profits made by the company within the half year in which the testator died, but that it arose from an accumulation of profits, extending over a period of several years.

There is less difficulty in cases like the last, and Ward v. Combe (7 Sim. 634), where a bonus out of accumulated profits was considered as part of the corpus of the trust fund, than in cases of the class of Re Ezekiel Barton's Trusts. Where the bonus arises solely from the profits of the half year it may seem harder to deprive the tenant for life of it than where it arises from the accumulations of past half years, although it arises from profits in either case. But the ratio decidendi in such cases is that explained by Vice-Chancellor Wood in Re Ezekiel Barton's Trusts, and already adverted to, that profits, however realised, remain income, or become capital, in the discretion of the company or partnership, subject to the articles by which they are bound. As Vice-Chancellor Shadwell said in Mills v. Mills (7 Sim. 509): "it depends on the will of the directors of the Bank (of England) whether the casual profits, which are fully as valuable as the ordinary profits, shall go to tenants for life, or shall form part of the capital of the stock," i.e., if the directors declared a dividend of, e.g., ten per cent. all of it would have gone to the tenant for life; but if in their discretion, confirmed by the voice of a general meeting, they chose to declare a dividend of seven per cent. and a bonus of three per cent., either in cash (Paris v. Paris) or in stock (Brander v. Brander), then such bonus would have formed part of the capital, and the tenant for life must have abided the consequences.

On the other side of the question is Hollis v. Allan (14 W. R. 980), where shares in the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company were settled, and there was a proviso that if any bonus should be declared in respect of the shares that it should be invested in augmentation of the settlement, and Vice-Chancellor Kindersley decided that small sums distributed annually among the proprietors out of the surplus of the proprietors' underwriting account were not in the nature of bonus, as they had not been capitalised, and the mere calling them bonus did not make them so. The Vice-Chancellor's observations on the definition and meaning of the term bonus (14 W. R. 981) should be referred to.

The word bonus is often but incorrectly used to designate any dividend from current profits over and above the ordinary dividend, which is put at a rate which experience shows can be maintained de anno in annum. This is the practice with many of the leading joint stock banks at the present time. In Plumbe v. Neild (8 W. R. 337), where a so-called bonus had been declared on shares of the Union and London and Westminster Banks, and it was manifest from their published reports that such bonus was a portion of the actual profits of the current half year, it was regarded as income, not corpus.

In Maclaren v. Stainton (3 D. F. J. 202, 9 W. R. 908), a bonus arising from the recovery of a sum of money fraudulently withheld by the manager during a series of years was held to belong to the persons entitled to the dividends at the time when the bonus was declared. "In order to constitute a debt capital," in the words of the Lord Justice Turner, "you must show that there was an intention on the part of the persons interested that it should be dealt with as capital. If it has been reserved, and set apart as capital, it would, I apprehend, of course be capital, as between tenant for life and remainderman; but if it has not been so received and set apart, and there be nothing more than the fact that the debt has been got in, it must, as I conceive, be treated as income and not as capital." In other words, the debt, when got in, formed a portion of the year's income, and, in the absence of any express or implied declaration that it should be capitalised, income it remained. To the same effect is Edmonston v. Crosthwaite, 34 Beav. 30.

We have seen that companies and partnerships may, at their discretion, subject to their rules and regulations, capitalise all or any portions of the year's profits, and that the tenant for life must abide the consequences. But the capitalisation must be effected by some express resolution, or it will not take place, and what was income once will remain income still. In Straker v. Wilson (18 W. R. 643), the case which induces us to recur to this subject, which has been already treated of in our columns (12 S. J. 602, 822), the resolution to that effect was wanting, and the profits in question were accordingly treated as income, and not as capital. In Straker v. Wilson the share of a deceased partner in a colliery was carried on by his trustees, and held by them upon trust for the widow during her life, and after her death for the children of the testator. The deed of partnership provided that upon every yearly settlement of the accounts, all, or some part, of the net profits should, if the majority of the partners preferred it, be either capitalised or divided between the partners, in proportion to their respective shares. Several years after the testator's death, the capital for each share was fixed at £20,000, and dividends declared thereon, the undivided credit balance being carried forward at the end of every year and employed in carrying on the colliery, but without any resolution that such profits should be capitalised. The decision that the testator's share in such undivided credit balance was, as between the widow and the children, to be treated as income, proceeded upon the want of such an express resolution. The fact that the profits were silently treated as capital was not enough to vary the rights of tenant for life and remainderman, in the absence of some express resolution of the partners that the profits should be capitalised. The case establishes that the rights of the tenant for life and remainderman cannot be varied by mere inference that it was the intention of the company or firm to capitalise profits, but that an express declaration or resolution to that effect is needed, the consequence of which, as we have already seen, the parties must abide.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

PATENT—SPECIFICATION—DRAWING—NOVELTY.

Poupard v. Furdell, V.C.M., 18 W. R. 127.

In Ex parte Fox, 1 V. & B. 67, Lord Eldon said, in 1812: "I take it to be clear that a man may, if he chooses, annex to his specification a picture or a model descriptive of it; but his specification must be in itself sufficient; or, I apprehend, it will be bad." In no subject is there so much difficulty and danger in the application of old decisions to modern instances as in that of patents; the last fifty years have witnessed great changes in the requirements which the law makes of inventors and in other matters; and besides this the progress of mechanical science, which prompted those alterations of the law, places the subject, in many instances, under quite a new aspect. An inventor's complete specifications must, by the Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852, "particularly describe and ascertain the nature of the invention, and in what manner the same is to be performed"—which is interpreted to mean that it must describe it so that ordinary skilled workmen could make it from the description. In these modern days one can very well understand that it might be almost, perhaps quite, impossible to make a description surely intelligible to ordinary minds without a drawing; and Vice-Chancellor Malins very reasonably follows Hastings v. Brown (1 E. & B. 454, and see Coryton on Patents, 141) in disregarding Ex parte Fox on this point.

The other point in this case turned on the application of old contrivances to a new purpose in a patent for improvements. We do not know that any inexorable criterion is possible on such a matter. Lord Campbell in Brook v. Aston (8 E. & B. 485), said that to make the application of an old contrivance to a new purpose a proper subject-matter of a patent, there must be some novelty in the application,—of which definition Lord Chelmsford observed (Penn v. Jack, 15 W. R. 208, L. R. 2 Ch. 135) that if the old invention is applied to a new purpose, there cannot help being novelty in the application. Cockburn, C.J., in Harwood v. Great Northern Railway Company (10 W. R. 422, 2 B. & S. 208), observed that the question, whether the affinity or similarity between the old purpose and the new amounts to identity, is one of degree, and that question determines whether or no the new application is proper subject-matter for a patent. In Harwood's case the Lord

Chief Justice considered there was identity. In Penn v. Jack the improvement was in the bearings of screw-propeller shafts, by lining them with slips of wood through which the sea water flowed freely and lubricated the contact. It was urged that in grindstone bearings iron was constantly to be found revolving in wood wetted with water, but the Court said that was different from the case of a bearing expressly made with wood, in order to let in the lubricating water.

In the present case the improvement was in making skids for carriages with a tailpiece which both helped the wheel into the skid, and prevented its getting out. It was in evidence that skids had been previously used in our army, with a similar tail-piece, but the tail-piece had been designed merely to serve as a hook to hang up the skid by; the Vice-Chancellor considered that this was not a prior user. To a casual observer the army tail-piece was exactly like the inventor's, but, in fact, not having been designed for the same purpose, it occasionally obstructed the wheel in the skid. Had this been otherwise there might have arisen a question which the Lord Chief Justice noticed only in Harwood's case; viz., whether a prior use of an invention is to be of no avail because the principle upon which it acts is either unknown or misapprehended.

OF AFFIDAVITS SWORN BEFORE THE AGENT OF THE SOLICITOR ON THE RECORD.

Ex parte Gregg, Re Prance, M.R., 18 W. R. 589, L. R. 9 Eq. 157.

It is a well-known rule that an affidavit must not be sworn before, or an oath administered by, a commissioner who happens to be the solicitor on the record, or his agent. As regards the agent, however, the rule requires to be stated with some qualification. In a case before Lord Hardwicke, where the affidavit had been sworn before the petitioner's own attorney, the petition was dismissed with costs to be paid by the attorney (Re Hogan, 3 Atk. 812), and in Wood v. Harpur (3 Beav. 290) affidavits were rejected on the objection that they had been sworn before a master extraordinary who was also clerk to the plaintiff's solicitor. In Ex parte Gregg one of the grounds of the motion was that the affidavit objected to had been prepared by Mr. Prance, the solicitor on the record, and by him sent down to a solicitor in the country, to get it sworn; and sworn it was accordingly before the solicitor in the country, who was of course Mr. Prance's agent in the transaction. This brings us to the qualification above referred to. It was contended that the affidavit ought to be rejected on the ground of agency. An agent the solicitor unquestionably was, but he was altogether dehors the matter, and the rule as to agency applies only, as the Master of the Rolls decided, to cases where the agent is privy to the facts of the case. It is easy to see why affidavits sworn before one who possesses an intimate knowledge of the case should be rejected, by reason of the bias which may warp the mind of the person who reads over and explains the affidavit to the witness (Foster v. Harvey, 12 W. R. 92). The rule in such a case is needed for the protection of the witness (Re Hogan, ubi sup.). But a commissioner is not debarred from administering the oath simply because he happens to be the agent of the solicitor on the record in other matters.

COMMON LAW.

MARINE INSURANCE—BREACH OF WARRANTY OF SEAWORTHINESS—LOSS NOT CAUSED BY WANT OF SEAWORTHINESS.

The Quebec Marine Insurance Company v. Commercial Bank of Canada, P.C., 18 W. R. 769.

A "warranty," in the language of marine insurance, is a condition precedent, upon the performance of which the underwriter's liability depends. If this condition is not duly performed, the risks under the insurance do not attach—i.e., the contract of insurance is subject to the condition, and until the performance of the condition there is no binding contract. Even if the non-performance of the condition is caused by events over which the insured had no control, the result is precisely the same as if he had himself knowingly caused the non-performance of it. It follows, from this principle, that if a vessel is insured subject to a warranty which is not performed, and is then lost, although the loss is not in any way connected with the subject of the warranty, the insured cannot recover, because there never was any complete contract.

One of the warranties about which questions most frequently arise is the warranty of seaworthiness. In the absence of express stipulation, there is implied in every policy of marine insurance a warranty that the vessel is seaworthy at the commencement of the insured voyage. If she sails in an unseaworthy state, there is a breach of this warranty, and the risk under the policy never attaches, and if the vessel is lost, the underwriters are not liable, although the loss was not caused by the want of seaworthiness.

This is an old and well-known doctrine of the law of marine insurance, and it has been recognised and acted upon in The Quebec, &c. Co. v. The Commercial Bank of Canada. The chief reason, however, for noticing this decision is that it finally overrules a case which is somewhat inconsistent with the rules respecting warranties which we have mentioned. This case is Weir v. Aberdeen (2 B. & Ald. 320), where the decision was, in the words of the head-note, as follows:—"A ship insured at and from a port sails on her voyage in an unseaworthy state. The defect is discovered before any loss accrued, and is remedied, and a loss subsequently accrues in no degree attributable to her original unseaworthiness. Held, that the underwriters were liable for such loss."

This case has not been received as conclusively deciding this point, and there are other cases inconsistent with the decision. It has, however, caused a difficulty by being in conflict with decisions which in practice have been accepted as stating the law correctly. There were also special circumstances in the case on which the actual decision might have been based, and now, since The Quebec, &c. Co. v. The Commercial Bank of Canada, it must be taken that the decision can only be supported on the special facts and not on the point stated in the head-note. In The Quebec, &c. Co. v. The Commercial Bank of Canada, an insured vessel sailed in an unseaworthy state. She was subsequently rendered seaworthy, and then lost from causes not attributable to her original unseaworthiness. The Privy Council held that the underwriters were not liable, and by this decision therefore, in fact, overrule Weir v. Aberdeen, as that case is stated in the head-note.

MARINE INSURANCE—CONSTRUCTION OF POLICY— "MOORED IN GOOD SAFETY."

Lidgett v. Secretan, C.P., 18 W. R. 692.

It is not too much to say that no contracts are habitually so obscurely expressed as the common contracts of marine insurance as stated in the ordinary marine policy in every day use. These policies are quite unintelligible to anyone not familiar with the subject of marine insurance, and they conceal rather than express the obligations created by the contract.

The form of policies of marine insurance has hardly altered at all for upwards of two hundred years, and we consequently now have in common use a form of instrument that is utterly unsuited to the wants of the present time. The continued use of this antiquated precedent is frequently defended on the ground that having been long in use, its meaning is now well ascertained by many judicial decisions. To a certain extent this is true. Much that on its face appears meaningless if read in the way in which ordinary documents are read, yet has a meaning if read by the light of the cases decided upon it.

This, however, is a very insufficient reason for continuing to use year after year a form of contract, the meaning of which is to be gathered not from the written instrument itself, but from the judgments of cases decided at various times upon different clauses of that instrument. The assumption, however, that the construction of these instruments is well ascertained is disproved every term by the number of cases that arise in which there is some question as to the meaning of these documents. Lidgett v. Secretan is an instance that some of the most important clauses of an ordinary policy of marine insurance may yet give rise to questions concerning their meaning. In this case a vessel was insured "at and from London to Calcutta and for thirty days after arrival"; and, subsequently, in the policy, the insurance was expressed to be on the vessel "until she hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety." The vessel arrived at Calcutta much damaged, and it required constant pumping to keep her afloat, but she was not a wreck and was capable of being thoroughly repaired. More than thirty-one days after her arrival she was totally burnt.

Two questions arose: first, what is the meaning of mooring "in good safety"? secondly, do the thirty days count from the commencement or the expiration of the twenty-four hours? The ship-owner argued that the vessel had never been anchored "in good safety," because when anchored she could only be kept from sinking by constant pumping, and that the thirty days must be reckoned from the expiration of twenty-four hours after the vessel was anchored in safety, and consequently that the thirty days had not expired, and that the defendants, the insurers, were liable.

The decision was against this argument. The Court said that the words "in good safety" "cannot mean that the vessel is to arrive without any damage or injury whatever from the effects of the voyage, otherwise the loss of a mast or even a spar, a sail or a rope, though the vessel was perfectly fit to keep not only the river but the sea, would, contrary to all the ordinary meaning of language, prevent her from being considered as in safety. So, on the other hand, the words would not, in our opinion, be satisfied by the vessel arriving and being moored in a sinking state or as a mere wreck or by a mere temporary mooring." The test thus offered by the Court for the decision of such cases as these is whether the vessel is moored as a vessel capable of being repaired, or as a mere wreck. The facts in this case showed that the vessel was not a wreck when moored, and therefore the defendants were held not liable.

The further question whether the thirty days ought to be reckoned from the arrival of the vessel at Calcutta or from her having been moored twenty-four hours in good safety was not determined, as it was not necessary for the decision of the case; and this point therefore still remains in doubt.

The fact that cases like Lidgett v. Secretan are constantly arising, and that the construction of policies of insurance is frequently found by no means clear, is the strongest argument against the continued use of this form of contract. The language and form of these policies are antiquated and have lost the force and meaning they once possessed, and there is no reason why parties entering into contracts of insurance should not state the terms of their contracts in the language of the present time. One of the many benefits which may be looked for from the simplification of the law, the education of lawyers, and the consequent increase amongst the public of some general knowledge of law, will be the abolition of all antiquated and useless precedents for the forms of contracts such as policies of marine insurance, bonds with penalties, leases, conveyances, &c., and the substitution in their place of simple instruments stating in concise and ordinary language the terms in fact agreed upon between the parties.

COURTS.

MIDLAND CIRCUIT.

LINCOLN.

CROWN COURT—(Before Mr. Justice BRETT.)

Aug. 2.—Freer v. Cheeseborough.

This was an action for malicious prosecution.

Digby Seymour, Q.C., Wills, and Welby were for the plaintiff; Price, Q.C., and Cave, Q.C., for the defendant.

The plaintiff, Mr. Thomas Freer, is an attorney of the firm of Hett, Freer, & Hett, of Brigg. He acts as clerk to the Justices at Winterton, and is also clerk to the Local Board, &c. The defendant had entered into partnership with a Mr. Faulding, as furriers, in 1866, and in 1869 the partnership was being wound up. Mr. Freer, who was Mr. Faulding's solicitor, was consulted as to the dissolution. Mr. Faulding laid an information against Mr. Cheeseborough for appropriating the partnership funds, and Mr. Cheeseborough was committed for trial, but at the Spring Assizes the grand jury threw out the bill. Mr. Freer assisted in the case for the prosecution. On several occasions subsequently Cheeseborough said to Freer, "We shall soon see who was the thief who embezzled the money." On the 17th of November Cheeseborough applied for a summons against Freer, charging him with embezzling money received by him in his office as clerk to the magistrates. After a full investigation, the magistrates refused to grant a summons. On the 3rd of December Cheeseborough renewed the application and the summons was again refused, and on the 4th of February he preferred a charge of a common law misdemeanour against Mr. Freer, in appropriating money in his office as clerk; this charge was also dismissed.

Price, Q.C., said he had advised his client to do what he had thought from the first would be the better course, and he now withdrew every charge against Mr. Freer.

His LORDSHIP.—There is not the slightest colour whatever for the charge which has been made, and Mr. Freer leaves the court with a character as clear as any man's can be.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN-FIELDS.

(Before Mr. Registrar PEPPYS.)

Aug. 1.—In re R. H. B. McMullen.

This was an application by Mr. Ellerton, solicitor, formerly in partnership with the debtor, for the repayment in full of certain sums of money which he had paid on account of his late partner. It appeared that Mr. McMullen, who practised at Kensington, had filed a petition for liquidation by arrangement under the 125th and 126th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. At the first meeting under the liquidation, Mr. Ellerton proved his debt, but the creditors did not come to any resolution except that the meeting should be adjourned for six months. Mr. Ellerton now applied for payment of his claim in full, a portion being for rent in respect of which he alleged the debtor was liable, and £6 13s. 4d. for income tax. It seemed that disputes had arisen between the partners, and a dissolution followed.

Reed, for Mr. McMullen said the application was of a most extraordinary character, and the Court had no jurisdiction to deal with it. Mr. Ellerton, having proved his debt under the proceedings, asked that he might receive payment in full before the other creditors obtained a farthing; a course which could not for one moment be sanctioned.

MR. REGISTRAR PEPPYS said this was a most unusual application, and it was impossible that Mr. Ellerton, who had elected to come in as a creditor under the liquidation, could have a double remedy. The application must be dismissed with costs.

In re Ernst.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 125, 126—Petition under—Delivery of debtor's books to trustee.

The debtor in this case had filed a petition for liquidation under sections 125 and 126 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and the receiver under the liquidation now applied for an order for the committal of the debtor for contempt, on the ground that he had wilfully omitted to deliver up his books of account. It appeared that several applications had been made for the books, but for some reason they had not been delivered up. A first meeting of creditors had been appointed at which the debtor hoped to lay a satisfactory proposal before his creditors.

Mr. J. S. Salaman (solicitor) in support of the application.

Reed, for the debtor, said the real difficulty was this, that if the books were delivered to the receiver at once he would be in a position to collect the debts due to the estate; a course which was intended to be avoided by the offer of a satisfactory composition.

The CHIEF JUDGE was of opinion that the debtor was bound to deliver to the receiver all books of account, and his Lordship made an order for that purpose, but upon the condition that no application should at present be made to the debtors to the estate for payment, either by the receiver or by the debtor himself.

(Before Mr. Registrar S. RICE, sitting as Chief Judge.)

Aug. 3.—Re Pratt. Ex parte Pettit.Remuneration of receiver.

Under the petition in this case, Mr. Pettit, accountant, had been appointed receiver by order of the Chief Judge. He was subsequently displaced by resolution of the creditors, and application was now made for the allowance of his charges.

Reed, in support of the application, said there could be no doubt of the propriety of the claim.

R. Griffiths opposed the application, on the ground that the appointment was unnecessary and improvident.

The REGISTRAR said that he could not go behind the order of the Chief Judge appointing the receiver, and Mr. Pettit was entitled to remuneration for the services he had rendered.

Griffiths intimated his intention of bringing the matter before the Chief Judge.

COUNTY COURTS.

LAMBETH.

(Before R. J. CUST, Esq., Deputy-Judge.)

July 28.—Bailey v. Barton—Possession of tenement held under lease with right of re-entry—Costs.

This was a plaint issued under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 52, for possession of a tenement held under lease with right of re-entry, the rent being half a year in arrear, and there being no sufficient distress on the premises. After hearing the evidence prescribed by the section, the judge made an order for possession, when

Mr. Ody, for the plaintiff, asked for costs, and quoting from the last new rules the one numbered 13, said the judge had power to allow costs on the scale for upwards of £20 in cases of this kind, if the fees of court were paid on £5 or upwards. The fees in this case had been paid on £17 10s., that being the half-yearly rental, and he thought his Honour might very properly consider it a case for costs on the higher scale.

Mr. CUST said he would give the costs, but, it appeared from the section that they could not be enforced in the usual way. His order could only be an alternative one for possession, unless rent in arrear be paid within a month. If the rent and costs were not paid, it appeared that the plaintiff would have to enforce the order for possession at his own cost, the Legislature apparently considering that to give a landlord possession before the expiration of the term of the lease was sufficient return for his outlay.

Mr. Ody said in that case his client would not only lose the costs of the ejectment if he had to enforce the order (which was a certainty), but he would then have to bring another action to recover the rent and costs now found to be due.

Mr. CUST said that appeared to be so, because he had no power to order payment of the rent.

APPEALS FROM REVISING BARRISTERS.—In the ten years 1860-69 the Court of Common Pleas heard 92 appeals from judgments of revising barristers; 55 decisions were affirmed, and 37 were reversed.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. GEORGE PARSONS HESTER, solicitor and town clerk of Oxford, has been appointed Clerk to the Addenbury Turnpike Trustees, in the room of Mr. Henry Churchill, solicitor, of Deddington, who has disappeared. Mr. Hester was admitted an attorney in Easter Term 1819, and besides the town-clerkship of Oxford, he holds the offices of Clerk of the Peace, Registrar of the County Court, and Clerk to the Commissioners of Taxes.

Mr. HENRY THOMAS COLE, Q.C., has been appointed, by the Attorney-General, to be Leading Counsel to Her Majesty's Post Office in the Western Circuit, in succession to the late Mr. Serjeant Kinglake. Mr. Cole is the son of the late Captain George Cole, by Sarah, daughter of the late Captain Crozier, R.M. He was born on the 2nd of February, 1816. In November 1842, he was called to the bar by the Hon. Society of the Middle Temple, and was made a Queen's Counsel and Bench of his Inn in January, 1867. He is a member of the Western Circuit, and was appointed Recorder of Penzance in 1862.

Mr. SHAFTO ROBSON, solicitor, of Newcastle and Gateshead, has been appointed Clerk to the Borough Magistrates of Gateshead, in succession to the late Mr. John Hunter. The other candidates were Mr. Theodore Hoyle, Mr. W. Lockey Harle, and Mr. J. A. Bush, solicitors, of Newcastle, and Mr. W. H. D. Longstaffe, solicitor, of Gateshead. Mr. S. Robson, the successful candidate, was admitted in 1865.

Mr. JAMES COOK, solicitor, of Bridgwater (firm Reed & Cook), has been elected by the Bridgwater Town Council, to be Treasurer of the Borough, which office was rendered vacant by the decease of Mr. W. J. Knight. Mr Cook was certificated in 1864.

Mr. WILLIAM PARTRIDGE, solicitor, of Tiverton, has been elected Clerk to the Land and Assessed Tax Commissioners of that borough, in the room of Mr. R. G. Tucker, solicitor, deceased. Mr. Partridge was admitted in 1845, and is also clerk to the magistrates of Tiverton. Mr. R. F. Loosemore, solicitor, was also a candidate for the vacant clerkship.

Mr. RICHARD THOMAS HETT, solicitor, of Darlington, has been appointed, by the Local Board of Guardians, to conduct prosecutions under the Vaccination Act. Mr. Hett was certificated in 1867.

Mr. W. B. MOORE, Deputy Clerk to the Borough Magistrates of Wolverhampton, has been appointed Clerk to Mr. J. E. Davis, stipendiary magistrate of Sheffield. On leaving Wolverhampton, Mr. Moore was presented, by the attorneys practising before the borough bench, with a handsome gold pencil and pencil-case. They also testified to the able and courteous manner in which he had for the last three years discharged the duties of deputy clerk.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS' DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.

Sir,—Herewith I forward you for perusal, and if you deem it expedient to insert in your columns, either in whole or part, copy of certain letters received by me from representative members of our profession in the country.

I may add that I have many other communications from solicitors on the matter, but I do not think it necessary to trouble you with any of them as the same questions are raised as in the letters now submitted through you to the profession at large.

The principal object, however, with which I address you myself, is to say that I consider my own exclusive part in this work is now at an end, and that it remains for the profession generally to take such action in the matter as may be thought necessary and expedient.

In the exercise of what I considered more a duty than a right, I drew up a resolution and submitted the bill to the Incorporated Law Society at its last meeting, and afterwards forwarded a copy of that resolution and bill to the several provincial societies. The result has, up to the present moment, far exceeded any anticipation of mine; and I have no cause to regret my initial proceedings. The further prosecution of this measure is, however, obviously too important a task for any one man to undertake, and I may say unfeignedly that I have no desire to occupy a prominent position or sustain a leading part in what, after all, must be regarded as a necessary work. If a number of gentlemen will co-operate I shall have no objection to join them, and render such assistance as my other engagements will permit.

JOSIAH J. MERRIMAN.

2, Poets Corner, Westminster, S.W., August 4.

Spring-gardens, Haverfordwest,
22nd July, 1870.

Dear Sir,—I thank you very much for the copy resolution and bill which you kindly sent me. It is a step in the right direction, and I hope you will succeed. If you do, we shall be all deeply indebted to you. I wish your bill went a little farther, and removed the present disqualification of solicitors to act as justices of the peace for the counties. This is a grave slur on them. Many solicitors are at present in the commission, but cannot qualify, and many more would be put in were it not for the disability. We know from experience that no men are calculated to make such useful magistrates as solicitors of experience and position. Qualification might be made to debar them from practising either in petty or quarter sessions or before magistrates.

In the present day, and with the weight of influence that solicitors possess now, such a measure could not fail to receive great support in the House. Could you by any possibility induce the Law Society to incorporate this in the bill?—Believe me, yours very truly,

J. J. Merriman, Esq.

Attorneys and Solicitors' Disabilities Bill.

Dear Sirs,—I feel sure your proposed bill would meet with the approval of our Law Society. It is only fair and equitable that such a change should be made. Unfortunately the course of modern legislation runs in the contrary direction.—Yours truly,

Messrs. Merriman & Co.

H. A. OWSTON,

Hon. Sec.

Preston Law Society,
July 25th, 1870.

Dear Sirs,—I have laid your bill and letter before the committee. They entirely concur in the spirit and object of the bill. At the same time, I am instructed to inform you that if the qualification of membership with the Incorporated Law Society is a sine qua non, that the bill, if introduced, will meet with a strenuous and determined opposition.

The greater proportion of the members of the profession practising in the country are not members of the Incorporated, and if the bill were to pass in its present form three fourths of the country solicitors would be excluded from the benefits it seeks and professes to confer. So great an injustice can never have been contemplated by you or the framers of this bill.

Mere membership in the Incorporated, which is only a question of £ s. d., does not increase the status of the profession.

I have been instructed to communicate to you as within.—I am, Sirs, yours truly,
Messrs. Merriman & Co.
P.S.—Will you have the goodness to inform me when it is intended to introduce the bill and who will have charge of it?

Attorneys' Disabilities Bill.

Dear Sir,—This step in the right direction, I doubt not, will meet with the heartiest approval of the society, many members of which have frequently commented upon the invidious exclusion, to the public loss, of the profession from so many minor judicial and public appointments.—Faithfully yours,

J. J. Merriman, Esq.

Hon. Sec.

13, Bedford-circus, Exeter,
25th July, 1870.

Dear Sir,—I am obliged by your sending me the bill in Parliament and resolutions of the Incorporated Law Society. Some fifty years since the lower branch of the profession was, as a rule, unfit for judicial office, but modern education has qualified them for all minor judicial offices; and I think they should not be disqualified from any office. If they are equally or more fitted than barristers for offices they should have them; but this will only apply to offices of secondary importance.

I disapprove the 3rd section, disqualifying barristers from being eligible for the office of Solicitor to the Treasury, &c. In asking to have offices thrown open to solicitors it seems rather contradictory to ask to have barristers excluded from other offices, and which they at present hold.

I have some doubts whether the clause restricting the appointments to members of the Incorporated Law Society is correct. It is giving power to the Incorporated Law Society to prevent the Government appointing any particular member to an office, and it will afford an argument to opponents to the bill that the object is to make men join and pay yearly contributions to the Incorporated Law Society.—I am, dear sir, yours very truly,

Josiah J. Merriman, Esq.

County Court, Sunderland,
July 26th, 1870.

Dear Sirs,—I have conferred with the presidents of the Sunderland Law Society respecting your favour of the 23rd inst. and enclosures.

We approve of the bill in the main, and shall be glad to obtain an expression of opinion from the society, which we do not doubt would be in its favour when such a course is likely to assist the promoters.

There is one feature in the bill, however, which does not seem to be in accordance with the resolution. I mean that membership of the Incorporated Law Society should be a condition without which no attorney should be qualified to fill a judicial office. It may be very desirable to support the Incorporated Law Society, but the fact of rendering such support cannot be a test of "special ability and experience."

—Yours faithfully,

Attorneys and Solicitors' Disabilities Bill.

Dear Sir,—There can be no objection to this bill whatever, though I much doubt if it will do much good, though it may a little.

Although a member of the Law Society myself I cannot see how membership of that body can be any qualification for any judicial or other appointment, as all that is required to constitute such membership is a subscription of £2 (or £1).

—Yours faithfully,

H. FOARD HARRIS.

Attorneys and Solicitors' Disabilities Bill.

Dear Sir,—I duly received your communication, which I will bring before our committee at its next meeting. I have shown your letter and the draft bill to the chairman and one or two other members of the committee, whose feelings appeared to be one of approval of the measure, but not of the required qualification of membership of the Incorporated Law Society, which they feared likely to subject the bill to a charge of invidiousness, and to lay its object open to suspicion.—I am, dear sir, yours truly,

Dear Sir,—I duly received your letter of the 23rd July, with a copy of the above bill.

I have not had any opportunity of bringing the matter before the standing committee of this society as yet, and I shall probably not have any such opportunity before October. I have, however, mentioned the subject to several of the members, who all approve of the project, and I have no doubt the committee generally will take the same view of the matter when it is brought before them.—Yours faithfully,

Dear Sir,—The Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool desire me to acknowledge the receipt of your communications of the 23rd ult. and 1st inst., with the suggested bill in draft, and to state that they await the action of the Incorporated Law Society upon their resolution of the 19th July, 1870.—Yours truly, Attorneys' Disabilities Bill.

Dear Sir,—The Brighton Law Society is not at the present time in proper working order, and I cannot send you its opinion on this subject. For myself, I have long been of opinion that an end should be put to the monopoly by the Bar of all the smaller prizes of the profession.—I am, yours truly, Attorneys and Solicitors' Disabilities Bill.

Dear Sir,—I certainly think it an anomaly and injustice to solicitors that the departments of solicitors to the Government offices should invariably be in the hands of barristers, and as far as the proposed bill provides that hereafter solicitors are to be included as eligible for such appointments, I approve of the measure. As regards county court judges I doubt the expediency of making solicitors eligible. It is often urged by members in Parliament that, seeing the increased importance of county courts, it is highly necessary that the appointment of county court judges should be given to barristers of greater ability and learning than those who now hold the office.

It would be advantageous to the public if the profession of attorneys could act as magistrates, as well stipendiary as ordinary. In the latter case he should be disqualified from acting as attorney in any criminal court of any kind. He would then be free from partiality as the present borough magistrates, who are generally tradesmen carrying on business in the town. One of the best chairmen of county quarter sessions for Worcestershire was a retired attorney.—Yours faithfully,

Josiah J. Merriman, Esq.,

Maidstone, 3rd August, 1870.

Dear Sirs,—I have received your proposed bill for repealing attorneys and solicitors' disabilities, and have perused it, and will bring it under the notice of the committee of the Kent Law Societies when they meet.

In the meantime I may say that on the 2nd clause I should anticipate a difference of opinion, though not upon the 3rd.—Yours faithfully,

COMMISSIONERS' FEES.

Sir,—Will you state in your columns—

1. What is the proper fee for a commissioner to administer oaths in chancery in England to demand and take for swearing a deponent to an affidavit, and for each exhibit (if any)?

2. What is the proper fee for a commissioner for taking affidavits in the Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster to demand and take for swearing a deponent to an affidavit, and for each exhibit (if any)?

The great difference which exists in different parts on this subject must be my excuse for troubling you.

VESTRY MEETINGS.

SIR,—Will you permit me to make a short reply to "Inquirer," whose letter appeared in your last number?

The right of the minister to preside appears to be so undoubted a fact that, save by statutory exception, I cannot imagine any doubt existing. In Harding's "Handybook of Ecclesiastical Law," p. 192, he says—"You, being the minister of the parish, will have the right to preside at all vestry meetings held in the parish, whether they are held in the church or its vestry-room or elsewhere. Should you not be present a chairman is to be nominated by the persons assembled, and appointed by the plurality of their votes."

And I further refer "Inquirer" to the following extract from Archbold's "Parish Law":—"The minister of the parish—that is to say, the rector, vicar, or perpetual curate—if he be present, presides as chairman wherever the meeting is held (Wilson v. Macmath, 3 Phill. E. C. 87, 3 B. & Ald. 246 n.; R. v. Doyley, 12 A. & E. 139, 4 Burn. Ecc. Law, 9). But by statute 58 Geo. 3, c. 69, s. 2, in case the rector, vicar, or perpetual curate shall not be present, the persons assembled in pursuance of the notice already mentioned shall forthwith nominate and appoint, by plurality of votes, to be ascertained as hereinafter directed, one of the inhabitants of such parish to be the chairman, and to preside at the meeting. The chairman, and not the vestry, has the power of adjourning the meeting (Reg. v. Doyley, 12 A. & E. 139). But he must exercise the power so as to facilitate the business, else the Court of Queen's Bench may interfere by mandamus. Where the meeting is adjourned, no fresh notice of the particular business to be done is necessary (Scadding v. Loarant, 3 H. L. 418)."

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

July 29.—The Dublin City Voters Disfranchisement Bill was read a second time.

The Dividends on Stock Bill.—The Commons' amendments were agreed to.

The Settled Estates (Mansions) Bill was read a third time and passed.

August 1.—The Extradition Bill was read a second time.

August 2.—The Juries Bill was reported as amended.

The Statute Law Revision Bill was read a second time.

The Militia Acts Amendment Bill was read a second time.

August 4.—The Clerical Disabilities Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Real Actions Abolition (Ireland) Bill was read a second time, the Lord Chancellor explaining that it abolished antiquated forms of action which had been abolished in England many years ago.

The Turnpike Act Continuance Bill passed through committee, a proposal by Earl Powis to omit clause 12 as throwing on the county rate the maintenance of a number of ill-built bridges, having been negatived.

The Matrimonial Causes and Marriage Law (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.

The Juries Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Statute Law Revision Bill passed through committee.

The Dublin City Voters Disfranchisement Bill, the Army Enlistment Bill, and the Extradition Bill were read a third time and passed.

The Life Assurance Companies Bill.—The Commons' amendments were agreed to.

The Larceny Advertisements Bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

August 2.—The Foreign Enlistment Bill.—The Attorney-General moved the second reading. He explained that the Government did not undertake and never had undertaken in former wars to prohibit the exportation of contraband of war. The exportation of contraband of war was not prohibited by the existing Enlistment Act, nor, strictly speaking, by the Queen's proclamation. No proclamation of the Queen could constitute that an offence against an Act of Parliament, or the law of the land, which was not an offence before. The proclamation warned her Majesty's subjects, first, against the breaking of blockades, and, secondly, against the supplying of contraband of war; but the consequence of disobeying these injunctions of the Queen were pointed out to be a liability to hostile capture. That was the liability, and the only liability which is pointed out in the proclamation. The Government had not undertaken to prevent vessels from breaking the blockade, nor to prevent the exportation of contraband of war; but they said to any man who started with a vessel intending to break the blockade or to supply contraband of war to a belligerent—"You do it at your own risk; you will be subject to capture, and the Queen will not interfere for your protection." That was the consequence of which those people are warned who contravene the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act. He thought it well that this should be generally understood, because many complaints were made against the Government for not preventing the exportation of coal, of horses, of a variety of articles which might or might not be contraband of war. During the Crimean war, for example, Belgium and Holland supplied Russia with large quantities of arms, but we did not treat that as a breach of neutrality. Again, during the American war large quantities of arms, ammunition, and other contraband of war were supplied by us both to the Federals and the Confederates, but although the former complained of us for having allowed the Alabama to escape, they made no complaint that we did not undertake to prevent the exportation of contraband of war. They merely captured the vessels when they could catch them. Therefore, provisions to prevent the exportation of contraband of war were not to be found in this bill any more than they were to be found in our existing Act or in the American Act. This, however ought to be known. If it be shown that a vessel carrying coal or any other contraband article is so far in communication and correspondence with the fleet of either belligerent as to form a part of it, or acts as a tender to ships of war, such vessel will run the risk of being captured and forfeited as a store-ship in the service of the enemy. It was true that under the Customs Consolidation Act the Queen might stop the exportation of arms by an Order in Council, but that provision had never been enforced except when we ourselves were actually engaged or were on the point of engaging in war. This bill went beyond any statute law passed in any country for the purpose of enforcing neutrality. If we had merely considered the strict measure of international duties which might have been forced upon us, probably we should not have gone so far; but the bill had been prepared for the sake of ourselves and of our dignity rather than in order to satisfy any demands which might be made upon us by foreign countries. Although some of its provisions against reckless and unscrupulous traders might be stringent, none would interfere with the objects of legitimate commerce.—Mr. Vernon Harcourt said it would have been better if the preventive portion of the bill had been enlarged, and that so much had not been made of the punitive portion, because punishment was useful only as a deterrent, but prevention was of far greater consequence. Besides, if great weight was placed upon the punitive portions of the bill, foreign powers would be continually complaining of our not prosecuting sufficiently. The action of a jury, too, was necessary in the case of punishment, and juries might be unwilling to give a verdict against a prisoner. He regretted the bill had not been introduced earlier, that it might be revised by a select committee. Among other things he noticed with regret that the power held by the Executive to dispense with the operation of the Foreign Enlistment Act had not been dispensed with. This power would enable a Government, as was said by Canning, "to sneak the country into a war which they had not the courage to declare"—a most dangerous power for any Government to possess. As regards clause 5, he agreed that we should not control foreigners as regards their object in leaving this country. Clause 6, which proposed to punish those who induced others to enlist in a foreign army, was a very useful one, and was directed against crimps and others who got hold of innocent sailors, and when they got them to sea endeavoured to persuade them to sign articles. That clause, however, concluded by a singular paragraph, to the effect that if a man taken abroad should ultimately enlist in a foreign service it should be deemed conclusively that he quitted her Majesty's dominions with the intent to accept an engagement in the military or naval service of such foreign state. The clause would be sufficiently strong without that paragraph. The 8th clause had reference to the illegal building of ships, and was open to considerable difficulty. If the Government took upon itself to forbid the building of vessels of any particular description they would make themselves responsible for every keel laid in this country, and the representatives of foreign nations would be constantly urging them to interfere in a matter calculated to materially check our shipbuilding trade, on the ground that nearly every vessel that was being built might be intended for a purpose adverse to the interests of the country in whose service they were. All that was necessary in order to carry out the intention of the measure was to prevent the despatch of the vessel when built, and not to prevent it being built, and he thought that that object was fully provided for by another clause in the bill. Under clause 7, which supplemented the provisions of clause 6, if any American were to leave this country for America by one of the Cunard Company's ships, and were subsequently to enter the service of any of the States of South America, the captain of the ship so carrying him would be liable to two years' imprisonment. That would be stretching the law to a most injudicious extent.—Sir Roundell Palmer was glad that the House was so nearly agreed upon the importance of and the necessity for passing this measure. It was most desirable that the statement of the Attorney-General that a nation was not bound by international law to legislate upon this subject, should be thoroughly understood and generally known. In fact, it was only in this country and in the United States that such legislation had occurred, although no doubt in many Continental nations there were elastic powers in force which enabled the various governments to deal with cases of the description referred to in the bill when they happened to arise. All subjects of the country owed to the Government the duty of being neutral when the State was neutral, and it was the duty of the State to arm itself with powers to repress any attempt on the part of private citizens to oppose the public will to be neutral. But the House would not take from the Crown the power of granting a licence to do any acts which under the Foreign Enlistment Act would be illegal if done without the licence of the Crown; to legislate to deprive the Crown of the power of taking a single step of that kind, without going to war altogether, would be imprudent and foreign to the purposes of the present bill, for there might be many cases in which it would be inexpedient to enter upon war, though the State did not assume an attitude of strict neutrality. A matter of high policy of that kind ought not to be dealt with by a side-wind in such a bill as the present. The fifth clause related to persons leaving this country to enlist in the service of a belligerent whose subjects they were not, and if it were expedient to retain such a clause, it was also expedient that the Crown should have the power of relaxing its operations. And so with regard to the important case of ship-building, if a power of relaxation was not given to the Crown, there would be involved in the penalties of the bill any person who took a contract to build a ship before the commencement of war, and yet might be willing afterwards to go to the Government and ask for a licence, undertaking at the same time, not to allow the ship to leave the country. With regard to the seventh clause, they must consider not merely the case of the solitary American alluded to by Mr. Vernon Harcourt, but must look to the larger case. There was in this country a great number of foreigners of various nations, and it could not be maintained that the principle of neutrality would be observed, if a recruiting sergeant were allowed to go through the country to enlist persons for the service of a foreign State of which they were not the subjects. With regard to the clause respecting illegal ship-building, he was of opinion that if the power conferred by that clause were not given the bill would be emasculated. He thought it of infinitely greater importance that all ship-builders and traders in this country should obey the law with respect to the neutrality of their country than that they should have a few contracts on their hands more or less.—The bill was read a second time.

Aug. 2.—The New Courts of Justice.—Mr. Ayrton said the Acts authorising their erection contemplated that the whole undertaking should be completed for a sum of £1,500,000. The Treasury had to consider this matter in order to reduce the cost within reasonable limits. Last year it was shown to be unnecessary to spend such an enormous sum as £3,250,000, and this year, at the request of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he had communicated with all the parties concerned in order to see whether the scheme could not be executed within the limits of the sum originally sanctioned by Parliament. The sum voted for land had then been exceeded, but nothing had been done in reference to the building. All attempts to improve the site failed, because he was not possessed of compulsory powers, but the efforts made to improve the building were successful, and ultimately a radical change was effected in the plan, by which Mr. Street was enabled to adjust the building to the ground. The Royal Commissioners had then to be consulted; they had arranged what departments might be accommodated within the block of buildings, and the architect felt satisfied that he would be able to mature his design so that provision should be made for bringing together all the offices which were immediately concerned in the administration of justice in the Superior Courts. He had no reason to doubt that within a few days the Government would obtain that acquiescence by the Royal Commissioners which was required by law, and then they would be in a position to proceed with the building. A present vote of £21,450 was needed to provide the sum required to clear the ground and lay the foundation, while as to the building money, an account would not be required before the commencement of the next financial year. He therefore hoped that the building would proceed under such conditions as to give a reasonable security that the prescribed sum would not be exceeded.—Mr. G. Gregory was glad that at last they were about to commence a building for which there had been an agitation during more than thirty years. It was true that the estimate for the land had been exceeded, but considering that the land taken was in the centre of London, and recollecting the amount of the purchase-money, the increase was not a large one. With respect to the plans, the contemplated fusion of the Courts of Law and Equity could not be carried out until the proposed accommodation had been supplied, and he therefore hoped that, when this work was commenced, it would be energetically and successfully prosecuted.—Mr. Whitwell asked whether, by this vote, the sanction of the House would be given to all the arrangements, including the approaches.—Mr. Alderman Lawrence said the building now proposed stood much nearer to the Strand than in the former design. If the present plan were carried out the building would not be seen to advantage, nor would the approaches be anything like sufficient for the accommodation of the public.—Mr. Beresford Hope said the accommodation in front of the building varied from thirty feet to eighty feet between the building and the Strand; the larger spaces being between projections, which would afford ample shelter for carriages and loiterers. If it were found by experience that more space would be required, the south side of the Strand could be rebuilt for the purpose, and the sooner that was done the better, whether more space were needed or not. The advisability of opening up the great arteries of London was agreed on by all; but the requirements of the public in respect of the law courts had been greatly exaggerated; and he did not believe the traffic in the Strand would be increased by them to any extraordinary extent.—Mr. Ayrton explained that the question of approaches was in no way connected with the vote under discussion which would bind the committee only to the block plan.—Mr. Dillwyn complained of the great expense attending the purchase of this site. The vendor's costs amounted to £36,000; surveyor's charges, £3,000; legal expenses, £8,000; accountants' clerks, £3,000, and preliminary expenses, including the Royal Commission, £17,000.—Mr. G. Gregory defended these charges.—Mr. Jessel hoped the unappropriated space within the building would be devoted to a court of appeal.—Sir J. Lawrence thought that light and air had been sacrificed to economy in the designs for the new law courts.—Mr. Ayrton observed that the fact was exactly the contrary. The office of Works had rejected the plans sanctioned by the Royal Commission on the ground that they gave less light and air.

August 3.—The Married Women's Property Bill.—Consideration of the Lord's amendments.—Mr. Russell Gurney said that the bill, as it had come down from the House of Lords, was an entirely new measure. At the same time, since a complete remedy had been provided by the other House for the most glaring hardships of the existing law, as bearing upon the poorer classes, he would suggest that the bill should be accepted in its present form, with a few alterations.—The Lord's amendments were then agreed to with some unimportant modifications.

The Foreign Enlistment Bill.—Committee.—Mr. Norwood said that under the circumstances the Government ought not to do more than re-enact the present law with such amendments as might be necessary to meet cases like that of the Alabama. The bill was too stringent. He objected to the change of jurisdiction. Under the old Act it was the Court of Exchequer that had jurisdiction. It was now proposed that the duty of deciding upon the forfeiture of a vessel should be given to the Court of Admiralty, which did not enjoy the confidence of the public. He objected to giving power to any one judge, without the aid of a jury, to try the question of forfeiture, involving, as it did, the intent of the person who fitted out the ship. That was a point which ought to be determined by a jury, and not left to the decision of any one man.—Mr. Vernon Harcourt said a complaint had been made that this bill did not go far enough, that it only prohibited the exportation of ships of war, and not contraband articles generally. Take the case of the United States, who were famous for neutrality. The President had stated a few years ago that it was the traditional and settled policy of the United States to maintain impartial neutrality; but that, notwithstanding the existence of hostilities, the citizens of the United States retained their original right to continue all their pursuits by land and sea, at home and abroad, subject only to the law of nations. That, in pursuance of this policy, the laws of the United States did not forbid their citizens to sell to either of the belligerent powers articles contraband of war, or to take munitions of war or soldiers on board their private ships for transportation; that the citizens of the United States had sold gunpowder and arms to all buyers without distinction; that their transports had been employed by England and France in conveying munitions of war and bringing home wounded soldiers; and that that involved no interruption of the friendly relations between the Governments of the United States and Russia. Such was the message of the President, and it was to be observed that it went beyond the permission which was given to English subjects, because in our Foreign Enlistment Act the transport of troops and munitions of war to foreign belligerents was forbidden. Her Majesty's Government, in declining to extend the scope of the bill, not only acted upon a principle conformable to the law of nations, but were justified by the practice of those States which had been most careful to observe neutrality.—Mr. Jessel said that in this country there was a large number of tribunals which decided upon matters of the greatest importance without a jury. He believed that questions involving three-fourths, at least, of all the property brought before the courts were finally adjudicated upon by single judges without the assistance of a jury. He was very sorry to hear quoted in that House as law the message of any President of the United States. Such messages were generally party productions, made and issued for party purposes, and with a view to the exigencies which might call them forth. As a question of policy as well as of law, that message was of no authority for us. If Parliament wished now to give powers which, to some extent at least, exceeded those hitherto claimed by the Government, it must be admitted that, as the world went on, modifications in what was called the law of nations were admissible.—The Attorney-General said Mr. Norwood had objected to the substitution of the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty for that of the Court of Exchequer. He had some experience in this matter, and he believed that proceedings in the Court of Admiralty would be speedier, simpler, cheaper, and in every respect preferable.—Clauses 1, 2, and 3 were agreed to.—Clause 4 (Penalty for enlistment in service of a foreign State).—The Attorney-General proposed to omit the words "not being a British subject within her Majesty's dominions," with a view to confine the prohibition to accept a commission, or military or naval engagement, from a foreign State to British subjects.—Agreed to.—The Attorney-General also amended the clause so as to prohibit any person, whether British subject or foreigner, from inducing another to take service in a foreign State.—Clause 5 (Penalty for leaving her Majesty's dominions with intent to serve a foreign state) agreed to with verbal amendment and the omission of its last paragraph.—In clause 6 (Penalty on embarking persons under false representations as to service) the words "fine and imprisonment" were substituted for "fine or imprisonment"; and, at the suggestion of Mr. Vernon Harcourt, the latter part of the clause was expunged.—Clause 7 agreed to with verbal amendment.—Clause 8 (Penalty on illegal shipbuilding and illegal expeditions). The Attorney-General added at the end of the clause the following:—"Provided that a person building, causing to be built, or equipping a ship in any of the cases aforesaid, in pursuance of a contract made before the commencement of such war as aforesaid, shall not be liable to any of the penalties imposed by this section, in respect of such building or equipping, if he satisfies the conditions following (that is to say):—(1.) If forthwith upon a proclamation of neutrality being issued by her Majesty he gives notice to the Secretary of State that he is so building, causing to be built, or equipping such ship, and furnishes such particulars of the contract and of any matters relating to, or done, or to be done, under the contract as may be required by the Secretary of State. (2.) If he gives such security, and takes and permits to be taken such other measures, if any, as the Secretary of State may prescribe for insuring that such ship shall not be despatched, delivered, or removed without the licence of her Majesty until the termination of such war as aforesaid."

On clause 9 (Creating a legal presumption as to a ship built for a belligerent that it was built with a view to being employed in its naval or military service) Mr. Vernon Harcourt said it was a very strong thing to seek to create by enactment a presumption in a criminal proceeding.—The Attorney-General said the clause was an important one, for although proof might be given in a court which amounted to a moral certainty, there were some judges—and he was not blaming them—who would say to the prosecution, "You have not sufficient legal evidence; you have not adduced the proof which is required by law, and therefore the defendant must be acquitted." This description of legislation was by no means new. It had been adopted in the case of government stores and in other cases with great advantage. Supposing you proved that the builder had taken an order to build a ship for a country at war, if you went a step further and proved that the ship had actually been employed in war you had a prima facie case against the builder. Then what was the hardship on him? Could he not easily prove the circumstances under which he had taken the order? Were ships ever built without written contracts? If a ship were built without such a contract, that fact of itself raised a strong presumption against the builder. The object in view was very important, and he hoped the committee would agree to the clause.—Mr. Russell Gurney admitted that the object in view was of great importance, but it was not unimportant that an innocent man should not be convicted. He thought that the stringent provision of the clause ought not to be confined to cases of forfeiture of ships in which the builder of the ship could be examined. In a criminal proceeding against himself his mouth would be closed.—Mr. Rathbone thought a fair solution of the difficulty might be found in giving the builder himself power to give evidence. He thought innocent persons were not likely to be proceeded against under this bill, and it would be better to err on the side of giving very stringent powers to the Court than on that of leaving an opening for disastrous breaches of the laws of neutrality.—Mr. James said the clause was too stringent.—The Solicitor-General said there could not occur one case out of a thousand in which the builder of a ship would have the smallest difficulty in proving the circumstances of the contract.—Mr. Russell Gurney moved, as an amendment, the insertion of the words, "except in criminal proceedings," his object being to except from the operation of the clause cases in which the builder was put on his trial.—The amendment was rejected by a majority of 73 to 26, and the clause, after verbal amendments, was agreed to.—Clauses from 10 to 18 inclusive were agreed to.—On clause 19 (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Mr. Norwood objected to the transfer of the jurisdiction under this bill from the courts of common law assisted by a jury to a single judge of the Court of Admiralty. He moved the rejection of the clause.—Mr. Staveley Hill supported the amendment.—Mr. Vernon Harcourt said the new system created by this bill required to be placed under a new jurisdiction. The Court of Admiralty, having to decide questions of prize in time of war was the best fitted to determine questions of neutrality. If this clause were omitted, the Royal Commission would have sat in vain.—The Attorney-General considered this the most important clause in the bill. Foreign governments would not be satisfied if questions arising under the bill were allowed to be determined by a jury. His experience of the Court of Exchequer in determining questions of this kind had led him to believe that it was desirable that the present jurisdiction should be changed.—The clause was carried by a majority of 105 to 14.—Clause 21. On the question whether it was wise to give power to every officer holding a commission in the navy to stop a vessel, subject to the control of his superior officer, the Attorney-General stated that the clause had been taken verbatim from the Merchant Shipping Act.—The clause was agreed to, as were also the remaining clauses, several matters being left over for consideration on bringing up the report.

July 29.—The Petty Sessions Clerk Ireland Act (1856) Amendment Bill, the Matrimonial Causes and Marriage Law (Ireland) Bill, and the Real Actions Abolition (Ireland) Bill, passed through committee.

The Burials Bill was withdrawn, Mr. O. Morgan announcing it to be his intention to bring in a similar bill next session.

August 4.—The Ecclesiastical Titles Act Repeal Bill.—Mr. Newdegate opposed the second reading.—Mr. Jessel,

Mr. T. Chambers, and Mr. McLaren also opposed it.—Mr. Bernal Osborne supported the bill.—Mr. Bruce said the Government thought the bill, as originally framed by them and introduced into the House of Lords, would do its work quite as effectually as the amended bill, while it would be much less offensive, and they, therefore, proposed in committee to restore the bill to its original shape, which simply abolished a penalty that was never enforced. It was inexpedient to keep upon the statute-book an Act which had never been carried out.

The Foreign Enlistment Bill.—Consideration of bill as amended.—The Attorney-General obtained the omission of clause 11, explaining that, although the Royal Commissioners had made a recommendation to the effect of this clause, they did not intend that it should be embodied in an Act of Parliament, but that it should be carried out under the Queen's regulations. The Governor of a colony would, under this clause, have to determine whether a ship entering his ports was illegally fitted out or not; and this was enough to show that the object the commissioners had in view could not be carried out by an Act of Parliament. It was intended, instead, to advise colonial Governors of the escape of any illegally-fitted vessel.—A new clause was also introduced by the Attorney-General, limiting the term of imprisonment to two years.—The third reading was then fixed for August 6.

The Enclosure Bill was withdrawn.

The Stamp Duties Bill passed through committee.

OBITUARY.

MR. T. TILLEARD.

The profession and the public have sustained a heavy loss in the recent death of Mr. John Tilleard, of Tilleard, Son & Co., Old Jewry, some time solicitors to the South Eastern Railway Company. Mr. Tilleard was born in August, 1793, was articled in April, 1814, and in May, 1819, on the expiration of his articles, commenced business in partnership with another gentleman. While still an articled clerk he had had the conduct of a very heavy business. In August, 1823, Mr. Tilleard's partnership was dissolved, and about 1825 he found himself in large and important practice in London. In September, 1836, he took his son into partnership; and in the autumn of 1845 the firm, under its then style of Tilleard, Freeman & Co., became solicitors to the South Eastern Railway Company. The firm as now constituted was formed in 1857. Mr. Tilleard's membership of the Incorporated Law Society dated from 1832; he was also a member of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association and other similar institutions. In 1827 he became an original shareholder in the "London University." These are the dates which mark the progress of Mr. Tilleard's professional career; but we should do his memory a great injustice if we added nothing more. He launched himself into large practice at the very outset of his career, and this success was entirely due to his natural qualifications, and the perseverance and integrity with which he improved his talents. He possessed in an unusual degree those qualities of energy, accurate knowledge of commercial law, and prompt, sound judgment which commercial men need in a legal adviser. His courtesy and kindness to his fellow-lawyers, old and young, small and great, are well known. It is now some time since he ceased to take an active part in the business of the firm of which he was the head, but as a man esteemed by a wide circle within and without the pale of the profession, his loss will be deeply felt.

MR. G. HODGKINSON.

Mr. George Hodgkinson, solicitor, late of Wirksworth, in Derbyshire, died on the 25th of July, at Kirkby-in-Ashfield, Notts, in the sixtieth year of his age. He was certificated in 1831, and for many years filled the office of clerk to the magistrates of the Wirksworth division.

Mr. Francis Webb, barrister-at-law, has received the freedom of the City of London.

Mr. F. F. Giraud, solicitor, of Faversham, Kent, is a candidate for the town-clerkship of that borough, rendered vacant by the appointment of Mr. S. G. Johnson to be town clerk of Nottingham. Mr. F. G. Gibson, solicitor, of Sittingbourne, is also a candidate.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

ANNUAL REPORT of the COUNCIL submitted to the General Meeting of the Members on July 19, 1870.

OBLIGATION OF ATTORNEYS TO PROCEED WITH THE CONDUCT OF SUITS WHICH THEY HAVE ONCE COMMENCED.

In March last, the Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council found it necessary to make some observations with reference to the neglect of a solicitor to prosecute an appeal case in which he was concerned for the appellants, although sufficient funds had been placed in his hands by his client for that purpose. These observations, which were afterwards printed by order of the Judicial Committee, comprised the following statement—viz., "That it is the duty of a solicitor who has once undertaken to conduct a cause to carry it to a conclusion, and he cannot refuse to do that duty by reason of the client not having complied with any application that may have been made to him."

It appeared to the council that this remark was calculated to have a most prejudicial effect upon the numerous solicitors who practice as agents in Indian and colonial appeals before the Judicial Committee, and without reference to the merits of the particular case which seemed to have called forth these observations from the Committee, the council considered it their duty, on behalf of the profession, to make a representation to the Privy Council on the subject.

The council accordingly addressed a letter to Mr. Reeve, the Registrar, stating that, with the greatest respect for their Lordships, they ventured to think that the above proposition was stated thus broadly, and without qualification, through inadvertence, and not with the intention that it should be promulgated as a formal judgment; for it appeared to the council that there is no rule better established than that an attorney is not bound to proceed in a case unless he receives adequate advances from time to time for necessary disbursements, and upon reasonable notice to his client; and they referred to several reported cases upon the subject.

The council also stated that they were induced to make this communication because they believed that if the observations in question were circulated in India and the colonies, it would place solicitors practising before the Judicial Committee in a position of considerable embarrassment, and lead to disappointment on the part of the suitor.

The council shortly afterwards received a very courteous answer from the Registrar, to the effect that he had been authorised by the Lords of the Privy Council who were present at the time, to state that the observations in question were not intended to have any judicial authority, nor were they made with the intention that they should be promulgated as a formal judgment of the Privy Council, nor had they been so promulgated; that the remarks did not enter into the determination of any judicial matter, but were merely a personal admonition addressed to a solicitor, and had reference to the peculiar circumstances of a case in which, after having obtained a final order in the appeal, the solicitor had abstained from drawing up the order.

REGISTRATION OF NAMES AND RESIDENCES OF PRINTERS, PUBLISHERS, AND PROPRIETORS OF NEWSPAPERS.

The attention of the council has been directed to the very serious mischief that may arise from what appears to have been the unintentional operation of an Act passed last session (32 & 33 Vict. c. 24). In the schedule to that Act, of the Acts to be repealed, there is included the 6th section of 6 & 7 Will. 4 c. 76, whereby it was enacted that no person shall print or publish a newspaper until a declaration has been delivered to the Commissioner or Distributor of Stamps, setting forth certain specific matters, including the title of the paper, and the names and residences of the printer, publisher, and proprietor. It does not appear that any complaints have been made by any printer, publisher, or proprietor of the operation of this section as harsh or oppressive; and experience, in fact, shows that it is of great public utility, as affording a ready means to persons seeking redress for injury done by newspaper articles, of ascertaining who are the responsible proprietors of the offending papers.

The effect of the repeal of this provision is that a person injured by a newspaper article has two difficulties to contend with before he can obtain redress. He must first ascertain who is the proprietor of the paper, and then he must obtain legal evidence of the fact. The printer whose name appears on the paper is often a man of insufficient means, and therefore not a person to sue for damages, and he is not the proper person against whom criminal proceedings should be directed. Two very notable instances of this inconvenience have recently occurred, which it is unnecessary to refer to here.

The council thought it proper to address a communication to the Secretary of State for the Home Department on the subject, and he has informed the council that the matter has been referred to the Attorney-General.

LAW REPORTING.

The members will recollect that this society made an advance of £142 17s. towards the preliminary expenses of organising and carrying into effect the new system of reporting.

In February last, a communication was received from the Council of Law Reporting, inquiring whether the society regarded this advance as an existing debt, which they required to be reimbursed. The council having taken the subject into consideration, informed the Council of Law Reporting, that at the time of the advance, the council certainly did anticipate repayment, but that they were willing to accept the suggestion made by the Council of Law Reporting, that as the amount had been spent in the interests of the profession, and for a public object, this society would not require its repayment. It may be mentioned that the societies of the Inner and Middle Temples and Lincoln's Inn made similar loans, and that they, in like manner, have released them, in order to facilitate the operations of the Council of Law Reporting.

MATTERS RELATING TO ATTORNEYS.

The council regret that there has been no diminution in number of communications made to this society regarding the misconduct of attorneys and solicitors. One of the cases in which it was found necessary to apply to the court, seems to require special notice. The Court of Common Pleas made a rule absolute to strike the name of the attorney off the roll after a lengthened inquiry before the Master, who found that the attorney had been in the habit of entering most extensively into open contracts for the purchase of land fraudulently, and with no bond fide intention to complete them, but with a view to extort money from the vendors, by raising difficulties which they would be unable to remove. The attorney adopted a settled form of correspondence calculated to draw persons not well versed in such matters into unconditional contracts, in order that he might afterwards obtain compensation for their non-fulfilment. The Master also found that in some of the cases referred to him the steps taken by the attorney were in pursuance of a systematic course of fraud, and that the objections raised were either wholly untenable, or purely technical, and not raised for any bond fide object.

The council have, with a view of protecting the public and the profession, taken great pains in bringing this matter to the notice of the Court, and they trust that the publicity given to it by the press will prevent future attempts of a similar character from being successful.

Since the last annual meeting the names of six other attorneys have been removed from the roll at the instance of the society, and of the applications of four attorneys for restoration to the roll, three have been successfully opposed. The council have also, in discharge of their duty, opposed numerous applications for the renewal of certificates to practise, and in many instances substantial fines have been imposed.

USAGES OF THE PROFESSION.

The council have given their opinion upon the following questions since the issue of their last report, viz. :—

Costs of filing a certificate of acknowledgment, and affidavit, and obtaining office copy certificate; as to disclosing a defect in a title under special circumstances; preparation and delivery of abstract of title of mortgage policies; mortgage costs; costs of lease and counterpart (local custom); as to usual covenants and provisions in a lease; costs of perusal, examination, and execution of a deed of covenant under a particular condition of sale; costs of deed of indemnity.

LECTURES AND CLASSES.

The number of subscribers to the lectures was 210 and to the classes 75, being, in both instances, a material increase.

The names of the lecturers and readers are—
Mr. Howard W. Elphinstone, of Lincoln's Inn—Conveyancing and the Law of Real Property.
Mr. Fiteroy Kelly, of Lincoln's Inn—Equity.
Mr. H. M. Bompas, of the Inner Temple—Common Law and Mercantile Law.

THE PRELIMINARY, INTERMEDIATE, AND FINAL EXAMINATIONS.

The result of the examinations is as follows :—

Preliminary Examination.—In July, 1869, 111 candidates passed, and 38 were postponed; in October, 205 passed, and 51 were postponed; in February 1870, 217 passed, and 41 were postponed; and in May last, 182 passed, and 44 were postponed.

Intermediate Examination.—In Michaelmas Term 1869, 161 candidates passed, and 24 were postponed; in Hilary Term 1870, 138 passed, and 17 were postponed; in Easter Term, 153 passed, and 14 were postponed; and in Trinity Term 119 passed, and 32 were postponed.

Final Examination.—In Michaelmas Term 1869, 113 candidates passed, and 7 were postponed; in Hilary Term, 1870, 99 passed, and 16 were postponed; in Easter Term, 94 passed, and 12 were postponed; and in Trinity Term 153 passed, and 12 were postponed.

AFFAIRS OF THE SOCIETY.

The council are happy to inform the members that the alterations in, and additions to the building are now complete, and that it will no longer be necessary to deprive the members of the use of the hall during the numerous examinations which take place every year. A very handsome and commodious hall is now provided for examinations and lectures, and for any other purpose which may be thought expedient. The works have been very satisfactorily completed under the superintendence of Mr. P. C. Hardwick, and the additional accommodation may be described as follows :—

The basement, in addition to certain offices appropriated to the club, comprises about forty strong rooms: these are fire-proof rooms, similar to those in the basement of the old building.

The ground floor is occupied by the club, and it consists of a new coffee room, in substitution for that which has been removed; a drawing room and a smoking room; also a still room, and other necessary accommodation. Access can be obtained to these rooms from the entrance in Bell-yard, which has been very considerably enlarged and otherwise improved, as well as from the old hall. Almost the whole of the first floor of the new building is occupied by the new hall, capable of accommodating about 200 students, in a much more convenient manner than hitherto. There is also a private room for the examiners. The new hall is approached by a separate staircase from Carey-street. There is also an entrance on the staircase which leads up from Bell-yard.

The second floor comprises apartments for the resident clerk, and rooms for the deposit of the society's papers.

The council having, at the special general meeting of the members in February, 1869, obtained the approval of the society to the proposed additions and improvements, have now great pleasure in reporting their satisfactory completion.

482 volumes have been added to the library by donations and purchases since the last general meeting.

The donations of books have been made by the corporation of London and the following gentlemen :—J. M. Davenport, Esq., J. F. Pattison, Esq., Messrs. Bower and Cotton, J. Rae, Esq., Messrs. Trübner, Rt. Hon. E. Hammond, J. H. Hearn, Esq., B. Harcourt, Esq., C. M. Clode, Esq., S. E. Donne, Esq., C. H. Collette, Esq., H. J. Castle, Esq., H. Young, Esq., A. Heales, Esq., T. M. Dempsey, Esq., J. T. Treherne, Esq., F. R. Parker, Esq., F. B. Syme, Esq.

Prints of some of the local and personal, and private Acts of Parliament passed in the session of 1869, have been presented by the parliamentary agents, and the residue have been purchased.

The Colonial Office and India Board have continued to supply prints of the Acts passed in the colonies and Indian presidencies.

The council have, at the request of the members, considered a system of convenient reference to the catalogue, whereby the position of the books on the shelves can be ascertained. They have adopted the system which they consider most convenient, and if it should be found to work well it will be continued. The numbers now on the shelves are no doubt unsightly, but they are merely affixed for temporary use.

The council have to announce with unfeigned regret four vacancies on their board, three occasioned by the death of their highly esteemed colleagues, Mr. Edward Savage Bailey, Mr. William Sharpe, and Mr. Robert Wilson, and one by the resignation of Mr. Joseph Maynard on his retirement from the profession, of which he has long been an eminent member.

Mr. Bailey and Mr. Sharpe were both members of the council for many years; both in their turn have undertaken the office of president. Mr. Bailey's excellent management as Chairman of the Finance Committee for a long period has entitled him to the grateful recollection of the society, and his kind and amiable disposition will long remain in the remembrance of those who had the advantage of his acquaintance.

Mr. Sharpe represented a large agency office in London; he was always a staunch supporter of the interests of the profession, and devoted himself most laboriously to the duties which devolved on him.

Mr. Robert Wilson was a member of the council for a short time only, but his loss is much to be deplored, as his high legal attainments gave great weight to his opinions on the council. It had been hoped that temporary relaxation from severe professional labours would have restored Mr. Wilson to health, and his friends were scarcely prepared for the sad announcement of his death.

Mr. Maynard, notwithstanding his numerous important professional engagements, zealously discharged all the duties of president during his year of office; and though unable to give his regular attendance at the meetings of the council, he was always ready to place at the disposal of his colleagues the results of his large experience and sound judgment.

The number of members of the society has now reached 2,379—viz., 1,746 residing in town, and 633 in the country, being an increase of 147 since the last annual meeting.

The auditor's report is open for the inspection of the members.

SOLICITORS BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

The usual monthly meeting of the board of directors of this association was held at the Law Institution, Chancery-lane, London, on Wednesday last, the 3rd inst.; Mr. Shaen in the chair. The other directors present were Messrs. Field, Hedger, Rickman, and Smith. (Mr. Eiffe, secretary).

Grants of assistance, amounting in the whole to the sum of £70, were made to several necessitous cases, and a sum of £300 was ordered to be added to the invested capital.

The ensuing autumn general meeting of the association was appointed to be held at Bristol on the 12th of October next, and other general business was transacted.

SOCIAL SCIENCE CONGRESS.

The preparations for the annual congress at Newcastle-on-Tyne on the 21st of September next are progressing satisfactorily. The special questions for discussion have been selected, and in the jurisprudence department are as follows:—

MUNICIPAL LAW SECTION.

1. Ought railway companies to be liable to an unlimited extent for the acts of their servants, and is it desirable to impose any check on fraudulent claims?
2. Is it desirable to establish tribunals of commerce, and if so, with what powers?
3. Would the local administration of criminal justice be improved by the appointment of additional stipendiary magistrates, and the enlargement of the jurisdiction of quarter and petty sessions?

REPRESSION OF CRIME SECTION.

1. In what manner may the provisions of the Habitual Criminal Act and its administration be improved?
2. Is the working of the Prisons Act, 1865, satisfactory, specially with reference to productive prison labour?
3. What measures may be adopted with a view to the repression of habitual drunkenness?

The President of the association is His Grace the Duke of Northumberland, and the President of the Jurisprudence Department the Hon. Lord Neaves, one of the Judges of the Scotch Court of Sessions. The Vice-Presidents of the departments are Joseph Brown, Esq., Q.C.; Mr. Serjeant Cox, Deputy Assistant Judge of Middlesex, Recorder of Portsmouth; The Right Hon. T. E. Headlam, Q.C., M.P.; Robert Ingham, Esq., Q.C.; and W. Digby Seymour, Esq., Q.C., Recorder of Newcastle. Sir Walter Crofton, C.B., will preside over the Repression of Crime Section. The question of the relations between England and her colonies it is expected will be again discussed. The presidents of the other departments are:—Education, Dr. Lyon Playfair, C.B., M.P.; Health, Robert Rawlinson, Esq., C.E., C.B.; and Economy and Trade, Sir William Armstrong, C.B., F.R.S. The local arrangements for the Congress augur a large and influential gathering.

THE TWENTY-FOURTH REPORT OF THE LUNACY COMMISSION.

The Commissioners in Lunacy have presented to the Lord Chancellor their Twenty-fourth Report, which, in consequence of the disclosures made during the year with regard to the treatment of the insane, will be read with an unusual degree of interest. It records five cases of death from fractured ribs, in one of which the injuries were inflicted in the Chorlton Workhouse; four cases of fatal scalding by baths—two in asylums, two in workhouses; three cases of suicide in asylums from gross neglect; and two cases of serious assault by asylum attendants (one producing fractured ribs) that did not terminate fatally. In the fatal cases of rib fracture, the nature of the injury seems only to have been discovered in some almost fortuitous way; and the details that are given cannot fail to excite suspicion that such injuries might easily escape notice altogether. About their causes there can be no doubt. The Commissioners do not even refer to the fragility hypothesis; and speak plainly enough about the consequences of overgrown asylums, of paucity of attendants, and of inadequate supervision. They also place on record that, during the year 1869, out of 88 male attendants dismissed from various asylums, 35 were dismissed for assaults upon patients; and that 11 out of 34 female attendants were dismissed for violence or rough usage. And they dwell, with perfect propriety and with much force, upon the innumerable small miseries, short of broken bones but perhaps far less tolerable, that a brutal attendant may inflict, day after day and hour after hour, upon the helpless creatures under his charge.

We gather further from the volume that the duty of the Lunacy Commissioners is mainly to enable themselves to say gracefully "We told you so!" whenever the public mind has been stirred by any unusual catastrophe. The catastrophe must be a natural result of the defective arrangements of the — Asylum; arrangements which had been described and commented upon in the twelfth or the sixteenth report, but which the visiting justices had declined to modify. The law which requires the Commissioners to investigate and report as to matters affecting the management of county asylums has invested them with no authority to enforce their views. If a small offender is to be trounced, if a nurse who has already been well scolded is to be dismissed, or if a poor woman who has boarded a lunatic is to be compelled to insert abject apologies in newspapers as the price of her exemption from utter ruin, then the Commissioners are as prompt as Mr. Bumble with his cane. If a county magistrate looms upon the horizon, or even as much as a poor-law guardian, Bumble is replaced by Dogberry, and the offender is let go. We have lately referred to the very common practice of conveying insane paupers to a workhouse in the first instance, and from thence to an asylum. The Commissioners speak of this course as being a systematic disregard of the lunacy laws; and they must know, as everybody knows, that it is followed for the purpose of depriving union medical officers of the certificate fees that should rightly come to them. But the Commissioners have never attempted to punish anybody for this disregard of law, although, in the present report, they mention having ordered proceedings to be taken against an unfortunate relieving officer who did not do until the sixth day what he ought to have done on or before the fourth. The prompt punishment of faulty subordinates is perfectly right in principle, when it forms part of a system of even-handed justice that knows no distinction of persons. It becomes petty persecution when it is enforced by a board that allows the gravest evils to proceed unchecked, on the pitiful plea of insufficient powers, and makes no demand for increased powers except by a perfunctory report, buried from the ken of ordinary mortals in the pages of a Blue-book. That further powers will ever be entrusted to the present Commission is not probable; but there could be no objection to their being entrusted to a Secretary of State, or, better still, to the Medical Department of the Privy Council. Half the mischiefs that now exist in asylums would be removed by authorising the Government to override the crotchets of justices, to decide the proportion that medical officers and nurses should bear to lunatics, and generally to apply the results of wide observation and long experience to the control of unexpected eccentricities of management. At St. Luke's the resident medical authority is on many points subordinate to the matron or steward. At the Suffolk Asylum there are no properly qualified night attendants. At the Nottingham Asylum there are no post-mortem examinations. Such are some of the things that are now placidly recounted under the signature of Lord Shaftesbury, and that will be changed whenever the lunacy board displays any proper appreciation of the scope of its most responsible duties, or whenever it succeeds in winning, even partially, the confidence of Parliament and of the country. But, as Garrick said of the preachers, it has hitherto been occupied in uttering truth as if it were fiction. It has the advantage of a chairman who is a peer, a practised debater and parliamentary tactician, and who has introduced or aided many wise and useful measures. It includes also a member of the Lower House; and hence its opinions and its experience could be set before the country with a force and a directness that would ensure their being translated into laws. With these advantages under their hands, we trust that Lord Shaftesbury and his colleagues will bestir themselves; and that they will not again be compelled to compose a report that is, in almost every line, a miserable evidence of their own timidity or inefficiency.—Lancet.

COURT PAPERS.

CHANCERY VACATION NOTICE.

During the vacation all applications to the Court of Chancery which are of an urgent nature are to be made to or at the chambers of the Vice-Chancellor Bacon.

All applications ex parte are to be sent to the Vice-Chancellor Bacon, by book-post or parcel pre-paid, accompanied with the brief of counsel, endorsed with the terms of the order applied for, and an envelope capable of receiving the papers to be returned, with sufficient stamps affixed thereon, and addressed as follows:—"To the Registrar in Vacation, Chancery Registrars' Office, Chancery-lane, London, W.C."

On application for injunctions or writs of Ne exeat Regno, there must be sent, in addition to the above, a copy of the bill, a certificate of bill filed, and office copies of the affidavits in support of the application.

The papers sent to the Vice-Chancellor with any order his Honour may make thereon will be returned direct to the registrar.

All applications for leave to give notice of motion only may be made to the Chief Clerk at chambers.

The Vice-Chancellor's address can be obtained on application at his Honour's chambers, 11, New-square, Lincoln's-inn.

CHANCERY JUDGES' CHAMBERS.

During the vacation until further notice all applications which are necessary to be made at the judges' chambers are to be made at the chambers of the Vice-Chancellor Bacon.

Parties desiring to make any urgent special application to the court during the vacation are to apply at the said chambers for an appointment.

The chambers of the Vice-Chancellor Bacon will be open on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday in each week from eleven till one o'clock.

The vacation will commence on the 10th of August, and terminate on the 28th of October, both days inclusive.

COLONY OF NATAL—APPEALS TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

ORDER IN COUNCIL.

Whereas it is expedient to make provision for appeals from Her Majesty's Supreme Court of the Colony of Natal to her Majesty in council: it is therefore ordered by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice of her Privy Council, as follows:—

It shall and may be lawful for any person or persons, being a party or parties to any civil suit or action depending in the said Supreme Court of the Colony of Natal to appeal to her Majesty, her heirs and successors, in her or their Privy Council, against any final judgment, decree, or sentence of the said court, or against any rule or order made in any such civil suit or action having the effect of a final or definitive sentence, and which appeals shall be made subject to the rules, regulations, and limitations following, that is to say:—

1. Such judgment, decree, order, or sentence shall be given or pronounced for or in respect of a sum or matter at issue above the amount of £500 sterling, or shall involve, directly or indirectly, the title to property or to some civil right amounting to or of the value of £500 sterling.

2. The person or persons feeling aggrieved by such judgment, decree, order, or sentence, shall, within fourteen days next after the same shall have been pronounced, made, or given, apply to the said Supreme Court for leave to appeal therefrom to her Majesty, her heirs, and successors, in her or their Privy Council.

3. If such leave to appeal shall be prayed by the party or parties who is or are adjudged to pay any sum of money or to perform any duty, the court shall direct that the judgment, decree, or sentence appealed from shall be carried into execution, if the party or parties respondent shall give security for the immediate performance of any judgment or sentence which may be pronounced or made by her Majesty, her heirs and successors, in her or their Privy Council, upon any appeal, and until such security be given, the execution of the judgment, decree, order, or sentence appealed from shall be stayed.

4. Provided nevertheless, that if the party or parties appellant shall establish to the satisfaction of the said Supreme Court that real and substantial justice requires that, pending such appeal, execution should be stayed, it shall be lawful for such Supreme Court to order the execution of such judgment, decree, order or sentence to be suspended pending such appeal, if the party or parties appellant shall give security for the immediate performance of any judgment or sentence which may be pronounced or made by her Majesty, her heirs and successors, in her or their Privy Council, upon any such appeal.

5. In all cases security shall also be given by the party or parties appellant for the prosecution of the appeal, and for the payment of all such costs as may be awarded by her Majesty, her heirs and successors, to the party or parties respondent.

6. The said Supreme Court shall, subject to the conditions hereinafter mentioned, determine the nature, amount, and sufficiency of the several securities so to be taken as aforesaid.

7. Provided, nevertheless, that in any case where the subject of litigation should consist of immovable property, and the judgment, decree, order, or sentence, appealed from shall not change, affect, or relate to the actual occupation thereof, no security shall be demanded either from the party or parties respondent or from the party or parties appellant for the performance of the judgment or sentence to be pronounced or made upon such appeal; but if such judgment, decree, order or sentence shall change, affect, or relate to the occupation of any such property, then such security shall not be of greater amount than may be necessary to secure the restitution, free from all damage or loss of such property, or of the intermediate profit which, pending any such appeal, may probably accrue from the intermediate occupation thereof.

8. In any case where the subject of litigation shall consist of money or other chattels, or of any personal debt or demand, the security to be demanded either from the party or parties respondent, or from the party or parties appellant, for the performance of the judgment or sentence to be pronounced or made upon such appeal, shall be either a bond to be entered into in the amount or value of such subject of litigation by one or more sufficient surety or sureties, or such security shall be given by way of mortgage or voluntary condemnation of or upon some immovable property situate and being within such settlement, and being of the full value of such subject of litigation over and above the amount of all mortgages and charges of whatever nature upon or affecting the same.

9. The security to be given by the party or parties appellant for the prosecution of the appeal and for the payment of costs shall in no case exceed the sum of £500 sterling; and shall be given either by such surety or sureties, or by such mortgage or voluntary condemnation as aforesaid.

10. If the security to be given by the party or parties appellant for the prosecution of the appeal and for the payment of such costs as may be awarded, shall in manner aforesaid be completed within three months from the date of the petition for leave to appeal, then, and not otherwise, the said Supreme Court shall make an order allowing such appeal, and the party or parties appellant shall be at liberty to prefer and prosecute his, her, or their appeal to her Majesty, her heirs and successors, in her or their Privy Council, in such manner and under such rules as are observed in appeals made to her Majesty in Council from the plantations or colonies.

11. Provided, nevertheless, that any person or persons feeling aggrieved by any order which may be made by, or by any proceedings of the said Supreme Court, respecting the security to be taken upon any such appeal as aforesaid, shall be and is hereby authorised by petition to her Majesty, her heirs and successors, in Council, to apply for redress in the premises.

Provided also, and it is hereby further ordered, that nothing herein contained doth or shall extend, or be construed to extend, to take away or abridge the undoubted right or authority of her Majesty, her heirs and successors, to admit and receive any appeal from any judgment, decree, sentence, or order of the said Supreme Court on the humble petition of any person or persons aggrieved thereby, in any case in which, and subject to any conditions or restrictions upon and under which it may seem meet to her Majesty, her heirs and successors, so to admit and receive any such appeal.

In all cases of appeal allowed by the said Supreme Court, or by her Majesty, her heirs and successors, such court shall, on the application and at the costs of the party or parties appellant, certify and transmit to her Majesty, her heirs and successors, in her or their Privy Council, a true and exact copy of all proceedings, evidence, judge's notes of evidence, and judge's reasons, judgments, decrees, and orders had or made in such causes so appealed, so far as the same have relation to the matter of appeal, such copies to be certified under the seal of the said court.

The said Supreme Court shall, in all cases of appeal to her Majesty, her heirs and successors, execute and carry into immediate effect such judgments and orders as her Majesty, her heirs, and successors, shall make thereupon in such manner as any original judgment or decree of the said court can or may be executed.

And the Right Honourable the Earl of Kimberley, one of her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, is to give the necessary directions herein accordingly.

July 19, 1870.

NORWICH ELECTION PETITION.

Stevens, Petitioner; Tillett, Respondent.

A petition from Norwich was presented on Wednesday at the Common Pleas Rule Office against the return of Mr. Tillett.

The petition, which is unusually long, alleges that the respondent is disqualified from serving in the present Parliament, on the ground of his having been guilty, both at the general election of 1866 and at the last election in July, 1870, of bribery, treating, and undue influence, and prays that Mr. Walter John Huddleston be declared duly elected.

Agents for the petitioner, Messrs. Whites, Renard & Floyd, 28, Budge-row, Cannon-street, E.C.

ASSOCIATION OF AVERAGE ADJUSTERS.—An association of Average Adjusters of London has recently been formed, with a view to the arbitration and examination of claims. A court for the solution of questions affecting marine insurance was established in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, under the name of the Court of Policies, but it soon fell into disuse. The want of an association of the kind has long been felt, and urged on the members of the profession of adjusters. The present chamber contains some of the features of a tribunal of commerce, such as exists in most foreign commercial cities.—Post Magazine.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

Since our last issue the Bank rate of discount has mounted to 6 per cent. and the discount demand has diminished. As the raising of the rate was not immediately preceded by any very large gold withdrawal, it is surmised that the rate has been raised protectively against some anticipated contingency as yet unapprehended by the public. In the markets there is simply nothing doing. The forced realisations are now pretty well over, and the public remain awaiting the future, declining either to sell or buy for the present.

At the half-yearly meeting of the London and County Bank held on Thursday the usual dividend of 6 per cent., with a bonus of 2½ per cent. for the half-year, equal to 17 per cent. per annum, was declared. The net profits for the half-year amounted to £83,235, leaving £7,181 to be carried forward to the new account.

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.—This company, one of the most prominent American offices, was incorporated by special act of the Legislature of New York, in 1843, and commenced business in 1845, and is purely mutual, the entire profits being divided annually among the policyholders only. The assured thereby obtain insurance at actual cost, none of the profits being taken from them and paid to owners of stock. The great progress of the company practically proves the success of this plan. The company has insured 73,000 persons, paid £1,152,000 losses, and also £1,000,000 in cash bonuses; and had January 1st, 1870, a cash surplus of £334,149 over all liabilities. With regard to New York Insurance Laws the prospectus states:—"The Insurance Laws of the State of New York are very strict. By them this company is required to submit to a rigid supervision and examination of all its affairs, and to make sworn statements annually to the superintendent of the insurance department, of its assets, liabilities, income and disbursements, in complete detail; also to undergo a personal examination by the insurance superintendent as a verification. Thus every possible safeguard is thrown around the affairs of the company, and offering a guarantee as to security and solvency not given by the insurance companies of any other country." The company has opened an office in Paris and London.

THE NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE.—The expenditure upon the new Courts of Justice up to the 31st of March, 1870, slightly exceeded £900,000, from which must be deducted about £10,000 for the proceeds of the sale of old materials. This expenditure was for the purchase of the site, with incidental and preliminary expenses. At present the statutory limit of expenditure for the erection of the new courts and offices stands at £750,000. — Times.

THE LONG VACATION.—On Wednesday next the long vacation commences, and will continue to the 24th of October. Vice-Chancellor Bacon will be the Chancery vacation judge for the current year. Mr. Justice Montague Smith is at present attending at the common law judges' chambers, but will be relieved as soon as some of the circuits are over. He is on the rota for the next sessions of the Central Criminal Court. Either Mr. Justice Lush or Mr. Justice Brett will be the common law long vacation judge in town.

The Hon. James Kernan, Q.C., entered on his duties as a Judge of the High Court of Judicature at Madras on the 2nd of June.

HISTORICAL AND MILITARY GEOGRAPHY.

Crown 8vo, cloth, lettered, price 10s.

PHYSICAL, HISTORICAL, and MILITARY GEOGRAPHY: from the Seventh French Edition of T. LAVALLEE, late Professor of Military History and Statistics at the Military School of Saint-Cyr. Edited, with additions and corrections, by Captain LENDR, F.G.S., F.L.S., &c., Director of the Practical Military College at Sandhurst.

"No less than 143 pages are devoted to the French region, which is ominously represented as including, not only France, but also Belgium, Holland, the Transrhine States of Prussia and Bavaria, part of the Duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, and the whole of Switzerland."—Athenæum.

"In one respect an English student enjoys for the moment an advantage over all others. He possesses here in his own language not merely a translation of the best book which is in use on the Continent, but a work which is an infinitely better authority, and more accurate than that book itself. . . . The work, as it at present stands, scarcely needs commendation at our hands. It has been tried and approved in a far inferior form, during a long experience, by a far more severe criticism than any to which it will be subjected in England."—Spectator.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT.

Amsterdam Exhibition, 1869. First Prize, being above the Gold Medal. Supplied to the British, French, Prussian, Russian, Italian, Dutch, and other Governments. Dr. Lancaster writes regarding Extract of Meat:—"But there is a difference in flavour, and here, as in all other kinds of food, it is the flavour that makes the quality." It is essentially on account of the fine meaty flavour, as distinguished from the burnt taste of other Extracts, the LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT defeated all Australian and other sorts at Paris, Havre and Amsterdam, and is so universally preferred in all European markets.

One pint of fine-flavoured Beef-tea at 2d. Most convenient and economical "stock."

LONDON, AUGUST 13, 1870.

THE METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION holds its annual provincial meeting this year at Bristol, the meeting commencing on the 11th of October. The committee have, in accordance with their usual custom, issued a list of suggested subjects for papers, including "The High Court of Justice," "Appellate Jurisdiction," "County Court Jurisdiction and Practice," "Bankruptcy Reform," "Attorneys and Solicitors' Remuneration Act," "Party and Party Costs," "Law University," "Amalgamation of the two Branches of the Legal Profession," "Law of Primogeniture," "Ecclesiastical Courts," "Assizes and Circuits," "Married Women's Property," "Juries," and "Stamp Duties." If the discussions at the meeting cover anything like the ground indicated by this list of suggested subjects, the members of the association will certainly not be without ample material for thought and speech. It is always an object in view in these annual gatherings to combine pleasure with instruction; and we believe that arrangements have been made, by organising excursions and otherwise, which will secure this year's meeting falling behind none of its predecessors.

WE HAVE ALREADY EXPLAINED at some length the most important alterations in the law proposed to be made by the draft County Court Bill, issued under the auspices of the Judicature Commission. There is one further peculiarity of this bill which ought not to pass unnoticed; and that is, the tender regard which it displays for what our French neighbours would call the "legitimate susceptibilities" of county court judges. By section 21, for instance, it is proposed seriously to enact that "the judges shall have precedence next after her Majesty's Solicitor-General." Of course, if we thought it would really give pleasure to any county court judge to walk next behind her Majesty's Solicitor-General, or to wear a cocked hat, or indulge in any other bit of childishness, we should at once say—let him have his toy to play with by all means. But can it be true that the thoughts of county court judges run upon such puerilities? We hope not; yet this bill was drawn by a judge.

But the oddest bit of vanity in the bill is to be found in section 67. County court judgeships and masterships in the superior courts of common law are appointments of just about the same class, and filled by men of about the same position. A county court judge is chosen from the bar, and his salary is £1,500 a-year, in return for which he has to work pretty hard, travel a good deal, and in many cases live in a small country town instead of in London. Almost all the present judges, too, were appointed with salaries of £1,200 or less. Masters are chosen from either branch of the profession, their salary is at least £1,200 a year, their work light, and they can live in London. The office in fact is about as attractive as that of a county court judge. Many men would accept a mastership who would decline a county court judgeship; many, on the other hand, would prefer the judgeship. Those who have been in the habit of appearing before both tribunals know that the masters are, on the whole, quite equal to county court judges in learning, ability, and judicial faculty. There are some very competent masters, some very incompetent. There are some wise men among the county court judges, and some very foolish ones. The average is much about the same in the two offices. But what does the bill say? The county court judge is to be trusted to do anything under the sun; his jurisdiction to try causes is to be unlimited in amount, and up to £50 it is to be exclusive. But the master not only is not fit to try any sort of a cause himself; he cannot be trusted even to decide as to who shall try it and where. By section 67 causes may be sent from the superior courts to the county courts for trial, "provided that the power hereby conferred on the superior judges shall not be delegated to or exercised by any master or other officer of a superior court." This is simply ridiculous.

THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE BILL has been abandoned for the present; but it is very much to be wished that the Government should take advantage of the interval now before them to secure better success next year. The bill introduced this year was, like its companion bill relating to the Court of Appeal, hastily drawn, and the Government, represented by the Lord Chancellor, showed throughout much of that fickleness and irresolution which always evidences a want of clearness of view. And this hurt the prospects of the measure to an extreme degree. But what more than anything else prevented the passage of the bill this year was, it appears to us, the unwillingness of Parliament, at any rate of the House of Lords, to delegate absolutely to anybody outside Parliament the power of dealing with everything falling under the head of procedure and practice. Our readers will remember the somewhat awkward compromise arrived at in the House of Lords upon this point. And now is the time to guard against a similar breakdown next session. There is no reason why the bill in an improved form should not be re-introduced next year, or why it should not be accompanied by at least the outlines of the system of procedure to be adopted under it, whether forming part of the bill itself or not is of small moment. The code of procedure ought, in outline at least, to be prepared at once, not only because Parliament is hardly likely to pass the measure at all till it is done, but also because it must be done sometime before the Act can come into operation; if not done before the bill passes it must be done after; and, therefore, if the Government do not set about the preparation of the new system of procedure at once, they will be deliberately wasting a year, deliberately postponing the reform of our courts without any necessity.

But if it is important that the work be done at once, it is far more important that it be done well, and to this end that it be entrusted to fit hands. It cannot be too clearly understood that the work to be done is no mere clerk's work, nor is it work which can be simply remitted to the Treasury draftsmen, with a few general instructions from the Chancellor for their guidance. If anything of this kind is attempted the result will be a ridiculous failure. A system of procedure has to be thought out first before its details can be put on paper. Trial by jury; the principles on which pleadings are to be framed, and the happy medium found between the length and expense of a bill in chancery and the meagreness of a common law declaration; the mode of bringing the parties to an issue in matters of fact; the taking of evidence in open court or by affidavit; the use of scientific persons as assessors or referees; the incidence of the costs of litigation—these are a few examples taken at random of the kind of matters to be dealt with, and their importance cannot possibly be overrated. It is plain, therefore, that while subordinate assistance in abundance will be required, the framing of the new system of procedure can only safely be entrusted to men of the highest ability, the widest knowledge, and the amplest practical experience. Could not the Chancellor induce his two colleagues in the Court of Appeal, Sir William James and Sir George Mellish, to undertake this labour, giving them, of course, whatever subordinate assistance may be necessary? The work could not possibly be in better hands. Or there are others among the judges and the most eminent men of the profession, of undoubted competence, and who have never shown any backwardness where real work is to be done for the public benefit. Has the Chancellor placed himself in communication with any of them? It would be a great satisfaction to know that a right course is being taken in so important a matter.

THE ANNUAL CONGRESS of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, is to be held in Newcastle-on-Tyne, from the 21st to the 28th of September next. The Duke of Northumberland will preside over the association, and deliver his inaugural address on the first evening of the meeting. The presidents and vice-presidents of the departments most important to lawyers, and the special questions, are as follows:—Jurisprudence and Amendment of the Law.—President, the Hon. Lord Neaves; vice-presidents, the Right Hon. Sir Walter Crofton, C.B., Joseph Brown, Q.C., Mr. Serjeant Cox, the Right Hon. T. E. Headlam, Q.C., M.P., Robert Ingham, Q.C., and W. Digby Seymour, Q.C. International Law Section.—Is it desirable to prohibit the exportation of contraband of war? Papers on the question of the relations between England and her colonies will be read and discussed in this section. Municipal Law Section.—1. Ought railway companies to be liable to an unlimited extent for the acts of their servants, and is it desirable to impose any check on fraudulent claims? 2. Is it desirable to establish tribunals of commerce, and if so with what powers? 3. Would the local administration of criminal justice be improved by the appointment of additional stipendiary magistrates, and the enlargement of the jurisdiction of Quarter and Petty Sessions? Repression of Crime Department.—Chairman, Right Hon. Sir W. Crofton, C.B.; Vice-Chairmen, C. W. Orde, and R. Burdon Sanderson. 1. In what manner may the provisions of the Habitual Criminal Act and its administration be improved? 2. Is the working of the Prisons Act, 1865, satisfactory, specially with reference to productive prison labour? 3. What measures may be adopted with a view to the repression of habitual drunkenness. Economy and Trade Department.—President, Sir William G. Armstrong, C.B., F.R.S., D.C.L.; Vice-Presidents, C. Allhusen, John Candlish, M.P., Sir William Denison, K.C.B., Rupert Kettle, William Newmarch, F.R.S., C. M. Palmer, J.P. Section B.—Chairman, Rupert Kettle. 1. How far is it desirable and practicable to establish courts of conciliation or arbitration between employers and employed? 2. How far is it desirable and practicable to extend partnerships of industry?

THE LAST OF THE GOVERNMENT BILLS for reforming our judiciary, that relating to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, has followed the fate of the others; it was withdrawn on Monday last. And great as the evil to be met is, formidable as the arrears to be overtaken are, we cannot regret the fate of this bill. Hasty, scrambling, ill-considered measures are never good ones; and how much consideration this measure had received from its authors or could receive from Parliament is plain from the dates. On the 1st of July the Lord Chancellor had just given orders for the bill to be prepared. In the beginning of August Mr. Bruce was trying to force it through the House of Commons, admitting that that could only be done by suspending the standing orders.

It had often been proposed to add a regular staff of paid judges to the Judicial Committee. But the Government proposal was to add a staff of underpaid judges, judges receiving about half the salary of a puisne judge. The system of unpaid judges has worked well. A proposal to pay the judges such a salary as should secure the very best men we can at least understand. But a proposal to lower the status of the committee by making attendance a matter of payment, and at the same time to fix the payment at a sum scarcely sufficient to attract fifth-rate men, was a blunder almost without parallel.

The proposal to pay two judges out of the revenues of India was equally objectionable. The maintenance of that particular branch of the royal prerogative which is exercised through the Committee may be defended either on Imperial grounds, in which case we ought to pay the expenses incident to it; or upon grounds relating to the benefit of our colonies and dependencies, in which case it may be right that the expense should fall on those colonies and dependencies. But India and the colonies stand on exactly the same footing in this respect; what is just for one is just for the other. Yet the Government proposes, because we have the key of India's money-box, to compel India to pay her share of an outlay to which the same Government have not ventured to ask any colony to contribute a farthing.

OUR ATTENTION HAS BEEN CALLED to an article on *Tottenham's case which appears in the Law Magazine for this month, under the title "Personal Equities as Operating on Indefeasible Titles." The general conclusion of that article is the same as that arrived at by this Journal, viz., that in the particular form in which the question came before them, the Court was right in refusing to rectify the conveyance, but that the Court of Chancery, on bill filed, ought to decree the defendant to reconvey the property conveyed to her by mistake, and that the House of Lords in all probability would do so, though it seems almost certain that the Court of Appeal in Chancery in Ireland, as at present constituted, would take a different view.

We should not, however, have thought it necessary to refer to the article in question, merely to claim the writer as a supporter of the view we expressed; but as he has thought it right to impugn some observations made by us on a secondary point, without at all entering into the grounds of his dissent, we think we ought to state shortly what it is that we then said.

Our point was shortly this: that inasmuch as the deed in question actually contained (a fact of which the writer in the Law Magazine does not seem to have been aware) a correct description of the parcels, by quantity and situation, in the body of the conveyance, the fact that it also referred to a map which was incorrect ought not to have prevailed against the detailed description; and that, although there was no clause in the deed providing that in case of difference between the map and the written description, the latter should prevail; yet the Court ought to have taken judicial notice of the discrepancy, and relied on that description which was consonant with the truth. We further argued that the Act did not apply at all to the case, and we shall be very glad to hear any objections which any one may think it worth his while to take to that argument, but it is unnecessary to repeat what we there said on that point. Meanwhile, we think no one can doubt that whether any remedy does or not exist, a gross injustice has been done in this case (and we could, were we authorised to do so, tell of many others in the working of the Irish Landed Estates Court) through the reckless exercise of practically unlimited power by irresponsible officials.

WE DISCUSSED THE ARGUMENTS in favour of the Brokers Relief Bill at the time of its second reading (ante p. 687). There was, however, in the bill as it then stood this objection, that although before a broker could set up as such in the City of London, he must be admitted by the Court of the Mayor and aldermen of the

* Vide ante pp. 245, 292.

City, yet once a broker always a broker, even if found out in the grossest frauds. To remedy this a clause was added which enacts, in substance, that if any admitted broker is convicted of felony or fraud, or a judge of a superior court of law or equity, or of a court of bankruptcy, certifies (as he is by the Act empowered to do) even in any proceeding pending before him, in which a broker is party, that such broker has been guilty of fraud, and that he ought to be disqualified from acting as a broker altogether, or for such period as he may think fit, the broker's name shall be removed from the list either absolutely or for the time mentioned in the certificate.

COMPLAINTS HAVE BEEN MADE of the delay in issuing the regulations which a principal Secretary of State is empowered to make by the 11th section of the Naturalisation Act, 1870, and the consequent impossibility of any alien obtaining naturalisation under the Act. It transpired that this delay arose from its being necessary to extend by Act of Parliament the power of the Secretary of State to prescribing by such regulations the oaths to be taken on naturalisation, and the manner of administering them. For this purpose the Naturalisation Oaths Act 1870, was passed, which is to be construed as one with the Naturalisation Act, 1870. It enacts that the regulations may prescribe the persons by whom the oaths of allegiance are to be administered, the form of such oaths, and the fees to be paid for administration and registration of such oaths. The cause being thus removed, we hope that there will now be no further delay in issuing the regulations.

"HEARSAY EVIDENCE."

Before entering upon the chief subject proposed for description in the remarks which follow, we should like to attract notice to the inadequate attention given to the study of the law of evidence in England. If there is one branch of the law of greater practical importance than another, in court as well as out of it, it is the law of evidence. In spite of this circumstance, the examination for the call to the bar may be passed without taking up the law of evidence at all. The same is true of the intermediate examination of the Incorporated Law Society, while for the final the quantity that is prescribed is extremely small. In the new curriculum for the law degrees of the University of London a greater prominence is given to the law of evidence, but the only examinations in which it occupies anything like its proper place are those which selected candidates for the Civil Service of India have to pass before they finally obtain their appointments. Commending these considerations, with the obvious remedy for the evil, to the Legal Education Association, we proceed, without more delay, to plunge in medias res.

The general rule of the English law is "hearsay is not evidence." In this respect the rules of the Scotch and Anglo-Indian legal systems are similar to that of the English law, but the rule of the French law is quite the reverse. Hearsay is freely admitted in French courts, and nothing struck the legal reader of the proceedings in the recent trial of Prince Pierre Bonaparte more than the amount of hearsay evidence tendered and received. In England the equity judges are not so strict as the common law judges in excluding hearsay. Indeed, not only is hearsay admitted in Lincoln's-inn, when it would be excluded in Westminster Hall, but there is a growing tendency to receive it with more and more liberality, which, according to some authorities, is likely to culminate in the speedy abolition, as far as equity proceedings are concerned, of the general rule, and in the admission of all kinds of hearsay evidence, it being left to the Court to attach thereto what weight it thinks fit. The advocates of this alteration in procedure can point to the fact that the current of legislation has operated for years to remove one ground for the exclusion of testimony after another. Lord Denman's Act removed, in 1843, the disqualifications of witnesses arising from infamy and bias, except in the case of the parties to the record. Lord Brougham's Act, in 1851, removed the disability of the parties to the record except in cases of breach of promise of marriage and proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery. These disabilities were swept away by the Evidence Further Amendment Act of last year. It cannot be laid down that plaintiffs and defendants are more trustworthy now than they were a century ago, but the fact has been recognised that Courts may be trusted to take the evidence for what it is worth. Again, the opinion of Bentham was dead against excluding any kind of evidence on the ground of untrustworthiness. He says on this point:—

"Adopt the principle of exclusion in the character of a security against deception, adopt it in any case whatsoever, there is not any point at which its application can with any consistency be made to cease. Exclude for this reason any one bit of evidence whatsoever, by the same reason you are alike bound to exclude all evidence, and along with it all justice. Discard the principle of exclusion altogether, adopt in its stead the principle of universal admissibility, you do no more than give extension to a principle the innoxiousness of which, in every point to which the application of it has been extended, has been made manifest by undeviating experience. Among the cases to which it remains to be extended there cannot be any in which the evidence can be so weak, but that cases in which, being equally weak, it is admitted notwithstanding, abound, and have ever abounded, and without objection or complaint, to an extent the magnitude of which affords a conclusive proof of the safety with which this sort of liberty may be allowed."

The arguments by which he leads up to this conclusion may be epitomised thus—that the danger of a tribunal being deceived by evidence of this character has been exaggerated, and that this exaggeration has been produced by an erroneous assumption—viz., that the danger of deception is equal to the danger of falsity. Where the tribunal is composed of one or more permanent judges, nothing, says Bentham, "can be more extravagant or inconsistent than the distrust of which the practice of exclusion is the practical result." Where the tribunal consists of a judge and jury Bentham admits that the system of exclusion has "a colour of rationality," but says that if you do not exclude in the former case you cannot consistently in the latter. A jury may of course, be misled by untrustworthy evidence, but then, according to Bentham, there is a simple remedy—to allow, as a ground for a new trial, that the verdict of a jury was "grounded on untrustworthy and deceptions evidence." These are the arguments and conclusions, be it remembered, of a jurist who wrote nearly a century ago. Our Legislature has testified its acquiescence in the conclusions by abolishing one ground of exclusion after another, as stated above, until the exclusion of hearsay evidence is the only one of importance that remains. That this ground of exclusion will be swept away also is certain, but whether the present generation of practitioners will live to see the change is a matter of considerable doubt.

Let us now proceed to consider what are the grounds on which is founded the general rule of the English law—hearsay is inadmissible. Before doing so, however, it is necessary to explain that although we employ "hearsay" as a generally accepted and therefore convenient term, we object to it as unscientific, and calculated to mislead a student. The proper term to employ is derivative or second-hand evidence, and this is used by the late Mr. Best, who was by far the most scientific writer on the law of evidence of the present century, and whose "Principles of the Law of Evidence" should be studied as the first book on the subject, in preference to the chaotic work of Mr. Pitt Taylor, or the compressed treatise of Mr. Powell. Mr. Best says of the maxim "hearsay is not evidence":—

"The language of the formula conveys two erroneous notions to the mind: first, directly, that what a person has been heard to say is not receivable in evidence; and secondly, by implication—that whatever has been committed to writing or rendered permanent in any other way is receivable—positions neither of which is even generally true. On the one hand, what a man has been heard to say against his own interest is not only receivable, but is the very best evidence against him, and on the other, as already stated, written documents with which a party is not identified are frequently rejected."

The use of the term "hearsay evidence" instead of second-hand or derivative evidence, renders it difficult to appreciate the circumstance that it may be of acts as well as of words, and increases the liability to confound it with res gestæ—i.e., original proof of what has taken place. But to return to what is proposed for discussion—the grounds for the general rule "hearsay is not evidence." They are thus given in Powell on Evidence (3rd ed. p. 111):—

"When a witness states something which he himself has either seen or heard, directly affecting the parties to a proceeding, such a statement contains clearly the requisite principles of presumptive truth. But when he states something which he has heard from a third person the statement affords no satisfactory or reasonable information. A multitude of probable contingencies annihilate its value. Thus, the witness may have misunderstood or imperfectly remembered, or even may be wilfully representing, the words of the third person; or the latter may have spoken hastily, inaccurately, or even falsely."

Two other reasons are also assigned by some writers—viz., that the person against whom the proof is offered had no opportunity of cross-examining the person who originally made the statement, and that the statement in question was not made under the sanction of an oath or affirmation. To these might be added a third, that the Court has no opportunity of observing the demeanour of the person who made the statement. Now, it will be noticed that hearsay or derivative evidence takes one of five forms: (1) supposed oral evidence delivered through oral; (2) supposed written evidence delivered through written; (3) supposed oral evidence delivered through written; (4) supposed written evidence delivered through oral; (5) reported real evidence. Now, the grounds for the general rule "hearsay is not evidence" apply only in their integrity to evidence of the first kind. They apply partially to evidence of the third, fourth, and fifth kinds, but they do not apply to the second at all. When applied to evidence of the first kind the reasons assigned have doubtless very considerable weight; so much so, in fact, that upon them such evidence is excluded from the consideration of a court by English law. But Bentham, as we have stated above, was opposed to exclusion of any kind. He, however, includes hearsay or derivative evidence under the head of "makeshift evidence," which, he says, should be employed only when "from the same source better evidence, evidence of a more trustworthy complexion, of greater probative force, is not to be had." What he means is this: if A. can depose that he heard B. say so-and-so, and B. is alive, and his attendance can be procured—then if B. is not called A.'s statement is not evidence; but if B. is dead or cannot be called then A.'s statement should be received in evidence for what it is worth, a distinction which the English law observes in proof of pedigree and some other instances. But Bentham says that even if B. is alive, and his attendance can be procured, still A.'s evidence should be admitted as indicative evidence or evidence of evidence.

ON APPOINTMENTS IN FRAUD OF POWERS.

It is quite an elementary proposition of equity, that appointments in fraud of powers are bad. Appointments in fraud of powers are divisible into two classes—the first, where the power is executed in pursuance of some bargain, either with the appointee, or some other person (as in Wellesley v. Mornington, 2 K. & J. 143), for the benefit of the donee; and the second, where there is nothing in the nature of a bargain, but the donee's purpose in executing the power is to secure some benefit or obtain some object, not contemplated by the instrument creating the power. Daubeny v. Cockburn (1 Mer. 626) is an example of the former class of cases, where there was a general power of appointment to children, and the donee of the power appointed to one of the children, with an understanding that he should assign a portion of the fund appointed to, or in favour of, one who was not an object of the power. Lord Hinchinbroke v. Seymour (1 Bro. C. C. 394) is an example of the latter class. In that case a father, with a power of appointment in favour of all or any one or more of his children, at such ages as he should think fit, appointed to a daughter, then aged fourteen, and in delicate health, who died a year afterwards; and it was held that the appointment was bad in equity. So, too, in Lord Sandrich's case, referred to by Lord Eldon (11 Ves. 479), a person exercised a power to charge his estate with a particular sum in favour of his daughter, knowing that she was in a consumption, and not likely to live long, and the Court set aside the appointment, for that his purpose was to get the fund as his daughter's administrator, not to benefit her.

But the proposition above stated must be taken with qualification. An appointment made to the intent that the appointor may obtain for himself some exclusive advantage is bad in equity; yet, if the purpose of the appointor be to confer some benefit on the objects of the power, the circumstance that the appointor does to some extent participate therein will not necessarily vitiate the appointment. In the latest case on the subject (Re Huish's Charity, 18 W. R. 817, the purpose of the appointment presumably was to give the donee of the power a power to grant building leases, which he did not possess under the settlement, but which was intended to be secured to him by certain rather complicated arrangements which ensued on the execution of the power. It was suggested that the transaction, being one to benefit the donee, was one in fraud of the power. Intended to benefit the donee of the power it certainly was, but only incidentally to the transaction, which was for the general benefit of all parties interested; and the Master of the Rolls said, "The meaning and good sense of the rule appears to be, that if the appointor, either directly or indirectly, obtain any exclusive advantage to himself, and that to obtain this advantage is the object and the reason of it being made, then the appointment is bad; but if the whole transaction, taken together, shows no such object, but only shows an intention to improve the whole subject-matter of the appointment for the benefit of all the objects of the power, then the exercise of the power is not fraudulent or void, although by the force of circumstances such improvement cannot be bestowed on the property, without the appointee to some extent participating therein."

The transaction in Re Huish's Charity wears the aspect of a preconcerted arrangement for conferring some benefit on the donee of the power, at all events. Whatever may be the aspect of the transaction, however, the Court will not act on suspicion. In McQueen v. Farquhar (11 Ves. 467) the donee of a power of appointment to his children contracted—which was the suspicious part of the transaction—for sale himself, and then appointed the property contracted to be sold to his eldest son alone, who then conveyed the property to the purchaser, the purchase-money being expressed to be paid to the father as well as the son. Lord Eldon made an unwilling purchaser take a title depending on this transaction, notwithstanding its suspicious nature. It was, in fact, the common case where a father sells and then appoints to one child in order to enable him to make a title.

In Cockcroft v. Sutcliffe (4 W. R. 340) the donee of the power appointed to two of the objects only, and then joined them in a mortgage of the property to secure a sum which was expressed to be advanced to all three. Here, as in McQueen v. Farquhar, the Vice-Chancellor (Sir W. Page Wood) refused to act upon mere suspicion. And in Hamilton v. Kirwan (2 Jo. & Lat. 293), where no fraud was proved, Lord Chancellor Sugden declined to set aside the transaction upon suspicion, though strong. "Lord Eldon, in McQueen v. Farquhar (ubi sup.), was apprehensive that to act upon suspicion would make havoc with many titles, and such would equally be the case at the present time. Suspicion is a ground for the most jealous investigation; but if investigation leave no ground for judicial conviction that the purpose was fraudulent, the Court will not interfere (Re Marsden's Trusts, 7 W. R. 520).

The Court inquires with what purpose or object a power was exercised, but does not inquire into the motives which actuated the appointor—i.e., the feeling or sentiment which prompted him upon the occasion (Vane v. Lord Duncannon, 2 Sch. & Lef. 118). "It is one thing to look into the purpose of the act which was done, and another thing to examine into the motives which led to that purpose," according to Lord Justice Turner in Topham v. Duke of Portland (12 W. R. 697). The distinction between the intent of an appointor and his motives is, according to the Master of the Rolls (Re Huish's Charity, ubi sup.) very thin. Unquestionably, the motives of an appointor may be equally unconscientious with his purpose, but the feelings which prompt a man to do a particular act can never be certainly known, while the purpose with which he does the act may be inferred from the act itself and the surrounding circumstances.

Where the purpose is unconscientious the appointment is bad. An example of this is Re Marsden's Trusts (ubi sup.) In that case a married lady had a power of appointment to her children, and she appointed to her eldest daughter, who was nearly of full age, if she should attain twenty-one or marry. The object was that the daughter should make a further provision for her father, and the appointment was in consequence held bad, although it was not communicated to the daughter until after the death of the appointor. The decision, therefore, proceeded solely upon the purpose with which the appointment was made being fraudulent, as there was nothing in the nature of a bargain between the appointor and the appointee.

We thus see that a literal execution of a power may be bad where the purpose is fraudulent. The second case of Topham v. Duke of Portland (18 W. R. 235), is an illustration of this principle. The Court in that case set aside the execution of a power which had been literally exercised. The appointment was not made in pursuance of a bargain, nor even of a secret understanding, between the appointor and the appointee; it was simply made in the expectation that the appointee would comply with the appointor's known wishes as to the disposal of the fund appointed, and religiously carry those wishes into effect. It was not the case of a trust binding the conscience of the appointee; it was simply the case of a power exercised for an ulterior object, which equally vitiates the appointment, whether it be communicated to the appointee or not, as we have seen in Re Marsden's Trusts (ubi sup.). If the purpose be fraudulent (in the technical sense), the appointor's object need not be disclosed. That there should be an ulterior object is quite sufficient. A power can only be well exercised within the limits prescribed by the donor; and a literal execution of a power, as in Topham v. Duke of Portland, with a purpose which the power does not sanction, is in the contemplation of the Court a fraud on the power.

GREECE.—The Government has refused to permit English barristers to be present at the inquiry relative to the affair at Marathon. The English Minister has protested against this decision.

NEW RECORDERSHIPS.—The Bradford Times says that it is probable that Bradford, Halifax, and Huddersfield will have recorders appointed to them. The names of several gentlemen have been mentioned as likely to receive the appointments.

EQUITY.

MORTGAGE—REDEMPTION IN INVITUM.

Pearce v. Morris, L.C., 18 W. R. 196.

Where several persons are interested in the equity of redemption of a mortgaged property—whether their interests are concurrent in point of time, as in the case, for instance, of tenants in common or joint tenants, or successive, as of tenant for life and reversioner—any one of them may require the mortgagee to let him redeem. If there happen to be a tenant for life and reversioner, each of whom wishes to redeem, it is well settled by Wicks v. Scrivens (1 J. & H. 219), following Ravald v. Russell (1 You. 19), that the tenant for life has the par. As Alexander, C.B., put it in Ravald v. Russell, if the tenant for life has to keep down the interest, it is justice to give him the right of preemption. But the tenant for life, after redeeming, holds the property only on the trusts of the settlement (Wicks v. Scrivens).

As between a part owner and the mortgagee, the latter is bound to accept and re-convey on a tender of principal, interest, and costs by the former, but he can insist on the part owner redeeming the whole property or none (Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 J. & W. 134). Nor, for instance, in a case in which the equity of redemption is settled in undivided shares, can one of the parties to a redemption suit insist on a partition being effected, for the mortgagee is a stranger to that matter, and the Court will not compel him to mix himself up with it.

A mere stranger is of course not entitled to redeem; or else the whole world might race to deprive a mortgagee having a good investment security. The mortgagee therefore—when an offer to redeem him is made by some one not by him known to be the owner of the equity of redemption of the whole estate—is entitled to satisfactory and reasonable evidence that the person tendering is not a mere stranger; and he "may retain the mortgaged estate against every one who cannot show a title to compel redemption" (James v. Biou, 3 Swanst. 237).

Pearce v. Morris marks a reasonable rule for guidance in cases where the tender is made by a purchaser of the equity of redemption. As Lord Hatherley observes, a mortgagee in such a case might feel himself in a doubtful position; if he refused the tender he might lose his subsequent interest, and if he conveyed, he might be conveying to some one who would turn out to be the wrong person. In this case a purchaser of the equity of redemption filed his bill before he had got a conveyance, a conveyance being made to him before decree. Lord Hatherley observed that until he had got his conveyance from the mortgagor he had no equity to compel the mortgagee to convey and give him up the deeds. The bill was prematurely filed.

UNCLAIMED STOCK—PRACTICE.

Rushworth v. Walden, V.C.M. 18 W. R. 204.

The practice under the Unclaimed Stock Acts (8 & 9 Vict. c. 62, &c.) for obtaining transfers of unclaimed stock from the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt is detailed in Daniell, Ch. Pr. p. 1851. If the applicants fail to satisfy the Bank of England of their title they apply to the Court of Chancery by petition, which is served on the Attorney-General, as well as on the Commissioners. It is stated in Daniell (ubi sup.) that the costs are usually directed to be paid out of the fund recovered. But in Rushworth v. Walden Mr. Wickens for the Crown and the Commissioners laid down the practice of this department to be that the costs are not to be made payable out of the fund but by the petitioners, the transfer being made conditionally on previous payment; also that when the stock has to go to the credit of a cause, it is not to be made direct to the credit of the cause, but to the petitioners, they un-undertaking to transfer it to the credit of the cause. The Vice-Chancellor directed the order to be drawn up according to Mr. Wickens' corrections. We are not prepared to say that this practice, which seems on its face to be merely roundabout, may not be justified by some machinery reasons. All we have to do is to remind our readers to note the point.

COMMON LAW.

"CARGO"—CONSTRUCTION.

Kreuzer and Another v. Blanck, Ex., 18 W. R. 813.

The question in this case was whether a contract to deliver a "cargo" of a specified quantity of particular goods was performed by tender of a portion of a cargo, such portion containing the specified quantity of the ordered goods. The defendant ordered a cargo, and the plaintiffs tendered a part of a cargo, which the defendant refused. The defendant was held entitled to refuse the goods on the ground that a cargo and a portion of a cargo are entirely different things, although in each the goods may be of the same quantity and quality.

The defendant argued that it might make a most material difference to the consignee whether a whole or only a portion of a cargo were consigned to him. If he has the whole cargo he is entitled to delivery of the cargo on payment of the freight due upon it. If any is lost, there can be no question as to the effect of the loss, and also there can be no difficulty as to the selection of a port of discharge. If, however, the same quantity of goods, forming part only of a cargo, were consigned, the consignee might be placed in a much less favourable position. His portion of the cargo might be retained by the shipowner until not only the freight due upon that portion was paid, but until the freight due upon the whole cargo was paid. Again, much difficulty might arise in cases of a partial loss of the cargo and in the choice of a port of discharge.

The majority of the Court adopted these arguments in their judgments. Martin, B., dissented. The principle of this decision is general as to the ordinary meaning of the word "cargo," but, on the special facts of the case, there were some circumstances to show that the meaning given by the Court to this word was the meaning in which it had, in fact, been employed by the plaintiffs and the defendant. The judgments, however, turn rather upon the general question of construction than on the peculiar facts, and the case may be considered a general authority for the meaning of the word "cargo." Of course, if the word were used in a special sense in any particular trade or locality, evidence might be given to show such special meaning in accordance with the ordinary rules of evidence. In the absence of such evidence Kreuzer v. Blanck shows that a cargo means "the whole loading" of a vessel, in accordance with the definition of the word given long ago in the case of Sarjent v. Reed (2 Str. 1228).

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—PAYMENT TO AGENT BY CHEQUE.

Bridges v. Garrett, Ex. Ch., 18 W. R. 815.

"The general rule of law is that an authority to an agent to receive money implies that he is to receive it in cash. If the agent receives the money in cash, the probability is that he will hand it over to the principal, but if he is allowed to receive it by means of a settlement of accounts between himself and the debtor, he might not be able to pay it over; at all events, it would very much diminish the chance of the principal ever receiving it, and upon that principle it has been held that the agent, as a general rule, cannot receive payment in anything else but cash" (Sweeting v. Pearce, 7 C. B. N. S. 485, affirmed in Ex. Ch. 9 W. R. 342).

The application of this rule was in dispute in Bridges v. Garrett. The defendant was admitted to a copyhold in a manor of the plaintiff's by one Craig, acting as deputy of the steward of the manor. Craig was also the defendant's solicitor in the purchase. The defendant paid Craig by a crossed cheque £87 10s. 8d., made up of the fine payable to the plaintiff as lord of the manor, of the steward's fees, and also of Craig's own fees as the defendant's solicitor. The cheque was duly paid by the defendant's bankers to Craig's banker, and Craig's banker retained the amount against Craig's overdrawn account. The plaintiff then sued the defendant for the amount of the fine; and the question was whether the payment by the defendant was a good payment as against the plaintiff. The majority of the Court below held that the payment was not good, on the authority of the rule we have cited from Sweeting v. Pearce. They said, "The payment was not a payment in cash. It was not even by an ordinary cheque payable to bearer, but it was by a cheque which by being crossed was made payable to the banker of Mr. Craig, and the state of his account with his banker was such that he never did and never could receive the amount so as to be able to pay it over to the lord or the steward." This decision has now been overruled in the Exchequer Chamber, principally on the ground that Craig was not bound to pay over in specie the money he received from the defendant. He was only bound to account for it to the steward, and, therefore, it was not necessary that the payment to Craig should be in cash. Blackburn, J., points out clearly the distinction between the case of an agent bound to pay over in specie and one bound only to account, and he concludes: "Here what took place was no more than if the defendant had gone and paid the money into Craig's bankers, and that would discharge the defendant and make Craig at once liable; and the fact of Craig's account being overdrawn would be quite irrelevant." Bridges v. Garrett, does not in any way overrule Sweeting v. Pearce, it only decides that the rule there laid down does not apply to such facts as those in Bridges v. Garrett.

BANKRUPTCY.

LIQUIDATION BY ARRANGEMENT—TITLE OF TRUSTEE—EXECUTION—PRIORITY.

Re Morton, C. J. Bkcy., 18 W. R. 890.

Ex parte King, re Skinner, C. J. Bkcy., 18 W. R. 918.

Ex parte Veness, re Gwynne, C. J. Bkcy., 18 W. R. 979.

These three cases, in which judgment appears to have been given on the same day, relate to, and throw much light upon, the very important and very difficult question of the priority of title as between an execution creditor and a trustee in liquidation, when the execution and the liquidation occur at nearly the same time.

In order to make the subject intelligible, and the bearing of these cases quite clear to our readers, it will be well to consider first what we may call the common law of bankruptcy upon this subject; secondly, the state to which statutory provisions had brought the law prior to 1869; thirdly, the changes wrought by the Act of 1869 in case of bankruptcy; fourthly, the distinction, if any, between bankruptcy and liquidation so far as the terms of the Act are concerned; and lastly, the precise effect of the decisions under review.

First, then, it is a rule as old as the bankruptcy laws—as old, at least, as the statute of Elizabeth—that the goods of a bankrupt, "when he became bankrupt," pass for the benefit of creditors. In the modern bankruptcy law this has come to be a rule, that the title of the assignee or trustee relates back to the act of bankruptcy. A second rule is that from whatever time the assignee's or trustee's title dates, he takes the bankrupt's property as from that date, exactly as the bankrupt had it, for the same estate or interest, and subject to the same charges, liens and securities. From these two principles taken together, it followed—first, that if a creditor levied execution upon the goods of his debtor, however bona fide and unsuspectingly, and the debtor was afterwards adjudicated a bankrupt, and it turned out that an act of bankruptcy upon which the assignees were entitled to rely had been committed before seizure under the execution, the execution creditor lost the benefit of his execution, and had to hand over the proceeds to the assignees, for the plain reason that, by virtue of the doctrine of relation, the goods which were seized were not the goods of the debtor, but of the assignees. On the other hand, if the seizure took place before the act of bankruptcy, then the assignees, taking as from the act of bankruptcy, took subject to the execution creditor's security (see Edwards v. Scarsbrook, 11 W. R. 33; Parsons v. Lloyd, L. R. 1 Ex. 307 n.). Both these rules were found to work hardship, and they led to very difficult inquiries as to fact. Our readers will find an example of a case in which the execution creditor won the race by just two hours, in Sadler v. Leigh (4 Camp. 195).

In altering the law the Legislature had, of course, in the case of seizure before act of bankruptcy committed to alter it in favour of the assignees; in the case of seizure after act of bankruptcy committed, in favour of the execution creditor. Accordingly (to say nothing of earlier enactments) section 184 of the Consolidation Act, 1849, dealt with the one case, and enacted that an execution creditor should only receive a rateable part of his debt unless his execution were levied by seizure and sale before petition (see O'Brien v. Brodie, 14 W. R. 840). The other case, that of seizure after act of bankruptcy committed, was dealt with by section 133 of the same Act. It enacted that all executions bona fide levied by seizure and sale before petition should be valid, notwithstanding any prior act of bankruptcy, provided the creditor had not at the time of so levying notice of any prior act of bankruptcy. In Edwards v. Scarsbrook it was expressly decided, and we think rightly, upon the principles already stated, that this last section had no application to the case of an execution in which the seizure preceded the act of bankruptcy; that case being governed by what may be called the common law rule, except so far as section 184, already referred to, modified it. This was the state of the law down to 1869.

The Bankruptcy Repeal Act, 1869, repealed all the sections which we have referred to as previously in force. And we have to see what is enacted in their place.

There is nothing in the New Bankruptcy Act corresponding with section 184 of the Act of 1849; nor anything expressly dealing with the case of an execution in which the seizure precedes the act of bankruptcy. So that, as far as express enactment is concerned, there is nothing to prevent what we have called the common law rule from taking effect, and giving validity to every seizure occurring before the act of bankruptcy. Section 13, however, empowers the Court of Bankruptcy at any time after petition to stay proceedings in any legal process, and also to appoint a receiver. And in the cases now under review the Chief Judge seems to suggest that an application under this section might defeat the execution creditor's right in a case of seizure before act of bankruptcy, where the sale had not taken place before petition. But it is very difficult to see how this can be so. If a receiver be appointed, what are his powers? Plainly to take possession of that to which the assignees are, or are taken to have been, entitled at the moment, past or present, of the commencement of their title. But the assignees are in such a case entitled to the goods in question, subject to the lien of the execution creditor; and if so, the appointment of a receiver could not affect the case. And, again, if proceedings in the execution be stayed, what is the effect? The object of this power seems to us to be not to alter the rights of the parties, but to preserve them unaltered; to secure that the rights of the whole body of creditors as fixed at the date from which the trustee's title takes effect shall not be changed either in law or in fact by any subsequent step on the part of an individual creditor. In such a case as we are now supposing, if the execution were stayed, the next step must be to decide the question of priority between the execution creditor and the trustee. And we do not see how that could be decided otherwise than in favour of the execution creditor, for it would at once appear that he had seized before the act of bankruptcy, and that, therefore, the trustee, taking as from that date, took subject to his lien.

As to the case of an execution in which the seizure is after the act of bankruptcy, the new Act is more specific. Section 95 gives validity to "any execution, executed in good faith by seizure and sale before the date of the order of adjudication, if the person on whose account such execution was issued had not at the time of the same being executed by seizure and sale, notice of any act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt and available against him for adjudication." It will be observed that this section is more favourable to the execution creditor than that for which it is substituted, for it gives him the whole time down to adjudication to sell instead of only down to petition. But here we think the Chief Judge is quite right in saying that section 13, giving power to stay pending proceedings, covers the vacant space. In this case the execution creditor at the time of seizure was, by relation, a simple wrongdoer; he acquired no right over the goods whatever, they were the goods of the trustee; he had only the chance, if he could sell before adjudication, of making good a title under the statute, differing therein from the creditor who seized before the act of bankruptcy whose title was valid ab initio. If this creditor then be restrained from selling, he is restrained from doing that which alone could perfect his title; things are left as they were by relation at the date of the act of bankruptcy, and the title of the trustee must prevail.

We have next to consider the case of liquidation by arrangement as distinguished from that of bankruptcy. Section 125, the one relating to liquidation, enacts, among other things, in clause 4, that "the liquidation by arrangement shall be deemed to have commenced as from the date of the appointment of the trustee." By clause 7 "the trustee under a liquidation shall have the same powers, and perform the same duties, as a trustee under a bankruptcy, and the property of the debtor shall be distributed in the same manner as in a bankruptcy; and, with &c., all the provisions of this Act shall apply to the case of a liquidation by arrangement, in the same manner as if the word bankruptcy included a debtor whose affairs are under liquidation, and the word bankruptcy included liquidation by arrangement; and in construing such provisions the appointment of a trustee under a liquidation shall, according to circumstances, be deemed to be equivalent to and a substitute for, the presentation of a petition in bankruptcy, or the service of such petition, or an order of adjudication in bankruptcy."

Upon these enactments the question at once arises—Is the effect of the words "the liquidation shall be deemed to have commenced from the appointment of the trustee," to make the appointment of the trustee the ultimate point back to which the title of the trustee can be traced, and behind which you cannot ordinarily reopen any matter, as the "commencement of the bankruptcy," defined by section 11, is in the case of a bankruptcy? Or are the words, "the provisions of this Act shall, so far as applicable, apply to the case of a liquidation" with their context sufficient to import into the case of liquidation all the provisions by virtue of which the title of a trustee in bankruptcy relates back to an earlier act of bankruptcy? Or, without considering the various provisions of the Act in detail, do the words, "the property of the debtor shall be distributed in the same manner as in bankruptcy," taken in connection with their context, render everything distributable in case of liquidation which would be so in a bankruptcy, if occurring at the same moment? And lastly, what is the bearing of these questions upon the case of an execution? The first of these questions the Chief Judge, in the cases under review, distinctly answers in the negative; he says that "the liquidation shall be deemed to have commenced" only means that "the active prosecution of the liquidation shall thenceforth ensue." Secondly, the chief judge in these cases disclaims any intention to decide whether or not the doctrine of relation applies to the case of a liquidation by arrangement. But it appears to us clear that he really does decide the question, and decides it in the affirmative; for he arrives at conclusions that cannot be sustained except by virtue of that doctrine. The view which the learned judge intends to convey seems to be something like that which would be expressed by an affirmative answer to the third question. But as the result is substantially to apply the doctrine of relation to the cases of liquidation, the distinction is rather one of words than of things.

This brings us to the individual cases now before us. In Re Morton a judgment creditor proceeded to levy execution upon the goods of his debtor. The seizure was completed before any act of bankruptcy was committed, or any step towards liquidation taken. A petition for liquidation was then presented, and in due course a trustee was appointed; but between the date of the petition and the appointment of the trustee, the goods were sold. The trustee claimed to be entitled to the money; but the Chief Judge, on the authority of Edwards v. Scarsbrook, held that the right of the execution creditor must prevail. This decision was clearly right; it follows necessarily from the principles we have explained. We may also point out that, according to those principles, and to Edwards v. Scarsbrook, the result would have been the same if the sale had been after the appointment of a trustee instead of before it; for section 95 of the new Act, like section 133 of that of 1849, applies only to executions in which the seizure is after an act of bankruptcy; and there is no new section corresponding to section 184 of the Act of 1849. The learned judge, indeed, suggested that in such a case the state of affairs might be altered by staying proceedings in the execution; but we have already given our reasons—reasons which we think must prevail whenever the question comes to be decided—for taking a different view.

In Ex parte Veness the facts were different, and, unfortunately, the view of the facts taken by the learned judge is not as clear as might be wished. In that case the judgment creditor seized the goods of the debtor. After the seizure a petition for liquidation was presented, an order was made restraining the execution, and a trustee was appointed, no sale having taken place. So far the facts are clear. The point upon which the doubt arises is this:—On one side it was contended that prior to the seizure an act of bankruptcy had been committed by the debtor; and, unfortunately, the judge has left it uncertain whether his decision is founded on the assumption that this was so, or not. Yet, in reality, in this point lies the whole key to the case. We give, in his own words, the passage in which the Chief Judge expresses the grounds of his decision. "Laying aside all considerations appertaining to the law of relation in bankruptcy (on which I do not think it necessary, or expedient now to pronounce any opinion), it seems that, a trustee having been appointed, and the date of his appointment being the commencement of the liquidation (the period at which the property of the debtor vests in him), and of the same force and effect as if an order of adjudication in bankruptcy had on that day been made, it cannot be questioned that any execution levied on such property would be ineffectual as against the trustee, unless it is protected by some provision of the statute. The only protection applicable to the case is to be found in the third division of the 95th section, which renders valid any execution against the goods of a debtor executed in good faith by seizure and sale before the date of the order of adjudication. Then, was the execution of Mr. Veness within the terms thus expressed? He had seized before any petition was presented. What is equivalent to an order of adjudication has taken place, and the goods are not sold at this moment. The consequence appears to me to be inevitable that the property in the goods seized is vested and remains in the trustee."

Upon this we can only say that what the learned judge here states is unquestionably law in the case of bankruptcy, if the seizure was subsequent to the time from which the trustee's bill dates; but this is solely by virtue of the doctrine of relation, and, therefore, in applying the same rule to the case of liquidation, the learned judge really decides in favour of the applicability of that doctrine to the case of liquidation, although he expressly disclaims doing so. On the other hand, if the time from which the trustee's title dates were later than the seizure, if there were no act of bankruptcy before that event to which his title could date back, it is quite clear that if "the property in the goods was vested and remained in the trustee," it could only be subject to the lien of the execution creditor. This is clear from the cases already cited. It is therefore much to be regretted that upon this important point the Chief Judge should have left the facts in any doubt.

The case of Ex parte Key shows a wholly different state of facts, and the decision was governed by different sections of the Act from those which we have hitherto had to consider. A judgment creditor levied execution against his debtor, a trader, for a sum of more than £50. The sheriff seized and sold the goods, retaining the proceeds; within fourteen days after the sale a petition for liquidation was presented, and notice was given to the sheriff; after the lapse of fourteen days from the sale a trustee was appointed, and the question was whether the trustee or the execution creditor was entitled to the proceeds of the sale. The Chief Judge decided in favour of the trustee; and we think there can be no doubt of the soundness of his decision.

Section 85 of the Bankruptcy Act enacts that "where the goods of any trader have been taken in execution in respect of a judgment for a sum exceeding £50 and sold, the sheriff shall retain the proceeds in his hands for fourteen days, and upon notice being served upon him within that period of a bankruptcy petition having been presented against him, such trader shall hold the proceeds, after deducting expenses, on trust to pay the same to the trustee." The portions of section 125 which put a liquidation by arrangement on the same footing as a bankruptcy have been already cited.

In the case now before us the Chief Judge held that for the purpose of section 85 a petition for liquidation has the same effect as a petition in bankruptcy; and that, as in the case of bankruptcy, notice to the sheriff within fourteen days was operative, though the appointment of trustees may come later. This being so, section 85 becomes an express enactment that in such a case the trustee in liquidation shall have the proceeds of the sale, and that without any regard to the doctrine of relation. The rights of the trustee must therefore prevail, unless the creditor can bring himself within the protection of section 95. But the Chief Judge held that as the seizure was for more than £50, and against a trader, and was therefore, by section 6, itself an act of bankruptcy, the execution creditor could not be said to be without notice of an act of bankruptcy; and, moreover, section 95 is expressly made subject to the provisions of section 85.

The salary of Mr. S. Robson, the newly-appointed clerk to the borough magistrates of Gateshead, has been fixed by the Gateshead Town Council at £350 per annum. The clerk was formerly paid by fees.

THE SEFTON LIBEL CASE.—Mr. Leng, proprietor of the Sheffield Telegraph, was tried on Thursday, at the Leeds Assizes, for publishing a libel on the Earl and Countess of Sefton. Sir John Karslake, who conducted the prosecution, stated that the plaintiff was actuated by no vindictive spirit, but the Earl felt it to be his duty to the public to lay a criminal information against the defendant. Mr. Digby Seymour, who appeared for Mr. Leng, said that his client had made an ample apology for the indiscretion of his sub-editor, Mr. Peddie, and contended that Mr. Leng was not responsible, as when the paragraph was published he was ill at home, and unable to exercise his usual supervision over what went into the paper. The defendant was, however, found guilty, but sentence was deferred.

REVIEWS.

The American Law Review, July, 1870. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.

The present number of the American Law Review is fully up to the high standard of merit which this periodical has long maintained. The first article in the number is on "Precatory-Trusts in Wills." The writer carefully examines the most important cases bearing on the subject, and elaborately defends the English rules of construction applicable to such trusts against the objections which have from time to time been urged against them. The next article is an interesting account of "The Howland Will Case," a case which has excited much attention in Pennsylvania. The several digests, and the summary of events, with which, as usual, the number closes, are carefully executed.

COURTS.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN-FIELDS.

(Before the Hon. W. C. SPRING-RICE, as Chief Judge.)

August 5.—Re Rouse.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 84 and 89.

The bankrupt had formerly been a clerk in the War Office, but had retired upon a pension; the adjudication was made on 30th May last upon a creditor's petition. At the first meeting the petitioning creditor was the only one who attended and the meeting was adjourned under rule 94, but such adjourned meeting being again attended by such creditor only and no other, the Registrar reported the fact to the Court for its decision under section 84 of the Act, and such report was appointed to be considered by the Court on the 14th of July last, when, on the application of Mr. E. H. Reed, on behalf of the petitioning creditor, supported by affidavit that the only chance of the creditors of the bankrupt being paid was by the proceedings in the bankruptcy being allowed to go on, with the aid of the Registrar as trustee, and the Court making an order for payment to the trustee of a portion of the bankrupt's pension under section 89 of the Act. Mr. Registrar Brougham, sitting as Chief Judge, considered it was a case in which the proceedings should be allowed to continue, and made an order accordingly.

Mr. W. W. Aldridge, representing the registrar as trustee, now applied to the Court that a portion of the bankrupt's pension should be set aside towards payment of his debts. He said that the bankrupt had a pension of £247 a-year, but under a former bankruptcy he had been ordered to set aside £75 towards the payment of his debts of £500. It was now asked that he should set aside £45 a-year in liquidation of his present debts, leaving him in the receipt of £126.

The REGISTRAR asked under what section the application was made.

Mr. Aldridge said it was under the 89th.

His HONOUR, after referring to the section, made the order as asked.

Solicitor for the petitioning creditor, J. S. Co'e.

(Before Mr. REGISTRAR PEPYS.)

August 10.—In re The O'Donoghue, M.P.

An adjudication of bankruptcy has been made, on the petition of Mr. J. N. A. Wallinger, against the O'Donoghue, M.P. for Tralee. The petitioning creditor, Mr. Wallinger, who resides in Brussels, is a judgment creditor of the bankrupt for £184, and the act of bankruptcy alleged is the non-payment of that amount in accordance with the terms of a debtor's summons issued pursuant to the provisions of the new law. The bankrupt is described as "Daniel the O'Donoghue, M.P., of 3, St. James's-street, Pall-mall, of no occupation." The first meeting of creditors will be held on the 31st inst.

REVISING BARRISTERS.—Mr. W. John Ewins Bennett, Mr. J. Stratford Dugdale, and Mr. Chas. Hamilton Bromley have been appointed by the Lord Chief Baron the new revising barristers for the Midland Circuit. Mr. Henry Frederick Gibbons has been appointed an assistant revising barrister. One assistantship still remains to be filled.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. GEORGE MELLISH, Q.C., of the Common Law Bar, has been gazetted as one of the Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, in succession to the Right Hon. Sir G. M. Giffard, deceased. At the Privy Council held at Windsor on the 9th of August, the new Lord Justice was introduced and sworn in a member of that body, and afterwards received the honour of knighthood. The Right Hon. Sir George Mellish, who is in his fifty-sixth year, is the second son of the late Very Rev. Edward Mellish, Dean of Hereford, by Elizabeth Jane, daughter of the late Very Rev. William Leigh, of Rushall-hall, Staffordshire, who was also for some time Dean of Hereford; he is therefore a younger brother of the late Colonel William Leigh Mellish, of Hodsock Priory, near Worksop, Notts. He was educated at University College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A., in 1837, and afterwards proceeded M.A. In November, 1837, he was admitted to commons at the Inner Temple when only twenty-two years of age, but was not called to the bar till eleven years afterwards—namely, June, 1848. For many years he travelled the Northern Circuit, and received his silk gown in February, 1861, in the same year that Sir Richard Baggallay, Sir J. B. Karslake, and Sir J. D. Coleridge, became Queen's Counsel. In April, 1861, he was elected a Bench of the Inner Temple. He had long enjoyed an extensive practice in the Courts at Westminster-hall, but he sometimes appeared in the Courts at Lincoln's-inn, and had a large business in cases before the Privy Council and House of Lords. The new Lord Justice is the first occupant of the post who has been taken directly from the Common Law Bar. One of the first Lords Justices, however, appointed after the passing of the Act constituting the court was the late Lord Cranworth, who was for many years a baron of the Court of Exchequer, and afterwards became Lord Chancellor. More recently two members of the common law bar have occupied the wool-sack—namely, Lords Chelmsford and Campbell. Lord Lyndhurst had also practised at the common law bar.

Sir ROBERT PORRETT COLLIER, Attorney-General, has been appointed Recorder of Bristol, in succession to the late Mr. Serjeant Kinglake. Sir Robert is the son of the late John Collier, Esq., a merchant and shipowner (who was M.P. for Plymouth from 1832 to 1841), by Emma, fourth daughter of the late Robert Porrett, Esq., of North Hill House, near Plymouth. Born in 1817, he was educated at the Plymouth Grammar School, and afterwards proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1841. He was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in January, 1843, and became a member of the Western Circuit; he was created a Queen's Counsel in 1854, with a patent of precedence, and was shortly after chosen a bench of his inn. He was counsel to the Admiralty and Judge Advocate of the Fleet from December, 1859, till October, 1863, when he was appointed Solicitor-General and knighted. In July, 1866, on the fall of Lord Russell's Government, Sir Robert Collier ceased to be Solicitor-General; but on Mr. Gladstone forming an administration in December, 1868, he was appointed Attorney-General, which office he has since continued to hold. He was some time Recorder of Penzance previous to becoming Solicitor-General, and has been M.P. for Plymouth since 1852, having unsuccessfully contested Launceston in 1861. Having accepted the recordership of Bristol there will be a new election for Plymouth, and the writ has accordingly been issued. Sir Robert Collier will hold the Bristol recordership in conjunction with his office of Attorney-General, the present Lord Chief Justice of England (Sir A. Cockburn) having held both offices from April, 1854, till he was appointed Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas in November, 1856.

Mr. WILLIAM GEORGE WHITTALL LOVELL, solicitor of Banbury, has been elected clerk to the magistrates of Deddington, in the room of Mr. Henry Churchill. The other candidates were Messrs. A. Wilson, Buller & Pierce, J. F. Haynes (late of Banbury), Mark Smith, of Brackley, and C. D. Faulkner, of Deddington. Mr. Lovell, the new clerk, was admitted an attorney in Easter Term, 1865.

Mr. FREDERIC MOREHOUSE METCALFE, solicitor of Wisbech, Cambridgeshire, has been appointed a public notary by his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, with authority to practice at Wisbech and within a circle of ten miles from that town. Mr. Metcalfe took out his certificate as a solicitor in Hilary Term, 1852, and holds the office of Clerk of the Peace for the Isle of Ely.

Mr. FREDERIC WILLIAM TOMKINSON, solicitor, of Burslem, has been appointed a Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the county of Stafford.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

August 8.—The Foreign Enlistment Bill went through all its stages and was passed.

The Education Bill.—Their Lordships agreed not to insist upon such of their amendments as the House of Commons had refused to concur in.

The Ecclesiastical Titles Act Repeal Bill.—The Earl of Kimberley felt that under the circumstances the Government were not in a position to press the bill; and with great regret, therefore, they must let the bill drop.

The Stamp Duties Bill, the Stamp Duties Management Bill, the Inland Revenue Acts Repeal Bill, the Greenwich Hospital Bill, the Pensions Commutation Act (1869) Amendment Bill, the Oaths of Allegiance on Naturalisation Bill, the Expiring Laws Bill, the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill, Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Bill, and the Sanitary Act (Dublin) Amendment Bill, were read a second time.

Bill*; Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh and Montrose) Act (1860) Amendment Bill; Telegraphic Acts Extension Bill; Foreign Enlistment Bill; Queen Anne's Bounty Superannuation Bill; Public Acts Amendment (No. 2) Bill; Clerical Disabilities Bill; Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill; National Debt Bill; Statute Law Provision Bill; Pedlars' Certificates Bill; Gas and Water Facilities Bill; Sewage Utilisation Supplemental Bill; Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Supplemental (No. 2) Bill; Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 2 and No. 3) Bills; Blackburn Corporation Improvement Bill; Alexandra (Newport) Docks Bill; Dagenham (Thames) Docks Bill; Norwy and Greenore Railway Bill; and Poole and Bournemouth Railway Bill.

The Census Bill.—On the motion of the Earl of Morley, their Lordships gave up the amendments which they had introduced into this bill, and to which the Commons had refused to agree.—The bill was then read a third time and passed.

Stamp Duties Bill and Stamp Duties Management Bill.—These bills were read a third time and passed.

Inland Revenue Acts Repeal Bill.—This measure was read a third time and passed.

Local Government Supplemental (No. 2) Bill.—This bill was read a third time and passed.

Greenwich Hospital Bill.—This bill was read a third time and passed.

Pensions Commutation Act (1869) Amendment Bill.—This bill was read a third time and passed.

Oaths of Allegiance on Naturalisation Bill.—This bill was read a third time and passed.

Expiring Laws Bill.—This bill was read a third time and passed.

Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill.—This measure also was read a third time and passed.

Joint Stock Companies Bill.—This bill was read a third time and passed.

The Truck Commission Bill.—This bill also, with some amendments, was read a third time and passed.

Aug. 10.—The Royal assent was given by commission to the following bills:—Consolidated Fund (Appropriation), Stamp Duties, Stamp Duties Management, Inland Revenue Acts Repeal, Greenwich Hospital Pensions Commutation Act (1869) Amendment, Oaths of Allegiance on Naturalisation, Expiring Laws, Joint Stock Companies Arrangement, Truck Commission, Sanitary Act (Dublin) Amendment, Census (England), Census (Scotland), Real Actions Abolition (Ireland), Matrimonial Causes and Marriage Law (Ireland), Berhouses, Glebe Loans (Ireland), Local Government Supplemental (No. 2), Glyn Valley Tramway, Pimlico, Peckham, and Greenwich Street Tramways (Various Powers), Birmingham and Staffordshire Tramways, Plymouth, Stonehouse, and Devonport Tramways, Birmingham Suburban Tramways, Portsmouth Street Tramways, London Street Tramways, North Metropolitan Tramways, Metropolitan Street Tramways, Pimlico, Peckham, and Greenwich Street Tramways (Extensions, &c.), Glasgow Street Tramways, and Liverpool Tramways.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

August 8.—Militia Act Amendment Bill.—The standing orders were suspended, and the above bill passed through its several stages.

Religious Census Bill.—The Lords' amendments were disagreed to, and a committee appointed to draw up reasons.

The Lords' amendments to the Turnpike Acts Continuance, &c., Bill, the National Debt Bill, the Pedlars' Certificates Bill, the Statute Law Revision Bill, and the Gas and Water Facilities Bill were considered and agreed to.

Judicial Committee Bill.—Mr. Bruce, in moving that the House should go into committee on this bill, stated that though the Government had withdrawn the other two important measures of law reform, the necessity for dealing with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was so great, that they felt it their duty to proceed with this measure notwithstanding the near approach of the termination of the session. It was proposed that any person who had filled the office of chief judge in any of the principal courts of India, or who had filled the office of legal member of the Council of the Governor-General might be made a member of the Judicial Committee with an addition of £1,000 a-year to his salary; and it was also proposed that retired judges might be made members with an addition of £500 a-year to their salaries. The present salary of a judge was £4,500 a-year—a sum fixed upon with reference to the expenses of circuit, which were estimated at £500 a-year; and the retiring pension for a judge being £3,500, the addition of £500 would place those who were appointed to the Judicial Committee in the same position as the judge of an ordinary court, while the duties would be much less severe. The bill also contained a clause giving power to appoint to the Judicial Committee any barrister of fifteen years' standing, at a salary of £2,500, and though great objection had been made by the legal profession on the ground of the smallness of the salary, there was much to be said in favour of the proposal. Barristers were not unfrequently to be found who had not the talent of advocates in a sufficient degree to make by their profession £2,500 a-year, yet who would make most able judges. It was not, however, the intention of the Government to proceed with that part of their measure. They were also aware that the time which remained of the session was not adequate to the full consideration of the subject, and therefore they proposed to limit the operation of the bill to one year, so that the question would be reconsidered next year in connection with the High Court of Judicature and Court of Appeal Bills. Another class of judges not mentioned in the bill might, he thought advantageously be added to the Judicial Committee. There were judges who, from ill-health or other causes, would gladly retire before the expiration of the period at which they would be entitled to their full pension, if they could do so, with justice to themselves; and it was proposed to introduce into the bill a clause to the effect that after ten years' service on the bench a judge might retire at once on full pension on condition that he served the other five years on the Judicial Committee.—Mr. W. Williams moved that the House should on that day three months resolve itself into committee on the bill, and stated his objection to the measure to be that it would have the effect of reducing the greatest Court of Appeal in the whole world to the condition of a second or third rate court. And he further objected to the bill because they were at this time engaged in the entire reconstruction of our judicial system, and two bills with that view had been introduced this session which could not be proceeded with.—Mr. Henley said that a heavy responsibility rested upon the Government for having suffered such a state of things to grow up as he had described, because there was no doubt that to a certain class of her Majesty's subjects it was almost a denial of justice to postpone the hearing of their causes from time to time. But that was not the only question this House had to consider, but, upon the balance of convenience and inconvenience, whether it was not better to go on for three or four months longer, than to adopt a bad remedy. He thought this bill should not be pressed.—Mr. H. James opposed the motion of the Government. The objections to the measure were so strong that he did not think it was possible at the present period of the session to pass a satisfactory bill.—Colonel Sykes approved of the bill.—Mr. A. Kinnaid thought that the appeal made to postpone the motion was so reasonable that it ought to be listened to.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted the objections which had been made to be very strong, but such a bill as this was absolutely necessary in order to enable them to deal with the vast accumulation of appeals.—Mr. V. Harcourt opposed the bill. Neither in that House nor out of it had the Government been able to find a single member of the profession of the law who could say a good word for the bill. The House divided: for going into committee, 64; against it, 45—19. The House then went into committee.—Mr. W. Williams moved that the chairman do now leave the chair.—Mr. Bruce hoped the hon. and learned gentleman would not persist in his opposition to the bill.—Mr. Williams felt justified in availing himself of the forms of the House to frustrate the progress of a bill of this magnitude at the far-end of the session.—Mr. G. Gregory thought the committee was entitled to some explanation from the law officers in regard to the provisions of the bill. The committee divided: for the motion, 39; against it 63—24. Clause 1 was agreed to. On clause 2, power to her Majesty to appoint two retired Indian judges, Mr. Bruce moved the following addition to the clause: "There shall be paid out of the revenues of India to any person appointed a member of the Judicial Committee, in pursuance of this section, during the time that he serves as a member of such committee, an annual payment not exceeding one thousand pounds, in addition to any pension he may be entitled to in respect of his services in India."—Col. Sykes proposed to insert after "Indian" the words "with the consent of the Secretary of State for India in Council."—Mr. James objected to the revenues of India being charged with the payment of persons who might have to hear English and colonial causes.—Mr. Fawcett did not see why the people of India should pay this money any more than the people of our colonies.—Mr. V. Harcourt said that the Government were bringing forward a project for law reforms which they could not get their own law officers to support. Such a circumstance was unprecedented.—Mr. Young supported the amendment.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer, replying to the member for Brighton, said that we had no power to tax the colonies. It was not fair that the legal expenses of India should be paid by the people of England. The committee divided: for the amendment, 36; against, 48—majority, 12. The committee divided upon a proposal by Mr. Bruce to add at the end of the clause words to the effect that there should be paid out of the revenues of India to any person appointed a member of the Judicial Committee, in pursuance of this section, an annual sum of £1,000, in addition to pension to which he might be entitled in respect of any services in India. For the amendment, 33; against it, 36—majority, 2.—Mr. Bruce said, considering the opposition which the measure had excited, nothing remained but to abandon the bill.

Clerical Disabilities Bill.—Mr. Rylands moved that the House should agree with the Lords in their amendments. The amendments were agreed to.

Divine Worship in Licensed Buildings Bill.—This bill was withdrawn.

August 9.—Census (Scotland) Bill.—The Lords' amendments to this bill were agreed to.

Beer-houses Bill.—The Lords' amendments to this bill were agreed to.

FOREIGN TRIBUNALS & JURISPRUDENCE.

AMERICA.

DISTRICT COURT, PHILADELPHIA.

July 2.—Collins v. The Insurance Company.

A policy of life insurance was duly executed and sent to the agent of the company, but was not delivered to the insured, and was withheld until payment of the premium should be made, which was not made when the insured died.

Held, that the contract of insurance was not complete.

Opinion of HARR, P.J.—Concisely stated, the argument of the plaintiff's counsel amounts to this, that if the minds of the parties meet in an agreement for insurance, the policy will be valid without an actual delivery. This position is one to which the Court fully accede. A binding contract will not be allowed to fail because the instrument which is the evidence of it, is retained by the covenantor. His keeping will, under these circumstances, be regarded as that of the covenantee. But on the preliminary question, is there such a contract? it must always be a material inquiry, whether the party who is alleged to have bound himself did any act manifesting an intention to put the instrument beyond his control, and render it the property of the other party. If he did not, the obligation is prima facie incomplete, and those who alleged the contrary, must make out their case by proof.

In the present instance, a policy duly signed and sealed by the defendants was transmitted by them to Andrew Manship, their general agent for the state of Delaware. It was the result of an application which the plaintiff had made through Manship for an insurance on the joint lives of himself and his wife. Manship had, in the meantime, written to the plaintiff urging the payment of the premium as the condition precedent on the fulfilment of which the insurance would be effectual. The plaintiff, however, declined to pay till fall, when he hoped to be in funds from the sale of his corn. When the policy arrived, Manship sent it by mail to a Mr. Wharton, who resided in the same village as the plaintiff, with instructions to deliver it on the payment of the premium but not before. This letter reached its destination on the 6th of November, 1868, and the plaintiff's wife died on the following day, leaving the premium still unpaid. The plaintiff then sent a cheque for the amount to Manship which was returned. An action of covenant having been brought and issue joined on a plea of non est factum, the plaintiff was nonsuited at the trial on the ground that there was no evidence of the delivery which is essential to every deed.

It results from this review of the evidence, that the policy never ceased to be in the custody of the defendants. Manship was the general agent of the company, and while the instrument was in his hands it was in theirs; and when he sent the policy to Wharton it was with express instructions that it should not be given up until the money was paid. The policy, however, contains a clause that "this policy when signed by two officers of the company, acknowledges and is a valid receipt for the first premium thereon," and it is contended, that inasmuch as the instrument in evidence was so signed, it must be regarded as conclusive that the premium was paid. This argument, however, overlooks, that while the policy as thus explained is unquestionably a receipt, it is a receipt prepared in the expectation of a payment which was never made. It might as well be contended that a shopkeeper is bound by a receipted bill sent to the house of a customer who does not find it convenient to pay. Even when such an instrument is signed and delivered it may be explained. Without delivery it is merely inchoate, and of no more real value in the scales of proof than an unuttered thought, or a design which is not executed. Undoubtedly if there had been evidence showing an intention to trust the plaintiff, or take some one else for the debt and release him, the case might have gone to the jury and been determined by them. It was on this ground, that the insurers had, by charging the broker, credited the insured, that the case of Xenos v. Wickham (11 W. R. 1067), was decided by the House of Lords. Unfortunately for the plaintiff the evidence in this instance is the other way. He was cautioned by Manship that the defendants did not deal on credit, that the transaction was for cash, and that the policy would not be effectual until the money was actually paid — Philadelphia Legal Intelligence.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS.

H. H. Honore v. The Lamar Fire Insurance Co.

1. Held, that where a mortgagee insures the mortgaged property, and a loss occurs, the mortgagee is not in all cases entitled to the benefits of the policy.

2. That where a mortgagee insured at his own cost without privity with the mortgagor and without his knowledge, and the property was destroyed by fire, that when the company paid the debt due the mortgagee from the mortgagor, it indemnified the mortgagee against loss and was entitled to be subrogated to his claim, and that the mortgagor, having had no connection with the insurance, could not claim its benefit.

Opinion of the Court by LAWRENCE, J.—The appellant executed his note to Rutter, Endicott & Whitehouse, for 2,146 dols. 50 cents, and deposited with them, as collateral security, seventy-four barrels of whisky. They effected an insurance on the whisky in the Lamar Fire Insurance Company, appellee herein, at their own expense, and in their own name, and without the authority or even the knowledge of appellant. The whisky was subsequently destroyed by fire, and the company paid the policy to Rutter, Endicott & Whitehouse, first requiring an assignment of appellant's note.

The note was accompanied by a power of attorney to confess a judgment, and the company having caused a judgment to be confessed, the appellant filed a bill to enjoin its collection. On the hearing, the Circuit Court dismissed the bill.

If the insurance had been effected at the request or by the authority of appellant, or at his expense, or under circumstances that would make him chargeable with the premium, we should have no difficulty in holding him entitled to its benefits, by applying the money paid in extinguishment of so much of his debt. But none of these circumstances are presented by this record.

The appellant prosecutes his writ of error merely upon the ground that, in all cases where a mortgagee insures the mortgaged property, the mortgagee is entitled to the benefits of the policy.

This position is maintainable neither upon principle nor authority. The contract of insurance, it has been often remarked, is one of indemnity merely. Any person having an interest in property may, through an insurance, indemnify himself against loss by fire. Mortgagor and mortgagee have each an insurable interest. The interest of both may be covered in one policy, or each may take out a separate policy. In this case the mortgagees insured at their own cost, without privity with the mortgagor and without his knowledge, and when the company paid them the debt due them from the mortgagor, it indemnified them against loss, and was entitled to be subrogated to their claim. The mortgagor, having had no connection with the insurance, cannot claim its benefit.

As the premium was not paid by him or chargeable to him, as he was not aware even that an insurance had been effected until after the fire, it is difficult to see how such insurance, even when paid, can affect his liability upon his note. Even the case of King v. The State Mutual Fire Insurance Company (7 Cush., 10), on which the appellant chiefly relies, holds that in such cases the liability of the mortgagor upon his note remains the same, but that the mortgagee may recover it for his own use, although already paid by the insurance company. Certainly it is much more consonant to every principle of equity to say that the debt may be recovered for the benefit of the insurance company than that the mortgagee should be twice paid.

The doctrine of that case would sanction wager policies and furnish a dangerous temptation to incendiarism.

That the insurance company is entitled to be subrogated to the claims of the mortgagee, in such a case as the present, is held in Carpenter v. Providence Washington Insurance Company, 16 Pet. 501; Sussex Insurance Company v. Woodruff, 2 Dutcher, 555; and Etna Insurance Company v. Tyler, 16 Wend. 397. In Concord U. M. Insurance Company v. Woodbury, 45 Maine, 452, where the assured had voluntarily assigned his claim to the insurance company upon payment by it, as in the present case, the Court held the company entitled to recover.

The question of the right to subrogation against the will of the mortgagee was not presented in that case, nor is it in this, because the assignment was made by the mortgagee upon payment of the loss. The only question strictly presented here is, whether the mortgagor has been discharged from his debt by the payment of the mortgagee's policy, and on this point there is no disagreement among the authorities.

The debt is still in existence, and the strong equity of the insurance company has been united to the legal title.

The Circuit Court committed no error in dismissing the bill.

Decree affirmed.

OBITUARY.

MR. COMMISSIONER WEST.

Mr. Martin John West, late Commissioner of the Leeds Bankruptcy Court, expired at Cadogan-place, London, on the 5th of August. The late Mr. Commissioner West was born on the 1st of June, 1786, and had therefore attained to the ripe age of 84 years. He was educated at Harrow (where he was a contemporary of Lord Palmerston, Sir Robert Peel, and Lord Byron), and at University College, Oxford. Soon after taking his degree he was elected a fellow of Merton College, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in June, 1812. In 1817 he was nominated recorder of King's Lynn, which office he held till 1868. He was appointed a commissioner of lunacy by Lord Cottenham, and held that office till 1842, in which year he was appointed a commissioner in bankruptcy for the Leeds district. This office he resigned in 1867. Mr. West married, in 1817, the Lady Maria Walpole, second daughter of Horatio, second Earl of Oxford; by this lady, who survives her husband, he had three sons and two daughters. His eldest son, Mr. Henry Wyndham West, Q.C., Recorder of Manchester, is member for Ipswich; his second son, the Rev. Richard Temple West, is incumbent of St. Mary Magdalene, Paddington; his third son, Mr. Algernon West, is private secretary to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, and is a member of the Royal Household. His eldest daughter is married to Admiral the Hon. Sir Henry Koppel, K.C.B. The Yorkshire Post, speaking of Mr. West as a bankruptcy commissioner at Leeds, says:—"In this office he won the respect of practitioners and the commercial classes by his great courtesy and impartiality. He dispensed justice with mildness. His desire to conciliate opposing parties was so great that his judgments were in every possible case compromises between conflicting claims. This may have disintegrated him to the character of a brilliant or profound lawyer, but it resulted in fewer appeals to the courts of appeal than were known in any commissioner's court in the kingdom."

MR. G. WELLER.

Mr. George Weller, solicitor (formerly of Brimington-hall), died at Derby on the 24th of July, in his seventy-eighth year. The late Mr. Weller was admitted an attorney in Trinity Term, 1834, and was for many years joint registrar of the county court at Chesterfield, in Derbyshire. He had previously carried on business in London, at Kings-road, Bedford-row, with Mr. George Henry Weller, now registrar of the county court at Derby.

MR. G. EMERSON.

The death of Mr. George Emerson, M.A., barrister-at-law, took place at Folkestone on the 3rd of August, at the early age of thirty four years. The deceased gentleman was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1858, and afterwards proceeded to the M.A. degree. Mr. Emerson was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in April, 1862, and soon after joined the Western Circuit.

MR. G. H. BAYS.

Mr. George Henry Bays, solicitor, died at Newmarket-road, Cambridge, on the 16th of July, in the seventy-third year of his age. The late Mr. Bays was certificated in Easter Term, 1821, and had practised at Cambridge for many years.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

GENERAL EXAMINATION.

MICHAELMAS TERM, 1870.

The Council of Legal Education have approved of the following rules for the general examination of the students.

The attention of the students is requested to the following rules of the Inns of Court:—

"As an inducement to students to propose themselves for examination, studentships and exhibitions shall be founded of fifty guineas per annum each, and twenty-five guineas per annum each respectively, to continue for a period of three years, and one such studentship shall be conferred on the most distinguished student at each general examination, and one such exhibition shall be conferred on the student who obtains the second position; and further, the examiners shall select and certify the names of three other students who shall have passed the next best examinations; and the Inns of Court to which such students as aforesaid belong may, if desired, dispense with any terms, not exceeding two, that may remain to be kept by such students previously to their being called to the bar. Provided that the examiners shall not be obliged to confer or grant any studentship, exhibition, or certificate, unless they shall be of opinion that the examination of the students has been such as entitles them thereto."

"At every call to the bar those students who have passed a general examination, and either obtained a studentship, an exhibition, or a certificate of honour, at such examination, shall take rank in seniority over all other students who shall be called on the same day."

"No student shall be eligible to be called to the bar who shall not have attended during one whole year the lectures and private classes of two of the readers, or have been a pupil during one whole year, or periods equal to one whole year, in the chambers of some barrister, certified special pleader, conveyancer, or draughtsman in equity, or two or more of such persons, or have satisfactorily passed a general examination. Provided that students admitted before the first day of Hilary Term, 1864, shall have the option of qualifying themselves to be called to the bar, either under the 'Rules of the Inns of Court of Hilary Term, 1852,' or under these regulations."

"That not more than four terms under any circumstances be dispensed with in favour of students coming from India, or the colonies, with a view to return to residence there, and that it is not expedient to dispense with any terms for such students except on the following conditions, viz:—

"1. That students from India do satisfactorily pass an examination in Hindu and Mahomedan Law, the Indian Penal Code, the Code of Criminal Procedure, the Code of Civil Procedure, the Indian Succession Act, and in such other codes and Acts as may from time to time become law in British India; and, in addition to such examination do pass such examinations, and abide by all such rules and regulations as are now in force for students seeking a pass certificate, by examination, for call to the bar.

"2. That students from the colonies do pass such an examination as is required, and do abide by all such rules and regulations as are now in force, in order to obtain a certificate of honour.

"3. Provided that each of the four Inns of Court be at liberty to dispense with the above conditions in such very special circumstances as they may think fit, and that such circumstances be stated in the certificate of call to the bar given to every such student. The benchers of each Inn, subject to the foregoing limitations, being guided, in the dispensation of terms, by the circumstances of each particular case."

Rules for the Examination of Candidates for Honours, or certificates entitling students to be called to the Bar.

An examination will be held in next Michaelmas Term, to which a student of any of the Inns of Court, who is desirous of becoming a candidate for a studentship, an exhibition, or honours, or of obtaining a certificate of fitness for being called to the bar, will be admissible.

Each student proposing to submit himself for examination will be required to enter his name at the treasurer's office of the Inn of Court to which he belongs, on or before Friday, the 21st day of October next; and he will further be required to state in writing whether his object in offering himself for examination is to compete for a studentship, exhibition, or other honourable distinction; or whether he is merely desirous of obtaining a certificate preliminary to a call to the bar.

The examination will commence on Friday, the 28th day of October next, and will be continued on the Saturday and Monday following, except as regards Hindu law, &c., which will be held on Tuesday, the 1st of November.

It will take place in the Hall of Lincoln's Inn; and the doors will be closed ten minutes after the time appointed for the commencement of the examination.

The examination by printed questions will be conducted in the following order:—

Friday morning, the 28th October, at ten, on constitutional law and legal history; in the afternoon, at two, on equity.

Saturday morning, the 29th October, at ten, on common law; in the afternoon, at two, on the law of real property, &c.

Monday morning, the 31st October, at ten, on jurisprudence and the civil law; in the afternoon, at two, a paper will be given to the students, including questions bearing upon all the foregoing subjects of examination.

Tuesday morning, the 1st November, at ten, on Hindu and Mahomedan law, and on the laws in force in British India; in the afternoon, at two, a paper upon the foregoing subjects of Hindu law, &c.

The oral examination will be conducted in the same order, during the same hours, and on the same subjects, as those already marked out for the examination by printed questions, except that on the afternoons of Monday and Tuesday there will be no oral examination.

The oral examination of each student will be conducted apart from the other students; and the character of that examination will vary according as the student is a candidate for honours, the studentship, the exhibition, or desires simply to obtain a certificate of having satisfactorily passed the general examination.

The oral examination and printed questions will be founded on the books below-mentioned; regard being had however to the particular object with a view to which the student presents himself for examination.

In determining the question whether a student has passed the examination in such a manner as to entitle him to be called to the bar, the examiners will principally have regard to the general knowledge of law and jurisprudence which he has displayed.

A student may present himself at any number of examinations, until he shall have obtained a certificate.

Any student who shall obtain a certificate may present himself a second time for examination, as a candidate for the studentship or exhibition, but only at the general examination immediately succeeding that at which he shall have obtained such certificate; provided, that if any student so presenting himself shall not succeed in obtaining the studentship or exhibition, his name shall not appear in the list.

Students who have kept more than eleven terms shall not be admitted to an examination for the studentship.

The Reader on Constitutional Law and Legal History proposes to examine in the following books and subjects:—

1. Hallam's History of the Middle Ages, chap. 8.
2. Hallam's Constitutional History.
3. Broom's Constitutional Law.
4. The chief statutes from the date of Magna Charta to that of the union with Scotland.
5. The principal State trials of the Stuart period.

Candidates for Honours will be examined in all the above books and subjects.

Candidates for a certificate in 1 and 3 only, or 2 and 3 only at their option.

The Reader on Equity proposes to examine in the following books:—

1. Haynes's Outlines of Equity, or Snell's Principles of Equity; Smith's Manual of Equity Jurisprudence (last edition); Hunter's Elementary View of the Proceedings in a Suit in Equity, Part I. (last edition).

2. The Cases and Notes contained in the first volume of White and Tudor's Leading Cases. The Act to Amend the Law Relating to Future Judgments, Statutes, and Recognizances, 27 & 28 Vict., c. 112. The Act to Explain the Operation of an Act passed in the 17th & 18th Years of Her present Majesty, c. 113, intituled, An Act to Amend the Law Relating to the Administration of Deceased Persons, 30 & 31 Vict., c. 69. The Act to Remove Doubts as to the Power of Trustees, Executors, and Administrators to Invest Trust Funds in certain securities, and to declare and amend the Law relating to such Investments, 30 & 31 Vict., c. 132. The Act to Amend the Law relating to Sales of Reversions, 31 & 32 Vict., c. 4; and the Act to Abolish the Distinction as to Priority of Payment which now exists between the Specialty and Simple Contract Debts of Deceased Persons, 32 & 33 Vict., c. 46.

Candidates for certificates of having passed a satisfactory examination will be expected to be well acquainted with the books mentioned in the first of the above classes.

Candidates for the studentship, exhibition, or honours, will be examined in the books mentioned in the two classes.

The Reader on the Law of Real Property, &c., proposes to examine in the following books and subjects:—

1. Joshua Williams on the Law of Real Property. (Eighth edition.)

2. Lapse. 1 Jarman on Wills, pp. 314—329. (Third edition.)

3. Limitation of Actions and Suits, 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, and the notes to that statute in Shelford's Real Property Statutes. (Seventh edition.)

4. Vested or Contingent Devises and Bequests: Boraston's Case, 3 Co. 19 a.; Lady Paulet v. Lord Paulet, 1 Vern. 321; Stapleton v. Cheales, Prec. Ch. 318; Hanson v. Graham, 6 Ves. 239, and the notes to those cases in Tudor's Leading Cases in Real Property and Conveyancing, pp. 713—762. (Second edition.)

5. The Dissertation on Settlements in vol. 3 of Davidson's Conveyancing, pp. 1—196. (Second edition.)

Candidates for honours will be examined in all the above subjects; candidates for a pass certificate in those under heads 1, 2, and 3.

The Reader on Jurisprudence, Civil and International Law, proposes to examine in the following books and subjects:—

1. Justinian, Institutes. B. i., with notes of Sandars.

2. Lord Mackenzie, Roman Law. Preliminary chapter on jurisprudence and principal divisions of law. Part i., on the law of persons.

MICHAELMAS EDUCATIONAL TERM, 1870.

PROSPECTUS OF THE LECTURES to be delivered, during the ensuing Educational Term, by the several Readers appointed by the Inns of Court.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW AND LEGAL HISTORY.

The Reader on Constitutional Law and Legal History proposes to deliver, during the ensuing Educational Term, six public lectures on "The History of the Law of England from the Conquest to the End of the Reign of Henry III."

With his private class the Reader proposes to go through the cases in "Broom's Constitutional Law," illustrating the "Duties of the Subject towards the Sovereign, and the Duties of the Sovereign towards the Subject."

EQUITY.

The Reader on Equity proposes to deliver, during the ensuing Educational Term, two courses of public lectures (there being six lectures in each course) on the following subjects:—

An Elementary Course.

I.—On the origin and nature of the feudal system of government; the private jurisdictions to which it gave rise, and their influence on judicial procedure in England.

II.—On the establishment and history of the Court of Chancery.

III.—On the custody of the great seal.

IV.—On pleadings in the Court of Chancery.

An Advanced Course.

I.—On the amalgamation of law with equity.

II.—On relief in equity against actual fraud.

III.—On relief against constructive fraud.

In the Elementary Private Class the subjects explained will be—The Creation and Incidents of Express Trusts, and the Remedies for Breaches of Trust.

In the Advanced Private Class the lectures will comprehend—Executory Trusts, and the Doctrine of Election.

THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY, &c.

The Reader on the Law of Real Property, &c., proposes to deliver, in the ensuing Educational Term, twelve public lectures (there being six lectures in each course) on the following subjects:—

Elementary Course.

I.—On the origin, development, and decline of feudal tenures.

II.—On the Acts to further amend the law of real property. (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38.)

Advanced Course.

I.—On the points of contrast between feudal tenures and those recognised in modern law, the history of the substitution of the one for the other, and the existing relics of feudalism.

II.—On waste.

III.—On the apportionment of rents.

In the Elementary Private Classes the Reader will endeavour to go through a course of Real Property Law, using as a text-book Mr. Joshua Williams' "Principles of the Law of Real Property"; and in his Advanced Private Classes he will examine and comment upon cases selected from Mr. Tudor's "Leading Cases in Real Property and Conveyancing," and White and Tudor's "Leading Cases in Equity."

JURISPRUDENCE, CIVIL AND INTERNATIONAL LAW.

The Reader on Jurisprudence, Civil and International Law proposes to deliver, during the ensuing educational term, six public lectures on—

I.—The past and present influence of the Roman law upon the English systems of common law and equity.

II.—The Roman law, so far as it affects the colonies of England.

III.—The early history of the Roman law.

IV.—The sources of international law.

In his Private Class, the Reader proposes to discuss the Roman Law with regard to Quasi Contracts, the modes of dissolving an Obligation, and Delicts. He will use as text-books Sandars' "Institutes of Justinian," the "Code de Napoleon," "Chitty and Addison on Contracts," and "Addison on Torts."

The Reader will also discuss, in the Private Class, points of International Law relating to the "Rights of War as between Enemies," using Wheaton's "Elements of International Law" as the text-book, and referring to the works of the principal modern jurists, the decisions of the Admiralty and Prize Courts of England and America, the Debates in Parliament, and State Papers relating to the cases under discussion.

COMMON LAW.

The Reader on Common Law proposes to deliver, during the ensuing Educational Term, two courses (of six public lectures each) on the subjects undermentioned:—

Elementary Course.

I.—Subdivisions and matters within the cognisance of our common law.

II.—Remedies at law and how pursued.

III.—Rules, statutory and otherwise, which regulate the procedure and mode of proof in a court of law.

Advanced Course.

I.—Contract and tort considered, how they are allied to each other, and in what respects they are dissimilar.

II.—The procedure appropriate for recovering damages in respect of breach of contract or of tort.

III.—The rules of evidence ordinarily applied at Nisi Prius.

With his Private Classes the Reader will consider in detail the various subjects above set forth, and illustrate them by reported cases, using for reference the following books and treatises:—

Elementary Class.—"Broom's Commentaries on the Common Law" (5th edition); Bullen and Leake, "Precedents of Pleadings" (last edition).

Advanced Class.—The above books, and "Roscoe on Evidence at Nisi Prius."

LAW IN FORCE IN BRITISH INDIA.

The Reader on Hindu and Mahomedan law, and the laws in force in British India, proposes to deliver, in the ensuing Educational Term, a course of six public lectures on the following subjects, viz.:—

I.—Introductory lecture.

II.—Adoption.

III.—Alienation.

IV.—Contract.

With his Private Classes the Reader will discuss minutely and in detail the subjects embraced in his public lectures.

Table of the days and hours for the delivery of the public lectures by the Readers appointed by the Inns of Court, and for the attendance of the private classes.

NOTES.—The Educational Term commences on the 1st November, and ends on the 22nd December.

The first public lecture of this course will be delivered by the Reader on Hindu and Mahomedan Law, on Saturday, the 5th November, at 2 p.m.

The first meeting of each private class will take place on the usual morning or evening of meeting after the first public lecture on the same subject.

Students who have been unable to attend a lecture or class of either of the Readers, and desire dispensation as a qualification for call to the bar, should make application, with an explanation of the cause of such absence, in writing, to the Reader during the course, or immediately after the delivery of the last public lecture of the course; and the Reader's report thereon, together with the application, will be forwarded to the Council of Legal Education, who alone have the power of granting dispensation.

The Council have resolved that in no case shall students be allowed to change from the elementary to the advanced courses of lectures and classes, or vice versa, while qualifying for call to the bar, or for the examinations on the subjects of the lectures.

TAXED COSTS.—At the last quarterly meeting of the Halifax Town Council the town clerk gave a statement of the costs of the injunction obtained by the Messrs. Holdsworth against the corporation. The costs had been taxed, and the total sum to be paid by the corporation was £1,291 8s. 10d., as against £1,681 0s. 7d. disallowed. A resolution was passed for payment of the amount, and Mr. Alderman Hutchinson said the Corporation were greatly indebted to the Town Clerk (Mr. J. E. Norris) for the way in which he had fought the battle before the taxing master.

SENTENCES ON FRENCH CONSPIRATORS.—The High Court of Blois has delivered its verdict in the case of the individuals charged with conspiracy. Meggy was sentenced to 20 years' hard labour; Beaury to 20 years' imprisonment; Dupont, Fontaine, Sapia, and Gerin to 15 years' imprisonment; Potiean, Moilin, Godinot, and Pelerin to 6 years'; Greiner and Greffier to 15 years'; Ballot and Gronner to 5 years'; and Drenze to 3 years'. Verdier was acquitted, having given evidence for the Government. All the other prisoners were acquitted.

LOCAL TAXATION.

The following is the report issued by the Select Committee appointed to inquire and report whether it is expedient that the charges now locally imposed on the occupiers of rateable property should be divided between the owners and occupiers, and what changes in the constitution of the local bodies now administering rates should follow such division:—

"1. The committee, without pledging themselves to the view that all rates should be dealt with in the same manner, are of opinion—(a) that the existing system of local taxation, under which the exclusive charge of almost all rates leviable upon rateable property for current expenditure, as well as for new objects and permanent works, is placed by law upon the occupiers, while the owners are generally exempt from any direct or immediate contributions in respect of such rates, is contrary to sound policy; (b) that the evidence taken before your committee shows that in many cases the burden of the rates, which are directly paid by the occupier, falls ultimately, either in part or wholly, upon the owner, who, nevertheless, has no share in their administration; (c) that in any reform in the existing system of local taxation, it is expedient to adjust the system of rating in such a manner that both owners and occupiers may be brought to feel an immediate interest in the increase or decrease of local expenditure, and in the administration of local affairs; (d) that it is expedient to make owners as well as occupiers directly liable for a certain proportion of the rates; (e) that, subject to equitable arrangements as regards existing contracts, the rates should be collected, as at present, from the occupier (except in the case of small tenements, for which the landlord can now by law be rated), power being given to the occupier to deduct from his rent the proportion of the rates to which the owner may be made liable, and provision being made to render persons having superior or intermediate interests liable to proportionate deductions from the rents received by them, as in the case of the income-tax, with a like prohibition against agreements in contravention of the law.

"2. The committee have examined many witnesses, and received at their hands very conflicting opinions as regards the proportion in which the burden of rates at present falls relatively on owners and occupiers.

"3. That in the event of any division of rates between the owner and occupier, it is essential that such alterations should be made in the constitution of the bodies administering the rates as would secure a direct representation of the owners adequate to the immediate interest in local expenditure which they would thus have acquired.

"4. That justices of the peace should no longer act ex officio as members of any local board in which such direct representation of owners has been secured.

"5. That the great variety of rates levied by different authorities even in the same area on different assessments, with different deductions, and by different collectors, has produced great confusion and expense, and that in any change of the law as regards local taxation, uniformity and simplicity of assessment and collection, as well as economy of management, ought to be secured as far as possible.

"6. That the consolidation into one rate of all local rates collected within the same area is a matter of great importance, and that your committee concur in the resolution of the Select Committee on Poor Rates Assessment, 1868, which recommended one consolidated rate—viz., 'that a demand note should be left with each ratepayer on the rate being made, stating the amount of the requisitions, the rate in the pound for each purpose, and the period for which the rate is made, the rateable value of the premises, the amount of the rate thereon, and of each payment' of the instalments of the rates.

"7. That while it is necessary to make provision for limiting, as far as practicable, the disturbances of existing contracts, it would be, on many grounds, undesirable and almost impracticable to extend the exemption of property held under leases from the operation of the proposed changes until the expiration of such leases.

"8. That the exclusion of the owners of property held under long leases from the right of voting for local authorities, after the proposed changes had taken effect in respect of other property, would lead to much inconvenience and confusion; while, on the other hand, it would be inadmissible to allow them to vote unless they acquired an immediate interest in the rates.

"9. That the difficulties of the case would be equitably met by exempting the owners of property held under lease from the proposed division of rates for a period of three years, and by providing that after the expiration of that time the occupiers of such property should be entitled, equally with all other occupiers, to deduct from the rent the proportionate part of the rates to which the owner may become liable, power being given to the owner at the same time to add to his rent a sum equivalent to the like proportionate part of the rates, calculated on the average annual amount of the rates paid by the occupier during the three years above referred to.

"10. That by the terms of the reference to them, your committee were limited to the question of the division of the charges on rateable property between the owners and occupiers, and what changes in the constitution of local bodies administering rates should follow such division; and they have consequently been precluded from entering upon the inquiry of the relations of local and imperial taxation, and the nature of the property liable to the same.

"11. That your committee are of opinion that the inquiry on which they have been engaged forms only one branch of the general question of local taxation, and that other considerations, besides those which have been submitted to their investigation, should be previously taken into account in any general measure giving effect to the above recommendations."

RIVAL JURISDICTIONS IN THE CITY OF LONDON.

A short time since, Mr. Commissioner Kerr had to decide upon a case in which the plaintiff sought to recover expenses for his attendance as a witness on behalf of the defendant in the Lord Mayor's Court. The Commissioner made a cheap bid for public favour by declaring that he could be no friend to litigants who brought actions in the superior courts for the recovery of small amounts, since the Legislature had provided cheaper methods of disposing of such claims. In the present instance, he said, the defendant sued a person for £6 in the Lord Mayor's Court, and subpoenaed a number of witnesses, with the object, no doubt, of obtaining the enormous costs awarded in the higher courts. Such proceedings were disreputable, and reflected anything but credit on the attorneys at whose instigation such suits were brought into the Lord Mayor's and other superior courts.

Now, it just happens that Mr. Commissioner Kerr is himself to blame for the frequent resort of attorneys to the Lord Mayor's Court. When they go they are tolerably sure to obtain reasonable costs; when they go to Mr. Kerr's court they are tolerably sure to be refused reasonable costs. This is the way Mr. Kerr serves the public. He drives practice out of the cheap court, and then abuses the lawyers for going to the expensive court. Some eccentricities are amusing and harmless, others are vexatious and injurious. We very much fear that Mr. Commissioner Kerr's eccentricities belong to the latter category.

In the City of London Court there are two modes of procedure in use, severally known as the old and the new jurisdictions. It happens, as may well be supposed, that plaintiffs are frequently nonsuited because of their presentation of their claims in an informal manner; and it will not be doubted, we dare say, that the commissioner is sage and solemn on such occasions. A short time since he remarked that "in cases where the plaintiff resided or carried on business in any part of the City, and sued a defendant living or carrying on business within the jurisdiction of any of the metropolitan courts, the proceedings should be taken under a particular section of the Act of Parliament. Every plaintiff," observed his Honour, "was supposed to be acquainted with the thirty-eight volumes of statutes that the Legislature had passed regulating county courts' jurisdiction." This kind of comment on the condition of hapless suitors may be witty, but it is not kind. The man who has thrown away good money after bad, and lost valuable time in the operation, will not be consoled by being made the subject of a joke. If the commissioner has any sympathy with the plaintiffs who are not acquainted with the thirty-eight volumes of statutes he refers to, he can easily manifest it by insisting that when plaintiffs take out summonses they shall be politely told what sort of summons their case requires, and, if need be, the difference between old and new jurisdictions. The clerks of the court, we presume, know, at the time of granting summonses, what is the measure of their validity; and it is, at the least, discreditable that plaintiffs should be entangled in confusions which the Court itself might save them from, and then be made to furnish subjects for laughter when the commissioner happens to be in a jocular mood. If Mr. Commissioner Kerr's ability and stern integrity were only matched with kindly suavity and gentleness, the City would be fortunate in the dispensation of justice in the minor fields of litigation.—City Press.

THE EVIDENCE OF EXPERTS.

The system, as it now stands, of retaining experts, is much the same as retaining lawyers. Neither are under any obligation to devote their time, as is every eye-witness, to the party requiring their services. Both have knowledge, skill, and experience, which must be bought and paid for. It is in both cases their property, their capital, their means of earning an honest and honourable livelihood. A litigant, approaching the trial of a cause where expert testimony is required, secures the service of his experts much as he does his counsel. He takes their opinion, and if it is favourable to him (and what is most remarkable, it is almost universally favourable to him), the experts are almost, if not quite, as much in his employ as his counsel. Honourable men, whether of the legal or other professions, go only to a certain mark in identifying themselves with the interest of their clients. But the expert not infrequently goes farther than the lawyer. He is familiar with the preparation of the case; he is present at consultations; his own evidence is carefully prepared, and noted; his sympathies are enlisted; he acquires an honest belief in the justice of the side upon which he is called, and of the injustice of the other. Upon taking the stand, the counsel for his employer becomes his personal protector, that of the adversary his personal assailant; and the assailant of what are dearer to him, his favourite scientific theories. His opinions are turned and twisted, and subjected to a searching cross-examination. Perhaps covert imputations are cast upon his motives. He is unwilling to recognise the fact that he is to receive pay for his services. It seems to degrade him to acknowledge that anything but a love of truth induces him to testify; while, as a matter of fact, if truth only—or the reward of virtue, which the proverb gives—should be held out to him as an inducement to appear on the witness stand, he would decline to be a witness. Properly enough, too, for he has a right to be paid for his time and skill. In short, he is in a false position. He wishes to appear a judge. Circumstances have made him a partisan. No one can read the cross-examination of some of the experts without feeling keenly the defects of the present system. One of the witnesses, doubtless a fair-minded man, says, with a sort of shame (false it is thought), when pressed about the compensation that is honestly due him, that the "responsibilities of his situation forbid his giving his mind to it." The compensation of another witness has reached 1,000 dols. in one case, and 500 dols. in a second. But, throughout, the experts, when questioned, generally evade the question of pay, instead of frankly acknowledging that this is an element, and a legitimate element, in their services under the present system. As long as this lasts, the only true position for them to take is that of persons to whom a question of opinion has been presented, and who, having given a certain opinion, are retained by the parties in whose favour they have given it, to carefully prepare that opinion, with its reasons, and state it to the tribunal before which the case is tried, with as much freedom from prejudice in favour of their employers on other points of the case as poor human nature will permit of.—American Law Review.

AMERICAN LAW AFFECTING ENGLISH FIRE COMPANIES.

The following recent additions to the insurance laws of Massachusetts have especial reference to English Insurance Companies:—

FOREIGN FIRE COMPANIES.

Section 1.—It shall not be lawful for any insurance company or association, created by, or organised under, the laws of any foreign government, other than the laws of this Union, or for any partnership, association, firm or individual of such foreign government, or for any agent or agents of such foreign company, association, partnership, association, firm or individual, to make contracts of assurance, or expose such company, association, partnership, firm or individual to loss in this state, in any one risk or hazard to an amount exceeding ten per cent of the value of the securities deposited by such company, association, partnership, firm or individual, with the several insurance or other departments of the states of this Union, and ten per cent of the net assets in the hands of trustees residents in, and citizens of, any of the United States, subject at all times to the approval of the Insurance Commissioners of this state, for the general benefit and security of all policy-holders residing in the United States, which shall be immediately available for the payment of losses in this state. Nor shall it be lawful for any such foreign or other insurance company, association, partnership, firm or individual, directly or indirectly to contract for, or effect, any re-insurance of any risk on property in this state taken by such company, association, partnership, firm or individual with any insurance company, association, partnership, firm or individual not authorised to transact the business of insurance in this state, in accordance with the laws thereof.

Section 2.—All foreign insurance companies, associations, partnerships, firms, or individuals, whether incorporated or not, transacting the business of fire, marine, or life insurance, or any other kind of insurance in this state, shall make full annual statements of their condition and affairs to the insurance department, in the same manner, and in the same form, without erasure or addition (except necessary explanation), and subject to the same liabilities as similar companies or associations organised under the laws of this state.

Section 3.—In case of neglect or refusal to make such annual statements, as provided in the preceding section, all persons acting in this state as agents, or otherwise, in transacting the business of insurance for said companies, associations, partnerships, firms, or individuals, shall be subject to the same penalties provided by law in case of the failure of any insurance company or association organised under the laws of this state, to make an annual statement as now required by law.

Section 4.—Any violation of the provisions of this Act shall subject the party guilty of such violation to a penalty of 500 dols. for each violation, to be sued for and recovered in the manner provided for the prosecution and recovery of penalties prescribed by the insurance laws of this state.

GRAND JURIES.

Many lawyers of late years have been in the habit of speaking of the grand jury with scant respect, as a cumbersome and useless institution. Not so Mr. Justice Hargest. In his charge to the grand jury of Shenandoah county, on March 30, 1867, he thus speaks:—

"While the elements of nature, guided by wisdom's perfected hand, have been busy tearing down and building up the vast domain of nature's gallery, restless man has plied his constructive and destructive ingenuity in rearing up fabrics of governmental policy and institutions, that he might upturn and destroy them, bespattering the ruins continually with the blood of his fellows. Proud cities have been built, great works, monuments of skill and learning, embodied in the elegant drapery of art, which, for a time, dazzled the eyes of the builder, with the result, in the end, of only begetting his hate or piquing his fancy, then to fall, and find itself the subject of history or of song.

"The majority of the scintillating governmental ideas of the past six hundred years are gone. They fell victims, in all their momentous beauty and power, to the great upheavals of ever-changing popular sentiment and will. But amid all these changes, one institution of the now far-off twelfth century yet remains, and is to-day, as then, the great bulwark of liberty, and the embodiment of personal security; affording to the weak protection; staying the hand and heart bent on the ruin of peace and safety; guaranteeing to every citizen his or her legal and constitutional rights, and setting up a Gibraltar on every hearthstone; reaching out to every hamlet the strong arm of protection and liberty. Need I say I refer to the grand jury? I think it would be safe to say that no single institution in the history of the world has worked out so much good for society as this one; maintaining through all conflicts and subversions its integrity, and securing for itself the commendation of the people, gathering strength and confidence as it accumulated years, garnishing its utility at every step, until, to-day it stands firm and steadfast, respected, admired, honoured, wherever Christianity has secured recognition and touched the human heart with the magic of its divine errand."—American Law Review.

THE NEGRO AHEAD OF THE WOMAN.

The woman, in the race to obtain the legal right of practice law in Illinois, has been distanced by the negro.

Our readers will remember that Richard A. Dawson, a coloured man, and Mrs. Ada H. Kepley, both, after passing a creditable examination, graduated from the law department of the university of Chicago about two weeks since, and received the degree of LL.B. The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States and the Civil Rights Bill have opened the door of the legal temple in Illinois for the admission of the coloured man, and we rejoice at it.

Our Supreme Court, composed of such distinguished jurists as Judges Lawrence, Breese and Walker, have bid him enter upon an equality with white males.

Mr. Dawson has received his licence to practice law, dated on the eighth of the present month, signed by all the judges. He has taken the oath of office, and is now an attorney of the Supreme Court. He is about to open an office in our city, for the purpose of practising his profession. Mrs. Kepley, equally well qualified, has failed to get her licence because she is a woman, and gone home to watch and wait the magic of events. How long shall she wait? All she asks is that clients may have the same right to employ her to attend to legal business that they have the coloured attorney. He may sue and recover for his fees. If she receives ten dollars for drawing legal papers, the person who pays it, under our present law, may sue and recover thirty dollars from her for daring to act in a profession without a licence, which she had no power to obtain. Is she honest? is she capable? Then why not let her have a chance to show, by actual trial, whether she can succeed at the bar. There is no statute which prohibits her being admitted. In Iowa and Missouri women are admitted upon the same terms as men. The Supreme Court of Illinois is, we believe, the only Court that ever refused to admit a woman, on the ground that she was a woman.—Chicago Legal News.

The Lord Chancellor, at the instance of the judges of the Liverpool County Court, has sanctioned the appointment of a second registrar of that court.

Mr. Edward Smirke, barrister-at-law, late Vice-Warden of the Stannaries Court of Cornwall and Devon, is to receive the honour of knighthood.

Messrs. Whites, Renard & Floyd, are the London solicitors or agents to the petition against the return of Mr. Tillett, M.P. for Norwich; and Messrs. Emerson & Sparrow, solicitors, of Norwich, are acting locally on their behalf.

It is stated that the Attorney-General will prosecute in the Brixton baby-farming case, which will be tried next week at the Central Criminal Court. The judges on the rota are Mr. Baron Martin, Mr. Justice Montague Smith, and Mr. Justice Brett.

Mr. J. E. Davis, late stipendiary magistrate of the Staffordshire Potteries, has been presented with a handsome piece of plate, of the value of £100, "by the Lord-Lieutenant of the county, his brother magistrates, and a few other friends, in testimony of their high appreciation of his public services and private worth." As Mr. Davis refused any gift of money, a part of the subscription was invested in the purchase of a desert service for Mrs. Davis, and the balance was placed at his disposal, to be invested for the purpose of providing prizes for the encouragement of students at the district schools of art.

INDIA.—A bill has been laid before the Viceroy's Council to amend the Penal Code by providing punishment for sedition. The Bengal Chamber of Commerce is urging the Government to reduce the income tax in October, in consequence of the depression of trade.

THE LABOUR OF THE PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.—In the session, which commenced on the 8th February, and ended on the 10th August instant, the number of public Acts passed was 112, and 172 local Acts, besides four private statutes.

THE NEUTRALITY QUESTION.—A special meeting of the Newcastle and Gateshead Chamber of Commerce was held on Wednesday in the Mayor's parlour at the Guildhall, Newcastle-on-Tyne, to consider England's duty as a neutral power. Mr. C. Alhusen occupied the chair. A series of resolutions were proposed, approving a neutral policy, but the following amendment was ultimately carried by 15 to 8:—"That this Chamber feels perfectly satisfied with the course which the Government has taken with regard to the position of England during the present war, and does not think it advisable to adopt any resolution on the subject." It was denied most positively by the president that shipowners had agreed to carry Newcastle coals to the French fleet.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The effect of the outbreak of war, and of the panic arising from the collapse of so many speculative accounts upon securities is steadily passing away. The course of events seeming to point to a rapid termination of the war has operated in the same direction. The result has been a great increase in the firmness, with a decided upward tendency in all securities. Shares of the Havre Railways and similar investments have improved to a very decided extent.

The Bank rate was reduced on Thursday from six per cent., at which it had stood since the previous week, to five and a-half per cent. The supply of money is fairly abundant.

THE COMMON LAW VACATION.—On Wednesday the common law vacation commenced. It is between the "10th of August and the 24th of October," while the Chancery vacation is from the 10th of August to the 28th of October, both days inclusive.

BANKRUPTCY OF MR. GRENVILLE MURRAY.—Adjudication of bankruptcy was, on Thursday, made against Mr. E. C. Grenville Murray, whose name will be remembered in connection with the proceedings which he last year took against Lord Carington for assault. The petitioning creditor is the printer of the Queen's Messenger, which was lately edited by Mr. Murray.

THE LATE LORD HENRY SEYMOUR AND THE LONDON CHARITIES.—As already stated in the Times, by an order of Mr. Marshall, the Chief Clerk at the Rolls Chambers in the case of Wallace v. Attorney-General, eighty-five London charities recently received £82 each, making £482 a-piece, under the will of the late Lord Henry Seymour, who died at Paris, and who left large sums to the "hospices" of both London and Paris. A further sum to the charities of London will shortly be paid. A meeting of the solicitors of the eighty-five London charities has just been held, and a statement was laid before the meeting by Mr. Greatorex, the solicitor in the cause, showing that, in addition to the two sums paid, amounting to £482, to each of the various "London hospices," there remained a sufficiency of stock in the Accountant-General's name as, with the balance now claimed to be received from the French administrator, would amount to £15,432. That sum would yield a further division of about £160 to each of the eighty-five London charities, and leave a reserve for contingencies. It was resolved by the meeting that Mr. Groatorex should proceed at the earliest opportunity to Paris to adjust accounts with the notary administrateur, so as to distribute the fund, which will, with the sums paid, amount to £642 to each of the eighty-five "hospices" under his Lordship's will.—Times.

THE TOWN CLERKSHIP OF NOTTINGHAM.—The following solicitors were candidates for the office of Town Clerk of Nottingham and Clerk to the Local Board of Health:—Mr. T. Andrews, Manchester; Mr. G. H. Barton, London; Mr. Bennett, London; Mr. Hugh Brown, Nottingham; Mr. A. Cann, Nottingham; Mr. H. T. Chambers, Lincoln; Mr. M. Corbet, Kidderminster; Mr. Hughes, Worcester; Mr. S. G. Johnson, Town Clerk, Faversham (successful); Mr. Alfred Kent, Norwich; Mr. McKenzie, War Office, London; Mr. F. Moore, late Deputy Town Clerk, Tewkesbury; Mr. S. A. Orton, Manchester; Mr. Paull, Plymouth; Mr. E. C. Peele, Town Clerk, Shrewsbury; Mr. Penley, London; Mr. Preston, Nottingham; Mr. Shelton, Nottingham; Mr. Sword, London; Mr. Trow, Cleobury Mortimer; and Mr. Walton, Town Clerk, Southport.

THE TOWN CLERKSHIP OF OLDHAM.—At the end of the year 1869, Mr. John Ponsonby, town clerk of Oldham, Lancashire, intimated to the corporation his intention of resigning office. Mr. Ponsonby, in accordance with a request of the town council, agreed to retain the office until the Local Waterworks Bill had passed through Parliament; and as soon as the promoters had succeeded in carrying that measure, the subject of the town clerkship was taken into consideration. It was resolved, in the first place—"That the salary of the future town clerk and attorney and solicitor to the corporation of Oldham should be £800 per annum—this sum to include all costs and charges heretofore paid by the corporation for work performed by the town clerk, their attorney and solicitor, but exclusive of all costs out of pocket; the town clerk to provide office accommodation and clerks." Following this was a resolution appointing a deputation to request Mr. Ponsonby to retain the town clerkship of the borough; and this having resulted in Mr. Ponsonby's compliance with the wishes of the town council, he has been re-appointed to the office at the salary stated above.

SALARIES OF THE UNITED STATES JUDGES.—It is much to be regretted that there is no immediate prospect of an increase in the salaries of the United States judiciary. The amendment to the appropriation bill offered in the Senate, raising the salaries of the entire body of the federal judges has not received the concurrence of the House of Representatives. The large majority against the amendment precludes all hope of a compromise at the present session, and those over-worked and under-paid officers are to continue upon their present salaries. It is simply disgraceful, that while the compensation of members of Congress and of all classes of Government employees has been repeatedly increased within the last decade, the most responsible judicial offices in the world should be coupled with salaries so inadequate as to offer a serious bar to lawyers of the first ability in accepting them.

LONDON, AUGUST 20, 1870.

WHETHER IT BE DESIRABLE that the man who fills the laborious and responsible position of Attorney-General should at the same time accept the Recordership of Bristol we do not propose to discuss. Such a combination of offices must strike everyone at the first glance as a little incongruous, to say the least of it, and to many it will seem odd that the Recordership of Bristol should stand on a different footing in this respect from all other recorderships. This latter point is, however, soon explained. Recorderships are generally of two classes; either the duties of the office are very heavy and the salary proportionately large, as in the case of London and Liverpool; or the work is light and the salary light also. The Recorder of Bristol is in the pleasant position of having "little to do and plenty to get." Hence the attraction which the office has had for Attorney-Generals. As to the propriety of an Attorney-General accepting such a post, much must depend on circumstances. One man may be able to get through more work than another; one man may have a larger private practice to attend to than another. We have ourselves a strong prejudice against pluralists, and the question will occur to most minds whether, if the duties of the recordership be so light that one of the hardest-worked officials in England can efficiently discharge them in his spare hours, the large salary attached to the office is not needlessly large. But, at any rate, Sir Robert Collier made up his mind to accept the recordership of Bristol upon its lately falling vacant. There were eminent precedents in favour of the course he took, and we do not blame him for taking it. We are bound to assume at any rate that before acting he fully weighed all the circumstances of the case, and arrived at the deliberate conclusion that the two offices were such as he might properly and usefully combine.

But about the mode in which the Attorney-General has resigned the office there can hardly be two opinions. Having to offer himself for re-election for the borough of Plymouth, in consequence of his acceptance of the recordership, he found out that some of his constituents, for reasons which it is easier to understand than logically to justify, objected to his having taken the office; and he thereupon condescended to be re-elected on the terms that he should resign the office. We do not remember another instance of a public man submitting to such humiliation at the hands of his constituents as the Attorney-General has done in this instance. It is unfortunate that the example should have been set by the first law officer of the Crown. There have been many among Sir Robert Collier's predecessors in office, and we trust there will be many among his successors, who would rather lose their seat ten times over than swallow the leek in this fashion.

One result of the incident may we think safely be predicted, that no Attorney-General will for the future accept the recordership of Bristol. And so much the better.

THE JOINT STOCK COMPANIES ARRANGEMENT ACT which we discussed on the second reading (ante p. 707), is now law. It received a slight amendment in committee. The Act applies only to compromises between a company in liquidation and its creditors, or any class of its creditors. The bill, as introduced, applied also to compromises between a company in liquidation and its shareholders, or any class of its shareholders. Two things are noticeable in the Act—first, it applies to voluntary windings up as well as to windings up by or under the supervision of the Court; secondly, a compromise under the Act binds not the liquidators and contributories of the company, but only those creditors between whom and the company the compromise is made. Therefore if a compromise proposed between a company and its specialty creditors, and assented to by three-fourths of such creditors in the statutable manner, is sanctioned by the Court, it will bind all the specialty creditors of the company, but not the simple contract creditors.

WE ARE INFORMED that on Tuesday an application was made to Mr. Justice Byles, at his private residence, 3, Princes gardens, by Mr. Rodwell, Q.C. (Mr. F. A. Knight with him), to strike out certain paragraphs from the Norwich Election Petition, upon the ground that, if allowed to remain, they would subject Mr. Tillet, the sitting member, to be again harassed for an offence, of which Mr. Baron Martin, in 1868, reported that he believed Mr. Tillet innocent. Mr. Griffiths appeared for the petitioner. His Lordship reserved his judgment, but expressed his willingness, in deference to the wish of Mr. O'Malley, to postpone the inquiry from the 6th to the 13th of September.

A LARGE SECTION OF THE PUBLIC will possibly have conceived the notion that, during what is known as the Long Vacation, all legal business is arrested. A glance, however, at the law notices of yesterday will at once disabuse the mind of any such idea. In the chambers of the vacation judge, Vice-Chancellor Bacon, there were no less than eighty-five summonses before the chief clerks; and when it is borne in mind that, upon each, at least two solicitors, or their representatives appear, it will at once be apprehended that to those who have to adjudicate upon vacation business, their appointments are no sinecure.

WE PRINT THIS WEEK a report of a case in the Lambeth County Court, which will be read, we think, with some surprise. The action was for money lent, the loan being evidenced by an I.O.U. The plaintiff swore that the defendant had signed the I.O.U. The defendant swore not only that he had not signed it, but that he could not write. The question was, which spoke the truth, and which was committing perjury. Now surely if ever there was a case which ought to be sifted to the bottom this was it. Accordingly an adjournment for the production of further evidence was asked for on one side, and assented to on the other. But the learned gentleman who sat as deputy for the judge refused the adjournment, and decided on the spot for the plaintiff, on the ground that if the plaintiff were not speaking the truth he must have been guilty of forgery as well as perjury, and "it was more reasonable to believe that the defendant had committed one crime than that the plaintiff had committed two." Any judge who thus treats crime with levity, and deals with perjury and forgery as matters not worthy of serious investigation, does what in him lies to lower the character and credit of his court, and demoralise those who have recourse to it.

VISCOUNT MONCK, G.C.M.G., the Right Hon. G. A. Hamilton, and Mr. W. R. Le Fanu, C.E., have been appointed her Majesty's Commissioners to inquire into and report upon the total amount of the sums received by the Honourable Society of King's-inns, Dublin, upon the admission of attorneys and solicitors as deposits for chambers, and in what manner the same or any part thereof has been applied or disposed of, and whether any (and what) portion of the amount remains unappropriated to the purposes for which it was received, and whether the Incorporated Society of Attorneys and Solicitors of Ireland are in possession of suitable buildings for the accommodation of that branch of the profession of which they are the governing body.

THE DECISION IN THE MORDAUNT CASE.

We have already several times briefly noticed this case (ante 349, 525, and 622) and we now propose to examine the grounds of the decision of the full court. The suit was for a dissolution of marriage on the ground of the respondent's adultery. After the commencement of the suit it was alleged that the respondent was insane on the day on which the citation in the case was served upon her. The respondent's father was appointed her guardian ad litem for the purpose of establishing the alleged insanity. A jury found that the respondent was insane when the citation was served upon her; and it was admitted that at the time of these proceedings she was insane. No question was raised as to the state of her mind previous to the service of the citation. Lord Penzance then made an order that "no further proceedings in the suit should be taken until the respondent should recover her mental capacity." The petitioner appealed against this order. It was admitted that there was only one case (Banden v. Banden, 10 W. R. 292) precisely in point, and also that this case directly supported the order of Lord Penzance as it decided that a suit for dissolution of marriage could not be prosecuted against a lunatic respondent. It has, however, been held that a lunatic can sue for nullity of marriage (Earl of Portsmouth v. Countess of Portsmouth, 1 Hagg. Eccl. 333; Hancock v. Peaty, 15 W. R. 719), or for a divorce a mensâ et thoro (Parnell v. Parnell, 2 Hagg. Const. 169).

Judicial separation under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85 (Woodgate v. Taylor, 30 L. J. P. M. & D. 197). A minor can sue for a divorce a mensâ et thoro (Barham v. Barham, 1 Hagg. Const. 5, and Morgan v. Morgan, 2 Const. 679), and a minor can be made a respondent in such a suit (Beauraine v. Beauraine, 1 Hagg. Const. 498). In an American case (Mansfield v. Mansfield, 13 Mass. 412) it had been held that a suit for a divorce a vinculo may be maintained against a lunatic husband. These authorities were all cited in the arguments in Mordaunt v. Mordaunt. The Court, consisting of Kelly, C.B., Lord Penzance, and Keating, J., delivered separate judgments.

Keating, J., was of opinion that the lunacy of the respondent was a bar to the suit, and that the order should be affirmed—(1) on the analogy of criminal suits; (2) on the construction of the Divorce Act, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. He says:—"The nature of the offence charged seems to me to distinguish the proceedings in divorce essentially from those of a merely civil character. The proceeding for a divorce for cause of adultery, although not strictly a criminal proceeding, is at least a proceeding quasi in pœnam, and ought to afford similar protection to the parties accused." As, therefore, a criminal who becomes insane after the commission of a crime cannot be tried, Keating, J., thought that a wife who became insane after having committed adultery ought not to be divorced. The second ground of the judgment of Keating, J., depended upon a close examination of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. A husband is prima facie entitled to a divorce if his wife commits adultery, but the Court is not bound to grant a decree if the petitioner has been accessory to the adultery, or has condoned it, or is in collusion with the respondent, or has himself committed adultery, or has been guilty of unreasonable delay, cruelty, desertion, or wilful neglect conducing to the adultery. After noticing the sections of the statute containing the above provisions, Keating, J., goes on:—"It appears to me to be impossible to apply these provisions of the statute in the manner contemplated by the Legislature when one of the parties is insane. The Court cannot pronounce a decree of divorce unless satisfied, after inquiry, which it is bound to make, that none of the statutable impediments exist. Yet the existence of these impediments, or of most of them, is peculiarly and often exclusively within the knowledge of the parties themselves." He then notices Woodgate v. Taylor, and suggests that there may be a distinction between a suit for divorce and for judicial separation, or that even a judicial separation could not be obtained against a lunatic. The judgment concludes with a somewhat singular sentence, which seems to invite a repetition of that old scandal of the law, private legislation: "The facts of this case are not before us, but should it, upon those facts, in consequence of any peculiar hardship, be deemed one fit for legislation, of course there is nothing to prevent it."

Lord Penzance agreed with Keating, J., and based his judgment on the wording of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, in much the same way as Keating, J., did. Lord Penzance, however, before examining the statute, throws out a suggestion that a divorce is not in any case a matter of right, but should be regarded rather in the light of a special favour. "It appears to me that the new remedies under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, like those of a more limited character accorded by the ecclesiastical Courts, were granted, if I may use the expression, rather ex gratiâ than ex debito justitiæ." The statute therefore did not intend to affirm that adultery of the wife at once conferred upon the husband an immediate though defeasible right to have his contract of marriage dissolved. He then goes on to show that there is no mention of lunatics in the Act. "I ask myself the broad question whether, looking at the substance rather than the form of these remedies, they were intended for lunatic petitioners as well as lunatic respondents; for there is no distinction made in the Act, the words throughout are quite general, and there is no middle-ground between the two opposite opinions that these words include lunatics or exclude them altogether." Lord Penzance does not mention the case of judicial separation, nor does he or Keating, J., discuss the authorities which had been cited in argument.

Kelly, C.B., thought that the order could not be sustained. He first examines the authorities, which we need not notice again, as we have already stated the point decided by each case. He then argues that, as the statute uses words which would include lunatics, the Court has no authority to exclude them, as there is no general principle by which lunatics are excluded from legal proceedings, and points out that the statute requires that, on proof of adultery of wife, except in specified cases, the Court "shall pronounce the decree;" therefore that a petitioner has a right to such decree, which cannot be regarded as a mere favour. Lastly, Kelly, C.B., expresses a strong opinion that "there is no analogy whatever in a suit of this nature to an indictment for an offence against the criminal law; indeed, in every act, step, and stage of the cause the analogy to a civil suit is perfect, while to an indictment for a criminal offence it altogether fails."

The judgment also touched upon the question as to the rights of the co-respondents in the suit.

On perusal of these judgments we think most persons will agree that that of Kelly, C.B., is the most convincing. The Divorce Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85) contains no mention of lunatics, but uses words which in their ordinary signification would include lunatics. Lunatics are not generally exempt from legal proceedings. Lord Penzance admits all this, and says, in effect, "nevertheless I hold that the Act does not include lunatics." Keating, J., is more logical in form than Lord Penzance, for he first strives to show that a respondent in a suit for divorce is in the position of a person indicted for a crime, and then he claims from the respondent the protection given by the criminal law. In reality, however, there is no analogy between suits for divorce and criminal proceedings. The primary object of criminal proceedings is the punishment of the criminal. No doubt the old books give as a reason for not proceeding criminally against a lunatic that he cannot defend himself (4 Bla. Com. 24, 1 Hall P. C. 34). There is, however, a much stronger reason for this rule, viz., that if the offence were proved in the most conclusive way to have been committed under circumstances that would not admit of any possible legal defence, the prisoner could not be punished, because to punish a lunatic "can be no example to others" (Coke 3 Inst. 6), which is the ultimate object of all punishment inflicted by criminal law. If lunatics were punished in the same way as sane persons, there is no reason why they should not be tried after the appointment of a committee or other persons to defend their interests. A trial is, however, of no use as they are not to be punished. This consideration, in addition to those stated by Kelly, C.B., shows conclusively that the reasons which forbid the trial of a lunatic accused of a crime, do not apply in a suit for divorce against a lunatic respondent. The object of a suit for a divorce being the relief of the petitioner, not any punishment of the respondent. This being so, there is no rule of law to exclude lunatics from the operation of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, and it is contrary to all rules of construction to hold that they are excluded merely because the Court thinks that it would be better that the statute should not apply to them. Yet this is the effect of the judgments of Lord Penzance and Keating, J., and in thus holding they have acted as legislators rather than as judges, whose duty it is simply to declare the law. It is to be noticed that the principle of the judgments of the majority of the Court appears to apply to all suits under the statute, and indeed, Lord Penzance almost says so in so many words. If so, lunatics cannot be petitioners or respondents in suits for judicial separation or for nullity of marriage any more than in suits for divorce. Yet this is quite contrary to many decisions, and may lead to most absurd results. For instance, section 21 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, entitles a married woman to protection for her property and earnings if deserted by her husband. Is it possible that this section is not to apply to a lunatic wife who has property and has been deserted by her husband? And if lunatics are not altogether excluded from the statute what line is to be drawn? What proceedings may they take, and what proceedings may be taken against them? The necessity to draw such a line will be among the many and awkward results of this judicial legislation, unless the decision should be reversed on appeal. We believe the case is likely to be carried before the House of Lords, and we doubt not that there it will receive the careful consideration which it deserves.

ON THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF TRUSTEES.

The rule that principals are responsible for the acts or omissions of their agents allows of no exception where the principal is a trustee. Startling cases occur from time to time, which remind trustees that they hold an office which is necessarily unprofitable, usually thankless, and occasionally ruinous, to the holder. Lord Northington's remark in Harden v. Parsons (1 Eden, 148) "No man can require, or with reason expect, that a trustee should manage another's property with the same care and discretion that he would his own" has never failed, as often as mentioned, to elicit strong marks of disapprobation (Lewin on Trusts, p. 242). The trustee, is on the contrary, bound to take the same care of the trust property as a prudent man would of his own (Massey v. Banner, 1 Jac. & W. 247), and as he is responsible for acts of negligence on his own part, so he is responsible for the acts of agents employed by him in relation to the trust property, although he may have had no means of judging of their competency, or reason to suspect them of incompetency. The recent case of Hopgood v. Parkin (18 W. R. 908), which has attracted a good deal of attention, affords a crucial instance of how perils environ trustees. The case was shortly this. The trustees of a marriage settlement advanced £12,000 of the trust fund on real security, under a power enabling them in that behalf. Two years afterwards the mortgage was paid off, and the legal estate reconveyed. Shortly afterwards the trustees of another marriage settlement advanced £13,000 on the security of the same, or nearly the same, estate, and their solicitor, who had acted for the former trustees, required no fresh abstract, and made no inquiries as to incumbrances, but accepted the abstract made for the purpose of the former mortgage. It afterwards turned out that the solicitor for the mortgagor, Mr. John Charles Williams, of the firm of Goodwin, Partridge, & Williams, of unfortunate notoriety, had carefully concealed the fact that in the interval between the old mortgage being paid off, and the new created, the estate had been seriously incumbered. Loss thus resulted to the trust estate, occasioned, in the opinion of the Master of the Rolls, by a want of that caution and vigilance which is to be expected from, and which is usually displayed by, a solicitor on behalf of his client, and this loss the surviving trustee and the executor of the deceased trustee were, by the decree in the suit of Hopgood v. Parkin, compelled to make good.

It is important to observe, in the first instance, that the foregoing decision proceeded solely upon the negligence of the solicitor in omitting to inquire after incumbrances, or to require the delivery of a fresh abstract. There was no suggestion of anything beyond negligence on his part, or what may be better described as misplaced confidence in a man who turned out to be unworthy of it. If he had inquired after incumbrances, or required a fresh abstract, and Mr. Williams had, as the Master of the Rolls observed, deceived him, either by the assertion of what was false, or the suppression of what was true, it might have altered the case, and the liability of the trustees.

In a case of Ingle v. Partridge (34 Beav. 411), arising out of the same transaction, the trustee had advanced £8,000 on the security of an estate, valued, by the mortgagor's valuer, at £12,684, but last let for £242 11s. per annum only. The security turned out deficient, and the trustee was held liable for the loss, on the ground that a trustee cannot with propriety lend trust-money upon the footing of a valuation made in the mortgagor's interest, but is in all cases bound to satisfy himself from independent testimony of the value of the security offered; whereas the trustee had not only not done so in that instance, but had also, judging by the rental, transgressed the rule laid down in Stickney v. Senell (1 My. & Cr. 8), and elsewhere, that a trustee ought not to advance more than two-thirds of the value, even upon freehold land.

These cases involve in general the further question whether, where trustees have been defrauded, and by reason of the fraud, part of the trust estate is lost, the loss is to fall upon them, or upon their cestui que trust. That depends upon whether the fraud could or could not have been averted by a reasonable and proper exercise of foresight or judgment on the part of the trustees or their agents. "I do not know," said Lord Hardwicke in Jones v. Lewis (2 Ves. Sen. 240), "that a bailee, executor, administrator, or trustee, are bound to keep goods always in their own hands. They are to keep them as their own, and take the same care; if, therefore, a man lodged trust-money with a banker, if lost, in many cases the Court has discharged the trustee, especially if lost out of the banker's hands by robbery." The question of what degree of negligence must be established against a gratuitous bailee was considered in Lord Holt's celebrated judgment in Coggs v. Bernard (1 Lord Raym. 909), and was, it will be remembered, discussed by Lord Chelmsford in the recent case of Giblin v. McMullen, before the Judicial Committee (17 W. R. 445), to which we refer the reader.

In Eaves v. Hickson (10 W. R. 29, 30 Beav. 136)

trustees who paid over the trust-fund to the wrong persons, in reliance on a marriage certificate, which turned out to be a forgery, were made responsible for so much of the trust-fund as could not be recovered from the parties who had wrongfully received it. The ratio decidendi was, that the trustees were bound to pay the money to the right persons, and had not done so. That they had not done so was by reason of a fraud, which, it may be assumed for the present purpose, they could not have detected; but, as they had not fulfilled the trust, which was to pay the money to the right persons, they were compellable to make the deficiency good. It will be seen that the decree went to compel the persons who had wrongfully received the money to make it good, and in default, their father, who delivered the forged certificate; the ultimate deficiency, if any, to be made good by the trustees, instead of falling on the cestui que trust.

There is a distinction which must be borne in mind as to the incidence of losses occasioned by fraud, between those cases where the loss is occasioned by the fraud of third parties and those cases where the agent employed by the trustee is in fault. In Bostock v. Floyer (14 W. R. 120, L. R. 1 Eq. 26) the loss of a trust fund was caused by the fraudulent act of a solicitor employed by the trustee to invest the trust-money. No laches whatever seems to be imputable to the trustee, but he had himself chosen and employed the solicitor, and, as the Master of the Rolls put it, it was just the case of a man employing a servant to do an act, and the servant deceiving him. On the trustee, therefore, and not on the trust fund, the loss was thrown. Cases like those suggested in Jones v. Lewis (ubi sup.), where the loss is occasioned by vis major, such as robbery, are clearly distinguishable from those where the loss is occasioned by the act of some person whom the trustee has chosen proprio moto to employ, committed in the ordinary course of his employment. Where one of two innocent persons must suffer for the fraud of a third person, the loss must fall upon the one who employed the guilty party.

In an old case which bears somewhat upon Eaves v. Hickson, a broker who held a power of attorney to receive the dividend on stock in a company, forged a power to sell the stock, and a sale was effected, and it was held that the company, and not the innocent transferee, must bear the loss; for a trustee must see to the reality of the authority enabling him to dispose of his money; and if a transfer be made without the authority of the owner the act is a nullity, and in consideration of law and equity the rights remain as before (Ashley v. Blackwell, 2 Eden, 299). Of this class of cases the latest instance is Johnston v. Renton (18 W. R. 284).

To recur to the case on which we remarked at the outset, namely Hopgood v. Parkin, it will be seen that the ratio decidendi was simply the application of the maxim Qui facit per alium, facit per se. "I use the expression, they do this," said the Master of the Rolls, "because it is exactly the same if it be done by the trustees themselves personally, or by an incompetent or negligent agent. Where, however, one of two innocent parties must bear a loss, it is right that the trustee, whose negligence, or the negligence of whose agent occasioned the loss, should bear it rather than the cestui que trust who has done nothing, but remained passive.

The late Mr. John Ivatt Briscoe, M.P. for West Surrey, who died on the 16th of August, on leaving the University of Oxford, about the year 1815, entered as a student at Lincoln's-inn, but was not called to the bar.

Sir R. P. Collier, Attorney-General, was re-elected for Plymouth on the 15th August, without opposition, the new election being rendered necessary by his acceptance of the recordership of Bristol. In returning thanks he said that as some portion of his constituents entertained objections to his holding the office of Recorder of Bristol, he had determined to relinquish it; but he reminded his hearers that in 1854 the office was accepted by Sir A. Cockburn when Attorney-General, and that no one thought of finding fault with him for doing so.

RECENT DECISIONS.

COMMON LAW.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—LIABILITY OF AGENT AS PRINCIPAL—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT BY AGENT.

Paice v. Walker, Ex., 18 W. R. 789.

Not long ago (ante 732) we noticed the case of Fairlie v. Fenton (18 W. R. 700), where it was held that a broker selling cotton by bought and sold notes, which mentioned his principal's name in the usual way, and which were signed by him as "broker," could not maintain an action upon the contract in his own name. The principle of the decision being that when it appears that a contract is between two disclosed principals, they alone can sue and be sued on the contract, although made by an agent, unless it appear from the contract that the agent intended to render himself also liable. The signature here being expressly as "broker," the contract was construed as showing that there was no intention that the plaintiff should sue or be sued on the contract. Paice v. Walker may usefully be compared with Fairlie v. Fenton, as it illustrates well the way in which these rules, which fix the liability of principal and agent respectively, are applied. In Paice v. Walker the defendants signed a contract without qualifying their signature in any way. Of course, if the facts had rested there, the defendants would have been liable as principals, whether they were in fact principals or agents. In the body of the contract, however, they described themselves as "agents for J. S. & Co., of Danzig." The question was, whether by this description of themselves the defendants excluded any personal liability upon the contract. It was decided that the defendants had not excluded their personal liability on the ground that "when a man signs a contract in his own name he is prima facie to be deemed a contracting party, and there must be something very strong upon the face of the instrument to prevent that liability from attaching to him." Although the learned judges agreed in their decision there was on one point a difference as to the principle on which that decision was founded. Kelly, C.B., says, "I place no reliance on the fact that the defendants were the agents for a foreign firm." Martin, B., does not refer to the point. Pigott B., says, "It is clear that the circumstance that the person on whose behalf the contract is made is a foreigner may be looked at; but the fact that the defendants in this case are Englishmen, whilst their principals are foreigners, makes against the defendants in my opinion." Cleasby, B., says, "I attach great importance to the fact that the persons for whom the defendants acted as agents were foreigners." The defendant, in the agreement now before us, says "that he, as agent for J. S. & Co., of Danzig, contracts," &c., but the circumstance that he has named other persons as his principals has no effect, because the persons so named by him reside beyond the seas." There is, therefore, an expression of their different opinions upon the legal effect of the fact that the principals were resident abroad. This is thought, by one learned judge, of no importance; by another, of some importance; and by the third, of decisive importance. This difference of opinion was not of any consequence in this particular case, but it is unfortunate that such a difference should exist. Similar questions have frequently arisen before, and the result of the cases is thus stated in the notes to Thompson v. Davenport (2 Sm. L. C. 6th ed. 359). "Authorities have been relied upon as showing that a party contract expressly as agent, but for a foreign principal, he is himself in law the principal. It is conceived, however, that there is no difference, in point of law, between the case of an agent, contracting on behalf of an English or of a foreign principal. In each case it is a question as to the intention of the parties to be collected from the facts, and the circumstance of the principal being foreign may be sometimes considered as of great weight in the determination of that question." This seems on principle the most correct view of the law on this question, and Paice v. Walker taken altogether is neither in favour of nor against this view. There is no doubt that at present there is considerable difficulty in reconciling all the decisions on the question of the personal liability of agents who sign contracts in their own names. It would be always safest for agents to sign their contracts not in their own names but in the names of their principals "by So-and-so their agents," or if they sign their own names then they should state that they sign "by procuration." By signing in either of these forms the agent will always be safe, which can hardly be said of any other form of signature.

MASTER AND SERVANT—RAILWAY COMPANY—LIABILITY FOR ARREST BY SERVANT.

Edwards v. London and North Western Railway Company, P.C., 18 W. R. 834.

In the enormous number of actions of all sorts in which railway companies are necessarily engaged, no branch of law is more frequently referred to than that which regulates the liability of masters for the acts of their servants. This liability depends upon a somewhat peculiar principle, by which a master may become civilly responsible for a wrong done by his servant, even in cases where the master has expressly forbidden the servant to do the act. Limpus v. The General Omnibus Company (11 W. R. 149) is the leading case on this question, and the principles of law relating to the subject are there clearly stated. This liability of masters for the acts of their servants is often expressed by the maxim respondent superior, and must be carefully distinguished from another kind of liability somewhat similar in appearance although wholly different in principle—viz., that expressed by the maxim qui facit per alium facit per se. Whether a man does a wrongful act with his own hand or by the hand of another whom he directs, his liability is the same, as is well stated in the maxim we last mentioned. If, however, a man forbid his servant to do a particular wrongful act and the servant nevertheless does it, the master may, as we have said, be held liable. He is liable not upon the ground that he has done the act by the hand of another person, but because the law attaches to his relation to the wrong-doer—viz., that of master—a liability in certain cases for the acts of the wrong-doer. The master is not supposed to have committed the wrong, but he is held liable for its consequences. It is very important that this distinction should be kept clearly in sight, as it is often ignored in text-books and judgments. It is usually (and with sufficient correctness) laid down that a master is liable for the wrongful acts of his servant committed by the servant in the ordinary course of his employment. If the master direct the wrong to be done then he is liable as principal and not as master, because qui facit per alium facit per se. Although he does not direct the act, and even if he forbids it, he may yet be liable as master. A railway company, like all other companies, must act by agents alone, and the liability of a company for the acts of its servants is the same as that of an individual. If a servant of a railway company commit a tort the company are liable if it was committed by the servant in the ordinary course of his employment. If the act is not done in the ordinary course of his employment the company cannot be liable as masters. In Goff v. Great Western Railway Company (30 L. J. Q. B. 148), the superintendent of the defendant's line had a passenger arrested for not paying his fare. The charge was dismissed, and the defendants were held liable for the act of their servant. In that case the defendants had a statutory power to arrest passengers travelling on their line without paying their fare, and it was therefore held that the company's servants were acting in the ordinary course of their employment in arresting a passenger for non-payment of fare, although in that particular case, under the special circumstances, they were not legally justified in so doing. In Poulton v. London and South Coast Railway Company (16 W. R. Q. B. 309) the defendants' servants arrested a passenger for non-payment of the fare of a horse. The company had no power to arrest for such non-payment. It was held that the defendants were not liable, as their servants could not be held to be acting in the ordinary course of their employment in doing an act which the company had no power to do, even if all the circumstances supposed by their servants to exist had really existed.

The distinction between these two classes of cases is somewhat subtle, but it is intelligible enough. In the former class there is a power to arrest under certain circumstances, and it is, therefore, part of the employment of the servants to arrest when they think such circumstances exist. If they do this wrongfully their masters are liable. In the latter class there is no power to arrest even if the facts supposed to exist do exist, and, therefore, it is no part of the employment of the servants to make such arrests. This principle has been again followed in Edwards v. London and North Western Railway Company. One of the defendants' servants, a foreman porter, gave the plaintiff in charge for stealing property of the company. The charge was dismissed, and the plaintiff brought an action against the defendants who were held not liable on the ground that the servant in having the plaintiff arrested was not acting as a servant of the company but merely exercising a duty common to all persons. The servants of the company had no special power of arresting for felony, and the plaintiff was given in charge under the common law power for the common law offence.

Both Montague Smith and Brett, JJ., point out in their judgments that a company might be liable for such an act of one of their servants, if he were employed for the purpose of making arrests as a night constable or other person whose duty it is to watch the property and premises of the company. It might well be held a part of the ordinary employment of such persons to apprehend those whom they thought to be stealing the company's goods; and if they wrongfully arrested a man, the company might be liable. The servant in this case had, however, no such duty in fact, and therefore it was held that the company were not liable for his act, which was no part of his employment.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS—CORRUPT PRACTICES PREVENTION ACT (17 & 18 VICT. c. 102), s. 2—TEST-BALLOT.

Bristol Election Petition. Brett, Appellant, Robinson, Respondent, C.P., 18 W. R. 866.

At the election for Parliament at Bristol last May there were three Liberal candidates, and it was arranged between them that only one of them should stand, and that a test-ballot should be taken to ascertain which of the three should be the one to stand. A test-ballot was accordingly taken, and Mr. Robinson had a large majority. Some of those who then voted for Mr. Robinson had received money and drink from Mr. Robinson's agents under circumstances which would have avoided an election if the money, &c., had been given to them to vote at the election. The other two Liberal candidates retired. A Conservative candidate afterwards appeared, and he and Mr. Robinson went to the poll and Mr. Robinson was elected. The question was whether the giving of the money, &c., to obtain votes at the test-ballot was bribery under the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 102), s. 2, sub-s. 3, which enacts that the following persons (amongst others) shall be guilty of bribery: "Every person who shall directly or indirectly by himself or by any other person on his behalf, make any gift, loan, &c., &c., to or for any person in order to induce such person to procure or endeavour to procure the return of any person to serve in Parliament, or the vote of any voter at any election." What the Court had, therefore, to decide was whether the money, &c., which was given to the voters to induce them to vote at the test-ballot was given to induce such persons to endeavour to procure the return of Mr. Robinson at the election. The Court decided that the money was so given. "The money was paid directly to the voters to induce them to vote at the test-ballot, and so indirectly to endeavour to procure Mr. Robinson's return." The giving of the money, &c., was therefore bribery within the section and it invalidated the election. The case undoubtedly fell within the spirit of the statute and also within the ordinary meaning of the words of the section in question; and there is, therefore, every reason to be satisfied with the decision.

COURTS.

HOME CIRCUIT.

GUILDFORD.

Aug. 17.—Ward v. Barrett.

This was an action by a husband to recover property belonging to the wife, which, after he had left her, she had sold.

Prentice, Q.C., and Joyce for the plaintiff.

Sir George Honyman, Q.C., and Day for the defendant.

It appeared that in 1848 the plaintiff deserted his wife (as she swore, though he denied it), and during his desertion—in 1856—the wife acquired earnings, with which she purchased the property in question, which was leasehold, and worth about £750. Afterwards, in 1859, she obtained, under the Divorce Act, an order of protection, on the ground of desertion, which in terms protected "all her earnings and property acquired since the commencement of the desertion." After this the wife sold the property to the defendant. The husband came back in 1869, and, hearing of the property, claimed it.

BOVILL, C.J., held that the order, not having been set aside, must be taken as valid, and if valid was an answer to the action. He must, therefore, direct a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff must be left to move the Court, if he pleased, against the verdict. To such a motion, however, he gave no encouragement, his opinion being in favour of the defendant, as it must be taken (for the purpose of the case) that the plaintiff had deserted his wife.—Verdict, therefore, for the defendant.

COUNTY COURTS.

LAMBETH.

(Before R. J. CUST, Esq., Deputy Judge.)

August 11.—Catchpole v. Sullivan.

Action of tort in Common Pleas barred from being tried in county court through the plaintiff not lodging writ in time—Rules of practice in superior court of Hilary Term, 1853, and County Court Rules, 1867—Meaning of the word "thereupon."

This was an action of slander commenced in the Common Pleas and ordered by Mr. Justice Mellor to be tried in this court unless the plaintiff should give security for costs. Security was not given, and sixteen months after the judge's order the plaintiff lodged the order and had the cause set down for hearing before a jury this day, when the cause was called.

Besley, for the defendant, said, before the jury were sworn, he had a preliminary objection to make which he thought would dispose of the cause. This action was commenced nearly two years ago and the defendant had always been anxious to meet it, but delays had been interposed until defendant was enabled about sixteen months ago to stay proceedings in the Common Pleas unless plaintiff gave security for costs, and on his failure to do so the cause was to be tried in this court. According to the rules of practice of Hilary Term, 1853, the plaintiff could not, after so long a delay, have proceeded with his action in the superior court without giving a month's notice, and he (the learned counsel) thought that in such a case the rule would apply to the inferior court as well both as to lapse of time and notice. But if that argument were not sufficient he would refer to the statute under which the cause came before this Court, the County Courts Act, 1867, s. 10. It was there provided that on certain things being done, which had been done in this case, the plaintiff should "thereupon" lodge the writ with the registrar of the county court. The word "thereupon" was not defined in the section, but in County Court Rules of Practice No. 70, the word was used in such a manner as showed how the learned judges, who drew up the rules, understood it. On the lodgment of the writ the registrar was required "thereupon" to appoint a day for hearing, meaning, of course, with as little delay as possible. On these grounds the learned counsel contended the Court could not hear the cause, and if the plaintiff was determined to go on he must get leave of the Court above or begin de novo.

Mr. Crofts, attorney for the plaintiff, said he was taken by surprise in this objection, but he thought it would be of no avail. It really amounted to a statutory defence and the defendant could not plead it according to County Court Rule 96 without giving five clear days notice. The plaintiff having had no such notice the cause ought to proceed.

Mr. CUST said Mr. Besley's statement was certainly not what was meant by a statutory defence, as section 10 had no relation to any defence, but simply related to the form of procedure. However much he might be disposed to give as wide an interpretation to the word "thereupon" as possible, so as to enable the plaintiff to have his case heard, it was asking too much to ask him to say that it included a delay of sixteen months, especially when coupled with the fact that plaintiff had lain by all that time and made no sign. The case must be treated as if the writ had not been lodged at all. In answer to Mr. Besley's application for costs, his Honour said he thought that question had better be left to the taxing master of the court above, who might be asked to allow plaintiff his costs of having been brought here.

Aug. 16.—Hutchins v. Fox.

The prevalence of perjury in county courts.

This was a claim for money lent, for which the plaintiff produced an I O U purporting to be signed by the defendant. The plaintiff swore positively that he wrote the document, except the signature, "F. Fox," which he saw the defendant write at the time the money was lent. On the paper being handed to the defendant, he denied all knowledge of it, adding, when asked to write his name, that he could neither read nor write. The plaintiff then produced another paper, which purported to be a receipt for money paid by him to the defendant in another transaction. He swore that both papers were signed by the defendant, which the defendant as positively denied. The plaintiff then asked for an adjournment that he might produce three or four witnesses who had seen the defendant write.

Mr. Elworthy for the defendant immediately acceded to the proposition to adjourn, as this was a case of a kind only too common. There was no guessing at who was the perjurer in this case, but certainly one of the parties had committed perjury of the most gross and wilful kind. The case ought to be sifted to the bottom, and if the Court granted an adjournment he promised that he would not attempt in the slightest degree to shield his client if it appeared that he was the criminal.

Mr. CUST said he should not grant an adjournment, as he thought he had evidence enough before him to enable him to give a decision. It was clear that perjury had been committed, but if by the plaintiff, then he had committed forgery also. It was more reasonable to believe that the defendant had committed one crime than that the plaintiff had committed two. The judgment would therefore be for the plaintiff.

Mr. Elworthy said he had caused the evidence of the plaintiff to be taken down by a shorthand writer present, and, in all probability, some further proceedings would be the consequence.

APPOINTMENTS.

MR. PATRICK CUMIN, barrister-at-law, has been appointed an Assistant-Secretary to the Committee of Council on Education. Mr. Cumin was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in June, 1850.

MR. EDWIN ANDREW, solicitor, of Liverpool, has been appointed Town Clerk of the borough of Salford, near Manchester, in succession to Mr. George Brett, who has resigned. Mr. Andrew was certificated as a solicitor in Trinity Term 1864, and has for some years been an assistant in the office of the Town Clerk of Liverpool.

MR. FRANCIS STANGER LEATHES, solicitor, of Bombay, has been appointed Clerk to the Justices of the Peace for the town and island of Bombay, in place of his brother, Mr. C. E. Stanger Leathes, deceased. Mr. Leathes has been for several years in practice as a solicitor in Bombay, in partnership with his deceased brother, for whom he acted as Clerk of the Peace on three separate occasions, while absent on leave.

Mr. FRANCIS FREDERICK GIRAUD, solicitor, of Faversham, Kent, has been appointed Town Clerk of that borough, and also Clerk of the Peace, in the room of Mr. S. G. Johnson, who has been appointed Town Clerk of Nottingham. His salary as Town Clerk will be £65 per annum, and as Clerk of the Peace £50.

Mr. GEORGE KENYON, solicitor, Thorne, Yorkshire, has been appointed Clerk to the Trustees of the Doncaster and Thorne and Barton and Selby turnpike roads, in the place of Mr. W. J. Fox, solicitor, who has resigned.

Mr. HENRY JACKSON, solicitor, of St. Helen's-place, City, has been elected Clerk to the Worshipful Company of Cordwainers, in succession to Mr. Henry Dunkin Francis, solicitor, deceased. Mr. Jackson was admitted an attorney in Michaelmas Term, 1833, and was Undersheriff of London in 1840, during the memorable conflict between the House of Commons and the Court of Queen's Bench.

Mr. ALEXANDER GRANT MEEK, solicitor, of Devizes, Wilts, has been appointed Town Clerk of that borough, and clerk to the Local Board of Health, in succession to his father, Mr. Alexander Meek, solicitor, who has resigned, after holding the first-named office for nearly twenty-nine years.

Mr. ROBERT PURVIS, solicitor, of South Shields, has been elected Clerk to the Magistrates of that borough, in succession to Mr. Shaftoe Robson, who recently resigned, on being appointed to a similar office at Gateshead. He was admitted an attorney in Michaelmas Term, 1866, and is a member of the local firm of Wawn & Purvis. The other candidates for the office were Messrs. H. T. Duncan and T. G. Mabane, solicitors, of South Shields, and Mr. J. J. Bentham, solicitor, of Sunderland.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Sir,—Can you inform your readers when it is likely there will be a new edition of the Consolidated Orders in Chancery? The first came out in 1849, since which time no less than thirty General Orders have been issued. These orders are almost equal in bulk to the Consolidated Orders, and are not merely additions to them, but in many instances, they abrogate the latter, and give new directions on many important branches of Chancery practice.

The profession would welcome such a work as a valuable addition to their practice books, and I trust that my Lord Hatherley will authorise its commencement forthwith.

FOREIGN TRIBUNALS & JURISPRUDENCE.

AMERICA.

SUPREME COURT, PENNSYLVANIA.

July 8.—The Pennsylvania Railway Company v. William Kerr.

A warehouse, situated near defendants' track, had been ignited by sparks emitted from a negligently placed locomotive of defendants; the burning warehouse in turn communicated fire to the plaintiff's building, distant some thirty-nine feet, destroying it.

Held, that the proximate cause of plaintiff's loss was the burning warehouse; that the defendant's negligence was but the remote cause; and that therefore the defendants were not liable to the plaintiff.

Error to the Common Pleas of Huntingdon county.

Opinion by THOMPSON, C.J.—It has always been a matter of difficulty to judicially determine the precise point at which pecuniary accountability for the consequences of wrongful or injurious acts is to cease. No rule has been sufficiently defined and general as to control in all cases. Yet there is a principle applicable to most cases of injury which amounts to a limitation. It is embodied in the common law maxim, causa proxima, non remota spectatur—the immediate and not the remote cause is to be considered.

Para. on Cont. v. 3, p. 198, illustrates the rule aptly by the suppositive case of debtor and creditor, as follows: "A creditor's debtor has failed to meet his engagements to pay him a sum of money, by reason of which, the creditor has failed to meet his engagement, and the latter is thrown into bankruptcy and ruined. The result is plainly traceable to the failure of the former to pay as he agreed. Yet the law only requires him to pay his debt with interest. He is not held liable for consequences which he had no direct hand in producing and no reason to expect. The immediate cause of the creditor's bankruptcy, was his failure to pay his own debt. The cause of that cause was the failure of the debtor to pay him, but this was a remote cause, being thrown back by the interposition of the proximate cause, the non-payment by the creditor of his own debt. This, I regard as a fair illustration of what is meant in the maxim by the words "proxima" and "remota." See also notes, same volume, p. 180.

In Harrison v. Berkley, 1 Strobb. (S. Car. Rep.) 548, Mr. Justice Wardlaw indulges in some reflections on this point worth referring to in this connection. "Every incident," says he, "will, when carefully examined, be found to be the result of combined causes; to be itself one of various causes, which produces other events. Accident or design may disturb the ordinary action of causes. It is easy to imagine some act of trivial misconduct or slight negligence, which shall do no direct harm, but sets in motion some second agent that shall move a third, and so until the most disastrous consequences shall ensue. The first wrong-doer, unfortunate rather than seriously blameable, cannot be made answerable for all these consequences."

It is certain, that in almost every considerable disaster, the result of human agency and dereliction of duty, a train of consequences generally ensue, and so ramify as more or less to affect the whole community. Indemnity cannot reach all these results, although parties suffer who are innocent of blame. This is one of the vicissitudes of organised society. Every one in it takes the risk of their vicissitudes. Willfulness itself cannot be reached by the civil arm of the law for all the consequences of consequences, and some sufferers necessarily remain without compensation. The case of Scott v. Shepherd, 2 Wm. Blac. R. 893, the case of the squib, is sometimes cited as extending the principle of the maxim, but it is not so. The doctrine of proximate and remote causes was really not discussed in that case. One threw a squib in a market place amongst the crowd. It fell on the stall of one who immediately cast it off to prevent it exploding there, and it struck a third person and exploded, putting out his eye. The question was, whether the defendant could be made answerable in the form of action adopted, which was trespass. Ch. Justice De Grey held, that the first thrower, the defendant, was answerable, for that in fact the squib did the injury by the first impulse. In this way the action of trespass was sustained. It is no authority against the principle suggested. There must be a limit somewhere. Greenl. in Vol. II., section 256, touches the question thus: "the damages to be recovered must be the natural and proximate consequence of the act complained of." This is undoubtedly the rule. The difficulty is in distinguishing what is proximate and what remote. I regard the illustration from Parsons already given, although the wrong supposed arises ex contractu, as clear as any that can be suggested. It is an occurrence undoubtedly frequent, that by the careless use of matches, houses are set on fire. One adjoining is fired by the first, a third is by the second, and so on, it might be, for the length of a square or more. It is not in our experience that the first owner is liable to answer for all these consequences and there is a good reason for it. The second and third houses in the case supposed, were not burned by the direct action of the match, and who knows how many agencies might have contributed to produce the result? Therefore, it would be illogical to hold the match chargeable as the cause of what it did not do, and might not have done. The text books, and I think the authorities agree, that such circumstances define the word "remota" removed, and not the immediate cause. This is also Webster's third definition of the word remote. The question which gives force to the objection that the second or third result of the first cause is remote, is put by Parsons, Vol. II., 180, "did the cause alleged produce its effects without another cause intervening, or was it made to operate only through or by means of this intervening cause?" There might possibly be cases in which the causes of disaster, although seemingly removed from the original cause, are still incapable of distinct separation from it, and the rule suggested might be inapplicable; but of these when they occur. The maxim, however, is not to be controlled by time or distance, but by the succession of events.

The case on hand is a claim against the defendant under these circumstances, briefly: A warehouse of one Simpson, situate very near the track of the company's road, was set on fire by sparks emitted from a locomotive engine of the defendants, so negligently placed as to set it on fire. The burning of the warehouse communicated fire to a hotel building situated some thirty-nine feet from the warehouse, which, at the time, was occupied by the plaintiff as tenant, and it was consumed, with its furniture, stock of liquors and provisions, and for this the plaintiff sued and recovered below. Several other disconnected buildings were burned at the same time, but this is in no way involved in this case.

No doubt the company was answerable for the destruction of the warehouse, resulting from the negligence of the company's servants in the use of the engine. The authority to the company to use steam on their road does not exempt it from liability for injury resulting from the negligent use of it: Lackawanna and Bloomsburg Railroad Company v. Doak, 2 P. F. Smith, 379. The learned judge charged that the defendant was liable to the plaintiff to the extent of his loss, by reason of the burning of the hotel, although by fire communicated from the warehouse, if the latter was set on fire by the negligence of the defendant's servants in the manner mentioned. To this charge the defendants excepted, and assign it for error, and this presents the question of the case.

This charge was of course the equivalent of holding that a recovery for all the consequences of the first act of negligence of the defendants, was in law allowable. We are inclined to think in this there was error, for the reasons already given, and others that will be given. It cannot be denied but that the plaintiff's property was destroyed, but by a secondary cause, namely, the burning of the warehouse. The sparks from the locomotive did not ignite the hotel. They fired the warehouse, and the warehouse fired the hotel. They were the remote cause—the cause of the hotel being burned. As there was an intermediate agent, or cause of the destruction, between the sparks and the destruction of the hotel, it is obvious that that was the proximate cause of its destruction, and the negligent emission of sparks the remote cause. To hold that the act of negligence which destroyed the warehouse destroyed the hotel, is to disregard the order of sequences entirely, and would hold good if a row of buildings a mile long had been destroyed. The cause of destruction of the last in that case, would be no more remote, within the meaning of the maxim, than that of the first, and yet how many concurring elements of destruction there might be in all of these houses, and no doubt would be, no one can tell. So to hold would confound all legitimate ideas of cause and effect, and really expunge from the law the maxim quoted, that teaches accountability for the natural and necessary consequences of a wrongful act, and which should, in reason, be only such that the wrong-doer may be presumed to have known would flow from his act. According to the principle asserted, a spark from a steamboat on the Delaware might occasion the destruction of a whole square, although it never touched but a single separate structure. No one would be likely to have the least idea of such accountability, so as to govern and control his acts accordingly. A railroad terminating in a city, might, by the slightest omission on the part of one of its numerous servants, be made to account for squares burned, the consequence of a spark communicating to a single building. Were this the understanding of the extent of liability under such circumstances, it seems to me that there might be more desirable objects to invest capital in, than in the stock of such a railroad. But it never has been so understood or adjudged. Lowrie, J., in Morrison v. Davis & Co. (8 Har. 171), illustrates the argument against such liability most strikingly, by reference to a well-known fact. In the case he was treating, a horse in a canal boat team was lame, in consequence of which the boat was behind time in reaching the Juniata river, and in consequence of that was overtaken by a flood in the river which destroyed the boat with its freight. The carrier, the owner of the boat, was charged with being negligent in using a lame horse, the occasion of the delay. In treating of this as only the remote cause of the disaster, the learned judge said:—"There are often very small faults which are the occasion of the most serious and distressing consequences. Thus, a momentary act of carelessness set fire to a little straw, and that set fire to a house, and by an extraordinary concurrence of very dry weather and high winds, with this little fault, one-third of a city (Pittsburgh) was destroyed; would it be right that this small act of carelessness should be charged with the whole value of the property consumed?" The answer would and ought to be, No, it was but the remote cause of it. Innumerable occasions must have occurred in this commonwealth for asserting liability to the extent and upon the principle claimed here, yet we have not a solitary precedent of the kind in our books. This is worth something as proof against the alleged principle. It was Littleton's rule, "that what never was, never ought to be:" 1 Vern. 385.

The question in hand has not been adjudicated in this State, and but seldom discussed in any of the other States; yet we have a case decided in the Court of Appeals of the State of New York, in 1868, which is directly in point in support of the doctrine we have been endeavouring to advance above. It is the case of Ryan v. The New York Central Railroad Company (8 Tiffany,) 35 N. Y. 210. The facts in that case briefly were, that the defendant, by the carelessness of its servants, or through the insufficient condition of one of its locomotive engines, set fire to its own wood shed with a large quantity of wood therein. The plaintiff's house, situated some 130 feet from the shed, took fire from the heat and sparks of the burning shed and wood, and was entirely consumed. A number of other houses and buildings were destroyed by the spreading of the fire. The plaintiff brought suit against the company for his loss. On the presentation of these facts at the trial, the circuit judge non-suited the plaintiff, and at the general term of the Supreme Court of the Fifth District, the judgment was affirmed. The case was then removed to the Court of Appeals, where the judgment was unanimously affirmed in an elaborate and exhaustive opinion by Hunt, J. Every position taken by the counsel for the defendant in error here, was taken there, and examined and answered fully in the opinion. All the English and American cases supposed to have any bearing on the point in dispute there on the same question we have here, are noticed by him, and the doctrine clearly deduced, that the railroad company was not answerable to the plaintiff for the loss of his house being burned by fire communicated by the burning shed. That case is not distinguishable in principle, or in the manner of destruction, from this. It is on all fours with this case.

But it seems to have been thought that the Insurance Company v. Tweed, 7 Wal. (U. S. Rep.) 45, conflicts with the above case. I do not think it does, when understood. It was an action on a policy of insurance against fire, in which there was an exception of several matters—viz., invasion, insurrection, military and usurped power, explosion, earthquakes, &c. An explosion took place in a warehouse on the opposite side of the street from the insured property, and scattered fire and burning fragments upon the insured property and destroyed it. The decision of the Supreme Court was that the loss was within the exception of loss by fire occasioned by explosion. To me it seems that it would have been rather more rational to have held that the destruction was by fire per se. But the Court interpreted the terms of the contract of the parties in this way. We must remember that there may be a difference between interpreting the obligation of a contract, and defining liability under the laws of social duty. Certain it is, the laws are not the same. One does not necessarily rule the other. I may say further, that there is no evidence, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Miller, that he had specially in view the same question, so ably discussed by Mr. Justice Hunt, or if he had, that his investigations extended so far as did those of the last-named judge. He does not even refer to the New York case at all.

The question here involved does not seem to have been definitely determined in England; why, I am at a loss to know. There have been decisions, it is true, imposing liability against the reasons we have expressed above, but in none of them is the question of proximate and remote cause of the injury discussed at all. Such is the case in Piggot v. The Eastern Counties Railway Company, 3 C. B. 229, cited by the counsel for the defendant in error; and such is the recent case of Smith v. The London and South Western Railway Company, 18 W. R. 343. In this case, Bovill, C.J., and Keating, J., affirmed the recovery. Brett, J., dissented. Both these cases were before the Court of Common Pleas. I find no review of the question in the Exchequer Chamber. I regard these cases as passing over the question that was decided in the Court of Appeals in York, and which is before us now, sub silentio. Hunt, J., expresses, to some extent, my experience, when he says, "I have examined the authorities cited from the Year Books, and have not overlooked the English statutes on the subject, or the English decisions, extending back for many years. It will not be useful further to refer to the authorities, for it will be impossible to reconcile some of them with the views I have taken." I entirely agree, that if they shed any light, it is too uncertain and dim to be followed with safety; while, on the other hand, the concurrence of principle, with a just measure of responsibility, we think, is best subserved by the rule we suggest. With every desire to compensate for loss when the loser is not to blame, we know it cannot always be without transcending the boundaries of reason, and, of course, law. This we cannot do, and we fear we would be doing it, if we affirmed the judgment in this case. The limit of responsibility must lie somewhere, and we think we find it in the principle stated. If not found there, it exists nowhere. We have not been referred to any case, in any of the States and courts, excepting those noticed, and I have not myself discovered any, which in the least militates against the foregoing views; we are therefore constrained to follow the result of our conclusions, and reverse the judgment in this case. At present we will not order a venire de novo, but if the plaintiff below and defendant in error desire, we will order it on grounds shown for it, if made in a reasonable time.

Speer & Petrikin, for defendant in error.—Legal Intelligence.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

Charles Bischoff, Philip Smith Cox, and George Cox Bompas, Plaintiffs in Error, v. John Wethered.

(In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Maryland.)

Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion of the Court.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs in error against the defendant to recover damages for breach of covenant in the assignment of one-fortieth part of an English patent granted to one William Henry Newton. The covenant was that the patent was in all respects valid and unimpeachable. The breach complained of was that it was null and void. The declaration contained certain other counts, namely, the ordinary money counts, and a count on a judgment recovered in the Common Pleas at Westminster Hall, in England. To the latter count the defendant pleaded nul tiel record; and the only evidence adduced in its support was an exemplified copy of a judgment recovered against the defendant in the said Common Pleas, without any service of process on him, or any notice of the suit, other than a personal notice served in the City of Baltimore. It is enough to say of this proceeding, that it was wholly without jurisdiction of the person, and whatever validity it may have in England, by virtue of statute law, against property of the defendant there situate, it can have no validity here, even of a prima facie character. It is simply null.

As no evidence was adduced to sustain the common counts, the only question of importance arises under the count on the alleged covenant that the patent in question was valid and unimpeachable.

This patent was granted to Newton on the 25th of May, 1853, and was for certain improvements in the generation of steam, consisting of an accessory steam-pipe carried from the boiler through the fire or chimney, so as to cause the steam conveyed therein to become superheated, and from thence carried to the steam-chest, or to an intermediate pipe, there to connect with the ordinary steam-pipe which conveys the steam from the boiler to the engine, so as to mix the superheated steam with the ordinary steam as it comes from the boiler. The effect of this mixture is described to be that the superheated steam converts into steam all the remaining watery particles, froth and foam, contained in the ordinary steam, and thus dries and rarifies the whole mass, and makes it more effective.

The plaintiff having put in evidence the assignment containing the covenant declared on, and the letters patent granted to Newton, in order to show the breach of covenant, put in evidence a prior English patent, granted to one Poole, in 1844, for an invention which the plaintiff claimed was identical with that patented to Newton. The plaintiff then called upon the Court to compare the two specifications, and to instruct the jury that the patent to Newton was not a valid and unimpeachable patent, inasmuch as the invention therein described was not novel, but was already substantially described in the specification of Poole; and that under the covenants contained in the assignment, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover £500, the amount of purchase-money paid, with interest. This the Court refused to do, and plaintiffs excepted.

The defendant then prayed the Court to instruct the jury, amongst other things, that there is not on the face of the respective patents of Newton and Poole such an identity as authorises the Court to pronounce that they are for one and the same invention, and that for that reason the patent granted to Newton is invalid; and such invalidity being necessary to support the plaintiffs' claim, and being wanting, the verdict must be for the defendant. The Court granted this prayer, and instructed the jury accordingly, and a verdict was found for the defendant. The plaintiffs excepted to this instruction.

The question therefore is, whether the Court was bound to compare the two specifications, and to instruct the jury, as matter of law, whether the inventions therein described were, or were not, identical. This is an important question of practice under the patent law, and deserves to be seriously considered by this Court.

It is undoubtedly the common practice of the United States circuit courts, in actions at law on questions of priority of invention, where a patent under consideration is attempted to be invalidated by a prior patent, to take the evidence of experts as to the nature of the various mechanisms or manufactures described in the different patents produced, and as to the identity or diversity between them; and to submit all the evidence to the jury under general instructions as to the rules by which they are to consider the evidence. A case may sometimes be so clear that the Court may feel no need of an expert to explain the terms of art or the descriptions contained in the respective patents, and may, therefore, feel authorised to leave the question of identity to the jury, under such general instructions as the nature of the documents seems to require. And in such plain cases the Court would probably feel authorised to set aside a verdict unsatisfactory to itself, as against the weight of evidence. But in all such cases the question would still be treated as a question of fact for the jury, and not as a question of law for the court. And under this rule of practice, counsel would not have the right to require the Court, as matter of law, to pronounce upon the identity or diversity of the several inventions described in the patents produced. Such, we think, has been the prevailing rule in this country, and we see no sufficient reason for changing it. The control which the courts can always exercise over unsatisfactory verdicts will enable them to prevent any wrong or injustice arising from the action of juries; whereas, if the courts themselves were compellable to decide on these often recondite and difficult questions, without the aid of scientific persons familiar with the subjects of the inventions in question, they might be led into irremediable errors, which would produce great injustice to suitors. We are disposed to think that the practice adopted by our courts is, on the whole, the safest and most conducive to justice.

It may be objected to this view that it is the province of the Court, and not the jury, to construe the meaning of documentary evidence. This is true. But the specifications of patents for inventions are documents of a peculiar kind. They profess to describe mechanisms and complicated machinery, chemical compositions, and other manufactured products, which have their existence in pais, outside of the documents themselves; and which are commonly described by terms of the art or mystery to which they respectively belong; and these descriptions and terms of art often require peculiar knowledge and education to understand them aright; and slight verbal variations, scarcely noticeable to a common reader, would be detected by an expert in the art, as indicating an important variation in the invention. Indeed, the whole subject-matter of a patent is an embodied conception outside of the patent itself, which, to the mind of those expert in the art, stands out in clear and distinct relief, whilst it is often unperceived, or but dimly perceived, by the uninitiated. This outward embodiment of the terms contained in the patent is the thing invented, and is to be properly sought, like the explanation of all latent ambiguities arising from the description of external things, by evidence in pais.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the circuit court was justified in refusing to give the instructions demanded by the plaintiffs, and in giving that which was asked by the defendant.

The precise question has recently undergone considerable discussion in England, and has finally resulted in the same conclusion to which we have arrived. The cases will be found collected in the last edition of Curtis on Patents, section 446. It was at first decided in the cases of Dovill v. Pimm, 11 Ex. 718; Betts v. Menzies, 1 Ell. & Ell. Q.B. 999; and Bush v. Fox, 5 H. of L. Cas. 707, that it was the province and duty of the Court to compare the documents and decide on the identity or diversity of the inventions. But in 1862, Lord Westbury, in two very elaborate judgments, one of which was delivered in the House of Lords on occasion of overruling the decision in Betts v. Menzies, held that it belonged to the province of evidence, and not that of construction, to determine this question. "In all cases, therefore," he concludes, "where the two documents profess to describe an external thing, the identity of signification between the two documents containing the same description must belong to the province of evidence, and not that of construction." Lord Westbury very justly remarks that two documents using the same words, if of different dates, may intend very diverse things, as, indeed, was actually decided by this Court in the case of The Bridge Proprietors v. The Hoboken Company, 1 Wallace, 116. The Court, in that case said: "It does not follow, when a newly invented or discovered thing is called by some familiar word which comes nearest to expressing the new idea, that the thing so styled is really the thing formerly meant by the familiar word." And the decision was that the word "bridge" in an old bridge law, passed in 1790, did not mean the same thing as the same word meant when applied to the modern structure of a railroad bridge.

This view of the case is not intended to, and does not, trench upon the doctrine that the construction of written instruments is the province of the Court alone. It is not the construction of the instrument, but the character of the thing invented, which is sought in questions of identity and diversity of inventions.

The judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.—New York Transcript.

OBITUARY.

RIGHT HON. J. HATCHELL.

The Right Hon. John Hatchell, formerly Attorney-General for Ireland, died suddenly at his residence, Fortfield House, near Dublin, on the 14th inst. The deceased gentleman was born at Wexford in 1788, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he obtained honours and a University Scholarship, graduating B.A. in 1807, and M.A. in 1810. He was called to the bar in Ireland in 1809, and was nominated a King's Counsel in 1835. In 1846 he was admitted a bencher of King's-inns, Dublin, and was appointed Solicitor-General for Ireland in December, 1847. In December, 1850, on the Right Hon. J. H. Monahan becoming Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, Mr. Hatchell succeeded him as Attorney-General. In February, of the same year, he was elected to represent Windsor in Parliament, and remained in that position till the general election in July, 1852, when he did not seek the suffrages of any constituency. Mr. Hatchell was appointed Commissioner of the Insolvent Debtors Court in Ireland in June, 1854, which office he continued to hold until the amalgamation with the Court of Bankruptcy in 1859, when he retired on full pension.

MR. S. D. DARBISHIRE.

Mr. Samuel Dunkinfield Darbshire, formerly a solicitor of Manchester, died at his residence, Pendyffryn, near Conway, Carnarvonshire, in the 74th year of his age. Mr. Darbshire has been in practice at Manchester for many years, and had at one time been solicitor to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company. After his retirement from business, he purchased an estate in Carnarvonshire, and for one year served the office of high sheriff of that county. He had been President of the Manchester New College for several years. He was a magistrate for the Conway division, and was also a Deputy Lieutenant of Carnarvonshire.

COURT PAPERS.

BRECON ELECTION PETITION.

Overton and another, Petitioners; Holford, M.P., Respondent.

An election petition from Brecon was filed at the rule office on Friday last. It contains the usual allegations of bribery, treating, and undue influence, in addition to that of "having engaged at the election as canvassers or agents for the management or other purposes of the said election, certain persons, who had within seven years previous to such engagement, been fined or reported guilty of corrupt practices, by a competent legal tribunal." The seat is not prayed for.

Agents for the petitioners, Mr. Wm. Graves, Brecon; Messrs. Wyatt & Hoskins, Parliament-st, S.W.

Agents for respondent, Messrs. Carlisle & Ordell, 8, New-square, Lincoln's-inn.

NORWICH ELECTION PETITION.

Agents for respondent, Messrs. Flux & Leadbitter, Leadenhall-street, E.C.

Mr. Justice Byles has appointed Tuesday, the 13th September, for the trial of this petition.

Mr. Edward Foss, F.S.A., J.P. of Kent and Surrey, and author of "Lives of the Judges," died at Addiscombe on the 27th of July, in his eighty-second year.

We are not disposed to join with Ministers in deploring the abandonment of the Judicial Committee Bill, to which Mr. Bruce reluctantly consented on Monday night, in the face of a strong adverse minority, that threatened in successive divisions to grow in to a majority. The Home Secretary assured the House of Commons—"That the Government had brought in the bill really with an honest desire to provide for a state of things which they believed to be a most crying evil." We need not doubt the honesty of Lord Hatherley, but we are quite sure that neither he nor his colleagues have measured the extent of the evil that is apparent to all, nor have they yet understood the character of the needful remedy. The bill that has been abandoned was only a small instalment of a comprehensive scheme of legal reform, which we were promised at the opening of the session; the other portions of the scheme met with an earlier fate; and it was absurdly purposeless to push on such a piecemeal fraction of legislation in the second week of August. Not that even the preservation of the original plan of judicial reorganisation introduced by the Lord Chancellor would have been satisfactory. The parts hung badly together, the ideas on which they rested were imperfectly pursued or timidly surrendered, and perhaps the performance of the ministerial promises of legal reform in the fashion of which the abandoned bills have given us a specimen would have resulted in making worse confounded the existing confusion of the Courts of Law. If the task is to be taken up again next year, as it certainly must be, another spirit of treatment must be shown. There must be a clearer purpose more logically followed up, and the resistance of legal Conservatism must be energetically beaten down.—Economist.

LAWYERS IN EUROPE.—Recent statistics develop some facts of interest with regard to the number of lawyers in different European countries, and their ratio to the population at large. For example, we learn that in England there is one lawyer to every 1,240 of the population; in France, one for every 1,970; in Belgium, one for every 2,700; and in Prussia, one for every 12,000 only. Another curious fact is, that in England the number of persons belonging to each of the different professions is nearly the same. Thus, there are 34,970 lawyers, 35,483 clergymen, and 35,995 physicians. In Prussia, on the other hand, there are 4,809 physicians to only 1,362 lawyers.

CONTEMPT OF COURT.—While Thad. Stevens was a young lawyer, he once had a case before a bad-tempered judge of an obscure Pennsylvania court. Under what he considered a very erroneous ruling, it was decided against him; whereupon he threw down his books and picked up his hat in a high state of indignation, and was about to leave the court-room, scattering imprecations all around him. The judge straitened himself to his full height, assumed an air of offended majesty, and asked Thad. if he meant to "express his contempt for this court." Thad. turned to him very deferentially, made a respectful bow, in feigned amazement. "Express my contempt for this court! No, sir! I am trying to conceal it, your Honour," adding, as he turned to leave, "but I find it d—d hard to do it."

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

On Thursday the directors of the Bank of England made a further reduction in the rate of discount from 5½ per cent. to 4½; and this change fairly indicates the continuing tendency towards a gradual restoration of the normal state of things in the markets, both for money and securities. Since this operation the funds have continued to show increasing firmness; and the improvement in railway shares and other like securities has been very marked.

LONDON, AUGUST 27, 1870.

LORD SALISBURY AND LORD CAIRNS, the arbitrators appointed by Act of Parliament to deal with the affairs of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, have just made their first award. They are called, in the Act of Parliament which appointed them, "arbitrators;" but in reality they are not only judges, but organisers and legislators. They had not only to adjudicate upon the various claims against the company in the innumerable actions and suits pending when the Act was passed, and to determine how they were to be met or settled: they had further to decide upon the priorities and conflicting rights of the various classes of debenture holders and shareholders; and to enact (for their award has the power of an Act of Parliament) how the company shall be organised and its capital constituted for the future. And, of course, the latter part of the jurisdiction conferred upon the arbitrators is by far the most important part. In the present award the arbitrators lay down the broad outlines of their scheme with perfect clearness, though they leave many details to be worked out in a final award which is yet to come.

We cannot examine their scheme minutely, but its general principle is easily stated. Hitherto the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway has consisted of a number of independent undertakings, with separate capitals and separate bodies of shareholders—the General undertaking, the Metropolitan Extensions, the City lines, and so on. And for each undertaking there have been various classes of stocks, shares, and debentures, preferred, deferred, and of every other possible kind. For the future all these separate undertakings are to be merged into one. And all the capital of the company is to be comprised under three heads, debentures, preference shares, and ordinary shares. This capital is to be substituted for the old, and distributed among the existing holders in a manner proportioned to their holdings, and with a due regard to priorities.

It is impossible to say at present how far this arrangement will give satisfaction to those interested. Looking at the enormous number of interests to be considered, we may be very sure that some persons will be discontented with the result. It is at least clear that the arbitrators have devoted immense time and thought to working out this scheme for the reconstruction of the company; and we can only trust that their labour may not be in vain.

IT IS NOT LONG SINCE A CASE came before the public in which certain of the authorities of one of our large hospitals were accused of having sanctioned a post mortem examination of the body of a patient who had died in the hospital, contrary to the wishes of the relations of the deceased and to the law. In yesterday's Times another case is reported in which one of the surgeons of the same hospital was charged with a similar offence, and the result is reported to have been as follows:—"In answer to Mr. Benson, the applicant said he had not read the report of a similar case from the same hospital, which was dismissed some short time back. Mr. Benson said the complainant in the previous case had withdrawn it because he could not take the case to the superior court. He had spent £8 or £9, and if the applicant was to take the case through it would cost him between £50 and £60. Mr. Benson said he would commit Dr. Morrison or the whole of the medical profession if the applicant would bring proof that he would prosecute at the trial. The applicant, who said he was only a working man and had no money, left the court evidently very much disappointed." It appears, therefore, that in substance the officers of a great public institution are accused of habitually violating the law, as well as outraging the feelings of individuals in a manner peculiarly offensive. And the charges fail, not because of the innocence of the accused, though for aught we know they may be perfectly innocent, and nothing either illegal or improper may have taken place, but because of the poverty of the complainants. This is another example of the mischief of our present system of prosecution, and the need for some system by which the State shall itself vindicate its own criminal laws.

IN ANOTHER COLUMN will be found a report of a case decided by Mr. Justice Willes at Chambers upon the construction of the Act just passed "to facilitate the arrest of absconding debtors" (33 & 34 Vict. c. 76). We refer to the case here not because the point decided could admit of much doubt, but because the case well illustrates the present state of the law with regard to the arrest of absconding debtors, and the changes introduced by last year's legislation.

Before the year 1869, a debtor to the extent of £20 or upwards, about to leave England, might be arrested by writ of capias issuing out of the superior court in which an action against him was brought, at any time after the commencement of the action, and before final judgment. But, inasmuch as such a proceeding often entailed so much delay as to give the debtor time to effect his escape before he could be stopped, power was also given to the county court, which for this purpose acted in aid of the superior court, to issue a warrant for the arrest and detention of a debtor about to abscond, even before the writ in the action was actually commenced. When a debtor was so arrested his creditor was bound to commence his action, and obtain a writ of capias forthwith; and the only effect of the action of the county court was to prevent the debtor from making his escape during the delay necessary for obtaining the capias.

All these powers were taken away by the legislation of 1869. And it was enacted instead, by section 6 of the Debtors Act, in substance, that the superior court in which an action is pending may arrest an absconding debtor, where there is a good cause of action to the extent of £50 or upwards at any time after action brought and before final judgment. No power of arresting absconding debtors was given to the county courts corresponding to that which they possessed before.

At the same time the Bankruptcy Act, by section 86, gave a court of bankruptcy power to arrest a debtor "if, after a petition of bankruptcy is presented against such debtor, it appear to the Court that there is probable reason for believing that he is about to go abroad, or to quit his place of residence with a view of avoiding service of the petition, or of avoiding appearing to the petition, or of avoiding examination in respect of his affairs, or otherwise delaying or embarrassing the proceedings in bankruptcy." And the present Act, which is incorporated with the Bankruptcy Act, enacts by section 1 that—

"The provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, be extended in manner following:—The Court may, by warrant addressed to any constable or prescribed officer of the court, cause a debtor to be arrested and safely kept as prescribed until such time as the Court may order, if, after a debtor's summons has been granted in the manner prescribed by the said Act, and before a petition of bankruptcy can be pre-ented against him, it appear to the Court that there is a probable reason for believing that he is about to go abroad, with a view of avoiding payment of the debt for which the summons has been granted, or of avoiding service of a petition of bankruptcy, or of avoiding appearing to such petition, or of avoiding examination in respect of his affairs, or otherwise avoiding, delaying, or embarrassing proceedings in bankruptcy: Provided always that nothing herein contained shall be construed to alter or qualify the right of the debtor to apply to the Court in the prescribed manner to dismiss the said summons as in the said Act is provided, or to pay, secure, or compound for the said debt within the time by the said Act provided, without being deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy; and provided also, that upon any such payment or composition being made, or such security offered as the Court shall think reasonable, the said debtor shall be discharged out of custody, unless the Court shall otherwise order." By section "2 no arrest shall be valid or protected under this Act unless the debtor, before or at the time of his arrest, shall be served with the debtor's summons."

In the case to which we refer Mr. Justice Willes decided, as indeed is plain, that the Act gives no power of arrest except to a court of bankruptcy. The practical result of all these enactments is that if a debtor is about to abscond, then, unless there is time to issue a writ in a superior court and afterwards to apply to a judge at chambers for his arrest under the Debtors Act, the only course will be to issue a debtor's summons and apply for his arrest under the new Act. And this will probably be the course ordinarily adopted in the case of debtors resident out of London. This Act will give fresh importance to the proceeding by debtor's summons.

CONTRACTS UNDER SECTION 7 OF THE RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC ACT, 1854

(17 & 18 VICT. c. 31).

I.

It would be a difficult matter to decide which is the worst drawn statute upon the English Statute-book, and we certainly do not intend to express any opinion on the subject. There are, however, some statutes which have acquired an unfortunate pre-eminence for the obscurity of their provisions; and without deciding upon the relative merits of these statutes, we may safely class amongst them the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31) with especial reference to its 7th section. Of course the greater the obscurity and difficulty of a statute the more important are the cases decided upon it, and we propose here to collect the most important decisions upon section 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, and to endeavour to deduce from them some rules which may assist in determining what contracts are and what are not valid within that section.

Before the passing of the statute common carriers had the same power of contracting as that enjoyed by other persons. It was consequently competent for common carriers to agree with consignors of goods that they should not be liable for any loss of or injury to the goods, or to make any other contract respecting the goods, and thereby to more or less limit the liability as insurers which by the common law is thrown upon common carriers. If there was any special contract between the carriers and the senders of goods, the rights and obligations of the parties were governed by that contract, so far as it extended; and whether it were wise or foolish, fair or unfair, the parties making it were bound thereby, as the parties to other contracts are bound. Before the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, if goods were simply given to common carriers for carriage, they received them as insurers; if given under a special contract, they received the goods according to the contract, even although by that contract the carriers were relieved from all liability whatever, however caused, for damage to the goods. If the carriers refused to carry goods except under a special contract, the owner might, if the proposed contract was unreasonable, tender his goods for carriage, and a reasonable payment for their carriage, and require the carriers to take them on the common law terms, and if they refused to do so, the owner would have an action against them for refusing to carry. If, however, he sent them under a contract, his right of action was subject to the terms of that contract. This was the common law rule, and was not altered in this respect by the Carriers Act (11 Geo. 4, and 1 Will. 4, c. 68), which, by section 6, expressly reserves to carriers the right to make special contracts. The whole of the subject is very fully treated in the judgment of Blackburn, J., in Peck's case, in the House of Lords (11 W. R. 1028, 32 L. J. Q. B. 241).

While the law was in this state the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, was passed, and it enacted by section 7 that every railway and canal "company shall be liable for the loss of, or for any injury done to," any animals or goods, &c., &c., "in the receiving, forwarding, or delivery thereof, occasioned by the neglect or default of such company or its servants, notwithstanding any notice, condition, or declaration made and given by such company contrary thereto, or in anywise limiting such liability; every such notice, condition, or declaration being hereby declared to be null and void: provided always that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the said companies from making such conditions with respect to the receiving, forwarding, and delivery of any of the said "animals, &c., goods, &c., "as shall be adjudged by the court or judge before whom any question relating thereto shall be tried, to be just and reasonable. . . . Provided that no special contract between such company and any other parties respecting the receiving, forwarding, or delivering of any "animals &c., goods, &c., "shall be binding upon or shall affect any such party unless the same be signed by him or by the person delivering such "animals, &c., goods, &c., "respectively for carriage."

We have only cited that part of the section which relates to the nature, validity and effect of contracts between railway and canal companies and the senders of goods. We do not propose to discuss here the other portions of the section which relate to the amount of damages that may be recovered for the loss of or injury to animals sent by railways or canals. It appears that no questions have arisen under this section in reported cases in actions against canal companies. We have therefore only to deal with actions against railway companies. Before examining these cases it will be necessary to consider the nature of the provisions of the section.

First, it is clear that the section only applies to contracts which purport to relieve the company making them from liability for damage caused by the "neglect or default" of the company or their servants. Consequently a contract between a railway company and a consignor of goods, by which the company stipulate that it is not to be liable as an insurer (as would, of course, be the case without a special contract relieving them of that liability), is not within the section. If, therefore, such an agreement has, in fact, been made, the consignor is bound by it, whether reasonable or not. The section has no application to such a case (per Blackburn, J. in Peck's case).

It has also been held that the section does not apply where a traveller, after a journey on a railway, deposits luggage with the company in the cloak-room. A receipt of goods under such circumstances is not a receipt by the company as carriers, and therefore the statute has no application (Van Toll v. South Eastern Railway Company, 10 W. R. 578, 31 L. J. C. P. 241). Nor does the section apply to contracts for carriage beyond the contracting company's own line (Zunz v. South Eastern Railway Company, 17 W. R. 1096, L. R. 4 Q. B. 589). As regards the conveyance of goods beyond their own line, companies are therefore in the same position that they occupied before the statute was passed. They have the same power of contracting as that enjoyed by individuals. But the section does apply to the receiving and delivery of goods even before any contract of carriage has been made. Therefore, unreasonable conditions as to the receiving of goods at a station would be void, although there was no contract of carriage in existence (Hodgman v. West Midland Railway Company, 18 W. R. 1054, 83 L. J. Q. B. 283; in Ex. Ch. 13 W. R. 758, 85 L. J. Q. B. 85).

So far there has not been much difficulty in the construction of the section. The next point is as to the form in which contracts under this section ought to be made. Two constructions were originally suggested. The first, that all such conditions as were mentioned in the section were void as general declarations, that no such conditions should be binding as part of a contract of carriage unless they were just and reasonable, or unless they were embodied in a written contract and signed by the consignor. In other words this construction proposed to leave to the companies full power of contracting by any terms to which they and the consignors of goods could agree provided only that the contracts were in a certain form. If not in this form the courts were to have power to consider whether they were just and reasonable (see per Lord Chelmsford in Peck's case). The second suggested construction was that all such conditions, &c., were void, and in addition that no contract of carriage should relieve the companies from liability for the neglect or default of their servants, unless in writing and signed, and also just and reasonable. This latter construction was adopted by the Court of Common Pleas in Simons v. Great Western Railway Company (26 L. J. C. P. 25); and after some doubt, is now clearly to be considered the true construction, as it has been adopted by the majority of the House of Lords in Peck's case; the result of which decision is that any condition limiting the liability of a railway company for their own neglect or default as carriers must be a condition just and reasonable in the judgment of the Court, and must be set out in a written contract signed by or on behalf of the consignor (per Erie, C.J., Aldridge v. Great Western Railway Company, 18 W. R. 43, 83 L. J. O. P. 161). No question is therefore now likely to arise upon the wording of the section as to the form of contract.

The question of most practical importance, and the one that has most frequently occupied the attention of the Courts, is what conditions are just and reasonable? This is a question of law to be decided by the Court in each case (Peck's case), and the Courts are of course necessarily bound by prior decisions on the same subject.

Before reviewing the different contracts under section 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, which have been judicially considered, we must first briefly notice the rules of construction by which the Courts read these contracts. It is now settled that they are to be read in their plain and ordinary sense, whatever may be the result of that construction. It may seem unnecessary to notice that any particular class of contracts is governed by the simple rule of construction which ought to govern all written contract. This construction, however, has not always been applied to contracts by carriers. There was at one time a strong tendency on the part of the Courts to construe contracts which purported to relieve carriers from liability as not excluding liability for the carriers' negligence; that is, these contracts were not read in their ordinary sense, but were strained in order that the carriers might still be liable for their own default. Thus, in Wylde v. Pickford (8 M. & W. 443), the words "not responsible for loss or damage done to goods" were held to mean that the carriers "would not be responsible for loss or damage unless caused by negligence." Of late years, however, the Courts have refused to adopt such a forced construction, and the rule now acted upon is as above stated, that the contracts must be read in their ordinary meaning, whatever may be the result of so doing (see Carr v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, 21 L. J. Ex. 261, and Peck's case; in which latter case this subject is very fully discussed by Blackburn, J.).

The construction of a condition in any particular contract under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act is of course not necessarily a guide for the construction of even a precisely similar clause in any other contract under the same statute. In each case the whole contract must be read, and the ordinary signification of its clauses must be adopted, but such ordinary signification will often depend upon the other terms of the contract in which the clause to be construed is found.

[To be continued.]

EQUITY.

UNREGISTERED COMPANIES—NATURE OF LIABILITY OF CONTRIBUTORIES.

Re Muggeridge, M.B., 18 W. R. 963.

It was decided in this case that calls made in the liquidation of an unregistered company, where the same is being wound up under the Companies Act, 1862, are in the nature of a specialty debt. The liability of any person to contribute to the assets of a company under the Act of 1862 constitutes, as the reader will remember, a debt in the nature of a specialty (section 75), and by section 199 all the provisions of the Act with respect to winding up are to apply to unregistered companies, as defined by the same section. Hence the decision. As the point has not been raised before we call attention to the case, though the distinction between specialty and simple contract debts is growing daily of less importance, since the abolition of the distinction as to priority of payment in the case of persons dying on or after January 1, 1870, by the Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 46.

COMMON LAW.

MARINE INSURANCE—SUING AND LABOURING CLAUSE.

Lee v. The Southern Insurance Company, O.P., 18 W. R. 863.

This decision may be usefully compared with Cory v. Thames Ironworks & Co. Company (16 W. R. 456), which seems to have been decided upon a very similar principle. In Cory v. Thames Ironworks & Co. Company the plaintiff ordered a chattel of the defendants. The plaintiff intended to use it for a very special purpose, which was not known to the defendants, who supposed that it was to be used for a more obvious purpose. The defendants broke their contract, and did not deliver the chattel. The plaintiff in fact suffered damage in consequence of not having the chattel for the intended purpose, to an extent greater than would have been caused if he had only intended to use the chattel for the more obvious purpose. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover an amount equal to the damage which he would have sustained if he had intended the chattel for the use supposed by the defendants. Of course this amount of damage could not have been recovered unless damage to that extent had actually been sustained. Damage to a greater extent had, however, been suffered, and the plaintiff was held entitled to recover for such damage up to the amount which the defendants, at the time of entering into the contract, might have supposed would be the natural result of a breach by them of the contract. A somewhat similar question arose in Lee v. The Southern Insurance Company, but in a very different way. The plaintiff insured freight with the defendants. The vessel was injured on the voyage, and had to put into a port in Wales for repair, and to land the cargo. The plaintiff forwarded the cargo by railway to Liverpool, its port of destination, at a cost of £212, and thereby earned the insured freight. The vessel was subsequently repaired within a reasonable time near where the cargo was landed, and the cargo might have been stored where landed, and subsequently re-shipped on board the plaintiff's vessel. This would have been, under all the circumstances, a reasonable course to adopt, and would have cost £70. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, under the suing and labouring clause in the policy of insurance, £70, as that was the amount which, acting in the most reasonable way, it would have cost to earn the freight, and as he had in fact paid that amount to earn the freight; he could not recover more than the £70, because it was not reasonable that the defendants should be put to any unnecessary expense in the earning of the freight; but he was entitled to the £70, although he did not do that which would have cost the £70. Although Cory v. The Thames Ironworks & Co. and Lee v. The Southern Insurance Company were very dissimilar in their circumstances, the same principle appears to govern them, and they may therefore both be usefully noted as authorities upon that most difficult branch of law—the measure of damages.

"COUNTY BRIDGE"—"HUNDRED BRIDGE"—CONSTRUCTION—HIGHWAY ACT, 1835 (5 & 6 WILL. 4, c. 50), s. 5.

Reg. v. Inhabitants of Chart and Longbridge, Q.B., W. R. 791.

The decision in this case is that the words "county bridge," "hundred bridge," have no technical meaning peculiar to the law, but simply express bridges which the county or the hundred are liable to repair respectively, and therefore that the term "county bridge" might be read as including hundred bridges. The question arose upon the construction of section 5 of the Highway Act, 1835, by which "highways" are defined to include "bridges, not being county bridges." It was held that "highways" under this definition did not include hundred bridges because hundred bridges were included in the words "county bridges." In some statutes a distinction has been drawn between hundred and county bridges, but that is caused by the fact that the former are repaired by hundreds and the latter by counties, and those statutes deal with the machinery for keeping such bridges in repair. The phrases "county bridge" and "hundred bridge" have no distinct legal signification.

EVIDENCE—PRIVILEGE OF WITNESS—WITNESS IMPROPERLY COMPELLED TO ANSWER.

Reg. v. Kinglake, Q.B., 18 W. R. 805.

At the trial of a criminal information for bribery and conspiracy to bribe at an election, a witness was called who refused to answer, on the ground that his answer would tend to criminate himself. He had received a pardon for the acts as to which he was questioned, and was therefore not in danger of being indicted, but he said he was liable to actions for penalties under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, by which private persons may sue anyone who has been guilty of bribery at elections and recover a specified penalty. The witness stated that he was advised that the pardon would not protect him against these actions. Hannen, J., at the trial ruled that the witness must answer and the witness accordingly answered. The defendant was convicted and the witness's evidence was material to the conviction. The defendant moved for a new trial on the ground that this evidence was not admissible. The rule was refused on the broad ground that, even assuming that the witness was privileged from answering the questions objected to, and that therefore the evidence was improperly obtained as against the witness, the defendant had no cause to complain. The privilege was that of the witness, not of the jury. If the witness chose to waive his privilege, and voluntarily to give evidence, the defendant would clearly have had no right to complain, and the Court thought the result must be the same as against the defendant if the witness had been improperly compelled to answer. An opinion was also given on another point of law. The assumption on which the decision was based, viz., that the witness had improperly been compelled to give evidence, was the view most favourable to the defendant. Both Cockburn, C.J., and Blackburn, J., thought, however, although they did not so decide, as it was not necessary to decide the point, that the witness was bound to answer under the circumstances, and that his evidence had not been received improperly. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, by section 2, renders persons guilty of bribery liable to a penalty, which may be recovered by action by any person. The first question was whether a witness is privileged from answering criminal questions where there is no ordinary criminal liability, but only a liability to a penal action. On this general question both the learned judges expressed some doubt, and gave no opinion one way or the other. Section 35, however, of this statute provides that on the trial of actions under section 2 for penalties for bribery, the parties shall be competent and compellable to give evidence as in other actions. Cockburn, C.J., and Blackburn, J., were both of opinion, without deciding the broad question as to privilege from answering questions which might expose to other penal actions, that a witness was not privileged from answering questions which might expose him to penal actions under this statute. As in the action itself for the penalty, the defendant might be compelled to give evidence, there was no privilege to refuse to answer in other proceedings. It would seem therefore that if the accused in criminal proceedings should ever be deemed competent and compellable to give evidence in such proceedings, the principle would put an end to the whole theory of privilege against answering criminal questions. At present, however, this opinion of Cockburn, C.J., and Blackburn, J., has only the authority of a dictum, and not of a decision.

BANKRUPTCY.

STATING LEGAL PROCEEDINGS—EXEMPTION OF GOODS FROM DISTRESS.

Ex parte Russell; Re Russell, C.J. Bkcy., 18 W. R. 753.
Ex parte Croft; Re Lawrence, C.J. Bkcy., 18 W. R. 756.
Re Jordan, C.J. Bkcy. 863.

The 13th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, gives power to a court of bankruptcy, at any time after the presentation of a petition, to "restrain further proceedings in any action, suit, execution, or other legal process against the debtor in respect of any debt provable in bankruptcy." Section 125 applies generally all the provisions of the Act to the case of liquidation by arrangement, making the appointment of a trustee in the liquidation equivalent to adjudication in bankruptcy. Rule 260, having reference to liquidation by arrangement, goes a good deal further, and is a little more explicit than the Act, for it says that the Court may exercise its power to stay proceedings at any time after petition; and it speaks expressly of "process against the debtor or his estate."

The question has arisen in several cases, What is a legal process within the meaning of the Act and rules? and it is of great importance to watch the interpretation put upon such sections of the Act in these early days of its working, for the first few decisions under an Act generally give the key-note to future decisions; and the success or failure of many statutes, particularly those relating to bankruptcy, depends very largely upon the spirit in which they are construed. There can be no doubt, for instance, that a good deal of the opprobrium which has fallen upon the Act of 1861 is mainly due to the unfriendly and even bitter spirit in which it was dealt with by the common law judges during the first two or three years of its existence. It is therefore, as we have said, very important to observe in what spirit—a liberal or a captious spirit—the critical sections of the new Act are being dealt with. Now a sufficient number of the Chief Judge's decisions are by this time before us to enable us to form a pretty fair judgment upon this matter; and anyone who reads those decisions with care can hardly fail to discern, and, discerning it, can hardly fail to approve, an inclination on the part of the learned judge to give the widest possible interpretation to the words of the Act, so as to embrace, as far as may be, all cases fairly within the spirit of its provisions.

In Ex parte Russell it was held to be quite clear that a distress for rent is a legal process such as the Court may restrain. In the same case it was also decided that, under section 72, which gives the Court power "to decide all questions of priorities and all other questions whatsoever, whether of law or fact, arising in any case of bankruptcy, or which the Court may deem it expedient or necessary to decide for the purpose of doing complete justice or making a complete distribution of property in any such case," the Court has jurisdiction to try the title to goods distrained as between the landlord and the trustee in bankruptcy or under a liquidation.

In Re Jordan the Vice-Chancellor held that an ejectment brought by a mortgagee against a mortgagor to recover the mortgaged premises was a "legal process in respect of a debt" (the mortgage debt) "provable"; a decision which seems to us right, though a few years ago the contrary would, we think, have been very apt to be held.

On the other hand, Ex parte Croft decides that where a mortgagee has sold under a power of sale contained in the mortgage deed, even though he may not yet have received the whole of the purchase-money, there is no longer any proceeding pending, and nothing that the Court can restrain.

In Ex parte Russell another point arose of very great general importance, as to which the decision actually arrived at by the learned judge, though it is not without some support from the authorities, is, we think, very much to be regretted. The bankrupt in that case carried on business as a wine warehouseman, and the business consisted of receiving wine either in cask or in bottles, and properly storing and warehousing it. In the course of his business he had upon his premises certain wines, the property of wine merchants, which he had received for the purpose simply of bottling them, and returning them forthwith to their owner, and others which he had received for the purpose of bottling and warehousing them, or of warehousing them simply. It had to be determined whether these wines were or were not liable to be distrained for rent due in respect of the premises upon which they lay. And the learned judge decided that the wines sent merely to be bottled and returned were privileged from distress, but that those warehoused were not.

This is a decision to the effect that wines stored with a wine warehouseman are liable to be distrained by the landlord of the warehouse for rent. This decision must be based either upon the general proposition that goods entrusted to a warehouseman in the course of his business, are liable to distress; or upon the ground that wine warehousemen differ in this respect from other warehousemen. If the latter view be the true one, and there are passages in the judgment which seem to favour it, it is one which requires, in our judgment, stronger reasons to support it than any to be found in the judgment. If the first alternative be that which the learned judge adopted, and if we rightly understand his judgment it is so, then so very important a decision, and one so entirely in conflict with ordinary ideas and ordinary practice, cannot be too widely known.

Many exceptions, it is well known, have always existed to the landlord's right to distrain all chattels found upon the demised premises. One of these exceptions has always been that which is briefly, if not very exactly, expressed by Chief Baron Gilbert, when he says, "Things sent to public places of trade, as cloth in a tailor's shop, yarn to a weaver's, a horse in a smith's forge, and the like, are not distrainable." In the leading case of Simpson v. Hartopp (Will. 512) the things so excepted were thus expressed—"Things delivered to a person exercising a public trade, to be carried, wrought, worked up, or managed in the way of his trade or employ." And this has been the accepted formula ever since, the dispute in each subsequent case being whether the particular goods in question fell within its terms. There never was any doubt that if goods were entrusted to the tenant of the premises to have anything done to them by his labour or skill they were exempt from distress. It was early settled that goods entrusted to a factor for sale were equally privileged (Gilman v. Alton, 2 B. & B. 75). In Thompson v. Roehiter (1 Bing. 283), the same was decided of goods entrusted to a wharfinger for safe custody; and, in Mathias v. Meenard, of goods similarly entrusted to a warehouseman or granary keeper. So in Muspratt v. Gregory (1 M. & W. 633, 3rd ed.), in which it was held that a barge sent by its owners to a salt mine to be filled with salt and left there for some time, was liable to distress, it was so decided on the express ground that it was no necessary part of the mine owner's trade to take charge of other people's barges; and it was treated as clear law that goods deposited with a wharfinger, whose business is to receive other people's goods, were exempt from distress (1 M. & W. 660, 3rd ed.). So, too, in Swire v. Leach the judges of the Common Pleas treat it as beyond all doubt that goods in the hands of a "wharfinger, factor, or warehouse-keeper cannot be distrained." And they carry out the analogy by holding that pledges in the hands of a pawnbroker are likewise exempt from distress. This last case, strangely enough, does not seem to have been cited upon the argument of Ex parte Russell. The learned judge, however, has departed from all these authorities, and has preferred to follow certain dicta of Chief Justice Wilde in Parsons v. Gingell (4 O. B. 545). What was actually decided in that case was that horses or carriages standing at livery with a livery stable-keeper were liable to distress. And, however difficult, if not impossible, it may be to reconcile that decision in point of principle with the other authorities, the Chief Judge would probably be right in following it if the same point were to come before him. But he has done more, he has overruled all the authorities which we have already cited in deference to certain very questionable dicta in that case. The Chief Justice said, during his judgment, p. 558: "The question in all these cases is, whether the goods are placed in the hands of the tenant merely with the intent that they shall remain upon the premises, or with a view of having labour or skill bestowed upon them." As to this we can only say that it is not in accordance with the older modes of stating the law; and it is wholly inconsistent with the law as settled in the case of innkeepers, of wharfingers, and of pawnbrokers. The Chief Judge has, however, followed this dictum by drawing a distinction between the cases of wines sent to be bottled and wines sent to be warehoused. Secondly, in the same case Chief Justice Wilde pointed out what is true, that in Thompson v. Roehiter, and Mathias v. Meenard, the goods in question had been consigned by their owner to a factor, and warehoused by the factor, not the owner, and added—"Corn sent by the owner to a granary keeper, to be kept for him, would not, I apprehend, be within the exception." The distinction, however, between goods warehoused by their owner and goods warehoused by his factor is one for which no rational ground can be assigned; it was expressly repudiated by the Court of Common Pleas in Thompson v. Roehiter; it has never been supported in any subsequent case; and it is wholly inconsistent with Swire v. Leach. The Chief Judge, however, cites the dictum with approval, and makes it the ground of his decision.

For the reason which we have given we think the Chief Judge was wrong if he intended to decide generally that goods entrusted to a warehouseman for safe custody are liable to be distrained by the landlord of the warehouse. But there is a passage in the Chief Judge's judgment tending to show that he may have meant to draw a distinction in the case of wine warehousemen. He says—"It cannot reasonably be said that the depositing wine in another person's cellar is an incident to the trade carried on by the owner of the wine. There is nothing in the nature of his trade which renders it necessary, nor (as far as I know or have any reason from the evidence to believe) is it at all common that he should have a foreign place for depositing the commodity in which he deals." The answer is plain. The trade of the owner of the wine has nothing to do with the question; the trade of the tenant of the premises is the only point to be looked to. If I send my cloth to be made into a coat, or my horse to be shod, their liability to distress does not depend on my trade but on the trade of the tailor or the farrier. This principle is too clear to need authority; but it is plainly pointed out by Parke, B., in Joule v. Jackson (7 M. & W. 450, 452). It follows that if it be, as it clearly is, a necessary incident of a wine warehouseman's business to receive wine for safe keeping, he is in the same position as any other warehouseman or wharfinger.

Aug. 23.—The new Act on absconding debtors.

An application was made for a writ to arrest a debtor about to abscond, and the new Act to facilitate the arrest of absconding debtors (33 & 34 Vict. c. 76) was produced.

WILLES, J., read the following provision:—"The Court may, by warrant addressed to any constable or prescribed officer of the court, cause a debtor to be arrested and safely kept as prescribed until such time as the Court may order, if, after a debtor's summons has been granted in the manner prescribed by the said Act, and before a petition of bankruptcy can be presented against him, it appear to the Court that there is probable reason for believing that he is about to go abroad with the view of avoiding payment of the debt for which the summons has been granted, or of avoiding service of a petition in bankruptcy, or of avoiding appearing to such petition, or of avoiding examination in respect of his affairs, or otherwise avoiding, delaying, or embarrassing proceedings in bankruptcy; provided always that nothing herein contained shall be construed, to alter, or qualify the right of the debtor to apply to the Court in the prescribed manner to dismiss the said summons as in the said Act is provided, or to pay, secure, or compound for the said debt within the time by the said Act provided, without being deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy; and provided also that upon any such payment or composition being made or such security offered as the Court shall think reasonable, the said debtor shall be discharged out of custody, unless the Court shall otherwise order."

His LORDSHIP said the Court in the section he had read meant the Court of Bankruptcy, and he had no power to interfere.

Aug. 23.—Pelgrave v. Clear.

Wages of domestic servants.

The notice necessary during the first month of service held to be the same as at any subsequent period.

This was a claim by a domestic servant for a month's wages. The plaintiff stated that she went into the service on the 7th of June at the wages of £10 a-year. Nothing was said about how the agreement was to be terminated, but she had always understood that during the first fortnight either party was at liberty to give notice to terminate the service at the end of the month. Accordingly, not liking the place, she gave notice on the 19th of June, of her intention to leave on the 7th of July, and left accordingly, when her wages were refused on the ground that she ought to have stayed till the 19th of July. In cross-examination plaintiff admitted that she had received a month's notice to leave, but that was given her at the time she gave notice on the 19th of June, she insisted at the time that she had a right to give a fortnight's notice, and refused to accept the month's notice.

Mr. Mayhew for the defendant said he might accept the facts as stated by the plaintiff, but as she had on her own showing broken her contract, she was not entitled to recover.

She had given only a fortnight's notice, and was told at the time she must stay a month; she had not done so, and was therefore not entitled to any wages.

Mr. CURT said he was not aware of any rule of law which made the first month different from any other month. He thought that as soon as the contract of service was made, it came into full force, and each party was immediately entitled to a month's notice. The plaintiff had not complied with that rule, and had consequently broken her contract. The judgment must be for the defendant.

WANDSWORTH.

(Before H. J. STONOR, Esq., Judge.)

Aug. 16.—Re James Brown's Liquidation.

This was an application to commit the Sheriff of Surrey and his officer, Mr. Keene, for not obeying an order of this Court, in not paying over to the trustee all moneys he had received since the appointment of a receiver.

Mr. Seymour Salaman appeared for the trustee.

Mr. Ody for the sheriff and his officer, Mr. Keene. Personal service not having been, however, effected on the sheriff, no order, therefore, was asked against him.

It appeared that the Sheriff of Surrey and his officer, had been in possession of the bankrupt's property at the Eagle Tavern, York-road, Battersea, on different executions ever since February last, and remained in possession (notwithstanding the appointment of a receiver, who also took possession of the bankrupt's property in May last) until July 12, after the service of an order of this Court directing him to withdraw; and the point really in dispute was whether he was entitled to possession money from February last. He was willing to hand over to the trustee the balance of moneys received by the sheriff, the amount having been agreed upon by the trustee, if his expenses were deducted, and this the trustee refused to allow, as the sheriff had had notice that he had been appointed receiver since May last, and had remained in possession by agreement with the bankrupt previously at his own risk.

For the trustee it was urged that the sheriff's officer, and the bankrupt had been in collusion, and that he should not be allowed his expenses as no sale ever took place of the bankrupt's property, and that having been in possession six months was entirely at his risk and he could not now deduct them from the moneys in his hands, which formed part of the estate of the bankrupt. The sheriff's officer had refused to allow the trustee to receive the takings at the bar, and as he might have refused permission for any of the goods to be sold it was thought, under the circumstances, the best plan that he should receive the takings and account to the trustee. The latter checked the accounts every day.

His HONOUR upon this statement intimated that the trustee had thereby made the sheriff's officer his agent, and he was inclined, therefore, to allow his expenses.

Mr. Salaman again urged that the trustee had done all in his power to obtain possession of the property of the bankrupt, and that if he had insisted upon receiving the takings at the bar the sheriff would not have allowed the goods to be sold, and thereby the house would have been obliged to have been shut up, and he impressed upon the judge that as the trustee was appointed by this Court to take possession, and the sheriff had notice of the fact, he should, when requested, have retired.

Mr. Ody stated that these appointments and injunctions under the new Bankruptcy Act were a source of great difficulty to the sheriff, as in case he had retired as suggested and nothing had come of the bankruptcy, he would have been liable to actions by the several judgment creditors.

His HONOUR stated the proper course under such circumstances was for the trustee to have applied to this Court for an order for the sheriff to withdraw, and the receiver of the Court would then be in possession of the bankrupt's property, provision being made that in the event of no bankruptcy following the sheriff should be reinstated in his position by the receiver, before any order discharging him be made; and he thought that he was entitled to his possession money from the date of the bankruptcy up to the order directing him to withdraw, as he clearly had been the agent of the trustee; and with respect to the expenses from February last, as it appeared it had been for the benefit of the estate, and no evidence of fraud had been tendered by the trustee, and the amount might be small, he should allow that also.

Mr. Ody thereupon stated that his client would give the trustee a cheque for the balance at once, and therefore no order would be required.

DARTFORD.

(Before J. LONSDALE, Esq., Judge.)

Aug. 17.—March v. Middlewood.

Tenant's right to deduct property tax—Proof of payment indispensable as against landlord's claim for rent.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, a Nonconformist minister, for £20 12s. 6d., quarter's rent, and arrears of property tax, on premises situate at Erith, lately occupied by the defendant. The claim, so far as regards £1 17s. 6d., was for one year's property tax, alleged by defendant to have been paid by him, and deducted from the rent. Money was paid into court, with the exception of the £1 17s. 6d. It was admitted by the defendant's solicitor that this amount represented a year's property tax.

Mr. C. R. Gibson, Dartford, for the plaintiff.

Mr. F. Bacon Grey, for the defendant.

The defendant put in evidence a receipt for a former quarter's rent, to prove that the plaintiff was in the habit of allowing the deduction of the tax. After some remarks from the learned judge, Grey said he would contend for one quarter's tax only.

No evidence was given of payment of this tax by Middlewood, it being urged that there was presumption of payment, and the production of the receipt could not be enforced.

Gibson argued contra, that if the defendant had paid the property tax he must put in evidence the receipt, and in the absence of that, prima facie his client was entitled to the entire rent.

His Honour said the defendant must at least give proof of payment of the tax in order to be entitled to deduct the amount from the rent, and that, without such proof, the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for the whole amount.

Verdict for the plaintiff, with costs.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. JOSEPH MARTIN, solicitor, of Pershore, Worcestershire, has been appointed by the Lord Chancellor, on the nomination of Dr. Marsh (coroner of the southern division of Worcestershire), to be Deputy Coroner. Mr. Martin was certificated as a solicitor in Easter Term, 1866, and is also Deputy Clerk to the Pershore Bench of Magistrates, who testified to his fitness and ability to discharge the duties of the office to which he has now been appointed.

Mr. JOHN HOUGHEN, solicitor, of Thetford, Norfolk, has been appointed (by Mr. W. H. Cooke, Q.C., Judge of the Norfolk County Courts), to be Registrar of the Thetford Court, in succession to the late Mr. R. E. Clarke, deceased. Mr. Houghen has also been appointed, by the Town Council of Thetford, to be Deputy Town Clerk, pro tem., until a Town Clerk is appointed in the place of Mr. Clarke. The new registrar was admitted an attorney in Easter Term, 1839.

Mr. WILLIAM HAZLITT, senior registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy, has been appointed Chief Registrar of that Court, in the place of Mr. J. F. Miller, who has retired, after twenty years' service, on his full allowance of £300 per annum.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—DISTRESS.

Sir,—Can one of your subscribers give an answer to the following question?

A lessee makes default in payment of his rent; the landlord sues the lessee in an action of debt for the rent due, upon which the lessee files his petition for arrangement or composition under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and a composition of five shillings in the pound is accepted by the creditors; the landlord of course not being one of the assenting creditors. There is no sufficient distress on the premises. Can the landlord commence an action of ejectment against the lessee on the ground of non-payment of rent? It is assumed the landlord's action of debt is restrained by injunction under the Act of 1869. A.B.C.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

Eliza Walker, Appellant; v. Joseph S. Beal and Alexander S. Wheeler, Executors of William J. Walker, Deceased.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.

DAVIS, J., delivered the opinion of the Court.—This is a bill in equity to charge the estate of Dr. William J. Walker, in the hands of his executors, with a trust in favour of his widow. The Court below found that the trust existed and was valid, and this appeal seeks to review that decision as erroneous. A short history of the facts of the case, on which it is claimed the alleged trust is founded, is necessary in order to a clear understanding of the legal points of difference between the parties. In the month of September, 1845, Dr. Walker, a citizen of Charlestown, Massachusetts, without cause compelled his wife and two of their children to leave his house. Before this time he had treated his wife with great harshness and cruelty, proceeding so far as to inflict personal violence on her. This conduct entitled the wife, by the laws of Massachusetts, to a decree of divorce from bed and board, and for a proper allowance of alimony; and with a view to obtain these, she applied to counsel to take legal proceedings against her husband. On learning this Dr. Walker sought the advice of his friend, Uriel Crocker, and wished him to confer with a lawyer on the subject. This friendly service was performed by Mr. Crocker, and the conference resulted in recommending the husband to settle on his wife 50,000 dolrs., and that articles of separation between them be executed. It was considered the sum agreed on was a suitable settlement under the circumstances, as the greater part of it had been obtained by the husband from the estate of the wife's father, and as he was without this a person of large fortune.

The parties adopted the recommendation of Mr. Crocker and his conferee, and on that basis the articles of separation were drawn and executed. By these articles Dr. Walker transferred to trustees, in trust for his wife, the agreed amount of property, and directed the income to be paid to her during her life. This transfer was, however, on the express condition that Mrs. Walker should release her possibility of dower, when asked to do so, to all the real estate he should sell during his lifetime, and if she survived him, that she should release her right of dower to his entire estate. The trustees covenanted to indemnify the husband from all payment of alimony thereafter, and the deed contained a stipulation that if the parties should afterwards come together the trust should remain, and be executed in like manner, as if they should live separate. The parties continued to live apart, after the execution of these articles, until the month of April, 1846, when Mrs. Walker returned to her husband at his request, and lived with him until June, 1860, when she abandoned his house on account of his cruel treatment of herself and daughters, and remained away from him during the residue of his life. The main controversy in this case grows out of transactions which occurred after Mrs. Walker returned to her husband's house, and before her final separation from him. It is claimed on behalf of the complainant, that while living with her husband he took from her the income secured by the deed of trust, and which was her separate estate, under an express agreement to invest it for her use, and that he made himself her trustee for that purpose. Having failed to comply with his agreement, his executors are asked to account.

In this condition of the record two principal questions are presented for consideration:

1st. Is the trust created by the articles of separation in this case valid, and will a court of equity enforce it?

2ndly. Can a husband be a trustee for his wife? and if so, did Dr. Walker constitute himself such a trustee or not?

It is contended that deeds of separation between husband and wife cannot be upheld, because it is against public policy to allow parties sustaining that relation to vary their duties and responsibilities by entering into an agreement which contemplates a partial dissolution of the marriage contract. If the question were before us, unaffected by decision, it would present difficulties, for it cannot be doubted that there are serious objections to voluntary separations between married persons. But contracts of this nature for the separate maintenance of the wife, through the intervention of a trustee, have received the sanction of the courts in England and in this country for so long a period of time that the law on the subject must be considered as settled (Compton v. Collison, 2 Brown's C. C. 377; Worrall v. Jacob, 3 Mervale, 266; Lee v. Thurlow, 2 B. & C. 546; Webster v. Webster, 1 Smale & Gef. 489, 23 Eng. L. & E. 216, 4 De G. M. & G. 489, 17 Eng. L. & E. 278; Rumole v. Gould, 8 El. & Bl. 457; Carson v. Murray, 3 Paige, 483; Nichols v. Palmer, 5 Day, 47; Hutton v. Day, 3 Barr, 100; Battle v. Wilson, 14 Ohio, 257; Chapman v. Grey, 8 Geo. 341; Reed v. Beasley, 1 Blackford, 97; Wells v. Stout, 9 California, 494; Dellinger's Appeal, 35 Pa. 357; Gaines v. Poor, 3 Metcalf, Ky. 503; Hunt v. Hunt, judgment by Lord Westbury in 6 Law Times Rep. 778).

It is true that different judges, in discussing the question, have struggled against maintaining the principle; but while doing so they have not felt themselves at liberty to disregard it, on account of the great weight of authority with which it was supported, and have, therefore, uniformly adhered to it. It is unnecessary to consider whether the extent to which the doctrine has been carried meets our approbation, nor are we required to discuss the subject in any aspect which this case does not present. It is enough for the purposes of this suit to say that a covenant by the husband for the maintenance of the wife, contained in a deed of separation between them, through the medium of trustees, where the consideration is apparent, is valid and will be enforced in equity, if it appears that the deed was not made in contemplation of a future possible separation, but in respect to one which was to occur immediately, or for the continuance of one that had already taken place. And this is especially true if the separation was occasioned by the misconduct of the husband, and the provision for the wife's support was reasonable under the circumstances, and no more than a Court, before which she was entitled to carry her grievances, would have decreed to her as alimony. In this state of the law on the subject it is clear the deed of settlement in controversy was unobjectionable. It is equally clear that the separation accomplished by it was the best thing for the parties at the time, and that it ultimately led to a re-union which lasted over fourteen years. The evidence shows that the bad conduct of Dr. Walker to his wife justified her in leaving him, and entitled her to a legal separation at the hands of a Court, with alimony in proportion to the value of his estate. For many reasons, which are apparent without stating them, it was desirable, if possible, to avoid a judicial investigation, and accordingly, negotiations to this end were commenced on the part of the husband, which resulted in securing to the wife a suitable provision for her support. This settlement was made by him, and accepted by her, not only in lieu of alimony, which she could have obtained, but also in place of dower; and the covenant of the trustees against any future claim of alimony, and their agreement that the wife's debts should be paid out of the property conveyed to them, furnished the security to the husband for the permanent arrangement contemplated by the parties. If we consider that the value of the property transferred to the trustees for the benefit of the wife was but little more than the husband received in her right from her father's estate, and that, at the time, he was worth between three and four hundred thousand dollars, it would seem the provision for the wife's maintenance was less than she had a right to demand and ought to have received. If the law authorises a wife to leave her husband on account of cruel treatment, and to get from him a competent support, it cannot withhold its sanction to the articles of separation concluded between these parties under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence in this case. It is insisted the obligation of the trust was discharged when the wife returned to her husband's house, but this is a mistaken view of the effect of the instrument. It was the intention of the parties that the arrangement should be permanent, and to accomplish that purpose the agreement was framed so that the wife should enjoy her separate estate during life, although she should subsequently become reconciled to her husband, and cohabit with him. We can see no valid objection to such a provision, and it is certainly supported by authority (Wilson v. Mussett, 3 B. & A. 742; Bell on Husband and Wife, 525-541). The husband had a right to make a settlement upon his wife without any view to separation, and the insertion of this provision shows that he did not intend the settlement to cease on the return of the wife to cohabitation. There is no good reason why effect should not be given to the intention of the parties on the subject. If, on grounds of public policy, it is desirable that the parties should be reconciled, whatever tends to promote such a result will receive the favourable consideration of a court of equity. Without this provision there was no inducement for Mrs. Walker to return to her husband; with it she could try to live with him again, and if his previous bad treatment was repeated she was fortified against the contingency of being turned away another time penniless. There was nothing in his previous conduct to inspire her with confidence in his subsequent good behaviour, and but for the fact that the means of support were secured to her in case her life became intolerable with him, it is reasonable to infer that she would never have ventured to cohabit with him after the separation. It is clear, then, that this trust was operative during the life of the wife, and that a court of equity will enforce it.

The next inquiry relates to transactions which occurred after the wife returned to her husband at his request, and on which the claim for relief in this case is based. That a husband may be a trustee for his wife, and can be compelled in equity to account for any money or property belonging to her which he has received, in the same manner that a stranger would be held to account, is a doctrine so well settled that it hardly requires a citation of authorities to sustain it (2 Kent's Com. 163, and cases cited; 2 Story's Eq. s. 1380; Neuer v. Scott, 9 Howard, 212; Woodward v. Woodward, 8 L. T. N. S. 749; Grant v. Grant, 12 L. T. N. S. 721).

It makes no difference whether the property which he has received was settled by him upon his wife, or came to her through other sources. If the property was his own separate and exclusive estate and he has agreed to become her trustee respecting it, his liability attaches, and he will be charged with the trust. The property settled upon Mrs. Walker by the articles of separation was her separate estate, and to be enjoyed by her in the same manner as if it had been conveyed to trustees for her benefit, by settlement before marriage. The income secured to her was not suspended by her returning to live with her husband, on his solicitation, nor had he any right to retain it by way of set-off against the expense of her living. If for any cause he desired the state of separation to cease, and invited his wife to return, it was his duty, as it should have been his pleasure, out of his abundant means, to have given her a decent support. What then is the evidence touching the question whether Dr. Walker constituted himself the trustee for his wife in respect to the income derived from her separate estate? In September, 1846, when the first payment was due under the deed of trust, Dr. Walker went to Mr. Crocker, the managing trustee, with an order for the money from his wife, who was then living with him, and stated that she had agreed that he should invest the amount for her, with the sum of one thousand dollars previously paid to her at Crocker's request.

On the occasion of the second payment, which was made to the wife in person, as were all the rest, Miss Emily Walker testifies that her father wished her mother to give him the money unconditionally, as she had no need of it, but the request was declined. The subject was discussed between the parties for several days, and finally Mrs. Walker surrendered the cheques for the money, on the promise of her husband to invest them for her at the time he received them. The same discussion ensued when the next payment was made, and the same struggle occurred on the part of the husband to get the money from the wife without any promise, and with the same result—his agreement to invest it for her. The discussion and struggle were renewed on the occasion of the receipt by the wife of the third payment, and was ended by the husband promising the wife to invest the cheque then on hand and all future cheques he should receive from her for her benefit. After this there was quiet in the family, and Mrs. Walker, relying on the faith of her husband's promise, paid to him, while she remained in his house, the successive cheques as they were received from the trustee. In 1855 Dr. Walker was very ill, and in taking a retrospect of his past life the neglect to invest the money he had received from his wife affected his conscience and troubled him a great deal, as was natural under the circumstances. He said it ought to have been done; it was her money and all she had; but the difficulty had been to find a safe investment.

At another time he desired Crocker to go to his house and pay his wife the money which was then due, as he had a good chance to invest it, having previously requested him to defer the payment on account of his apprehension that she would be unwilling to have it invested for her, as he wished to do. But it is unnecessary to pursue this investigation further, for the evidence is clear and uncontradicted that Dr. Walker received the rents and incomes of his wife's estate, from her, on the condition to which he agreed, that he would invest them for her benefit as they were received, and this agreement imposed on him the character of a trustee as to this property. To hold otherwise would be to sanction the grossest fraud. It is not necessary to create the trust that the husband should use any particular form of words, nor need those words be in writing. All that is required is that language should have been employed equivalent to a declaration of trust. That the words which Dr. Walker used constituted him the trustee of his wife, cannot admit of controversy. An attempt is made to discredit the principal witness, by whom the important facts of the case are proved, but it has wholly failed. Her narrative of the occurrences which led to the separation, and of the transactions out of which the trust arises, is intelligently given, does not vary on cross-examination, and bears the impress of truth.

It is insisted that this suit should have been brought in Rhode Island, because Dr. Walker had his domicile in that State when he died, and his will is proved there. But the will was also proved in Massachusetts, where ancillary administration was obtained; and if, as is conceded in such a case, the assets received and inventoried by the executors there are liable to the claims of the citizens of Massachusetts, the citizens of other States will be placed on the same footing in this respect, in the federal courts sitting in Massachusetts, where there is no suggestion of insolvency. The circuit courts of the United States, with full equity powers, have jurisdiction over executors and administrators, where the parties are citizens of different States, and will enforce the same rules in the adjustment of claims against them that the local courts administer in favour of their own citizens (Greene's Admr. v. Creighton, 23 Howard, 90; Harvey v. Richards, 1 Mason, 381).

It is urged that Mrs. Walker is estopped from setting up this claim because she was a party to the indenture of compromise. But if so, she was only a formal party to it, received nothing under it, and was not concerned with the residue of the estate, which it proposed to adjust only after the debts, legacies, and liabilities were paid. Having done nothing to conceal her claim, nor imposed upon the parties to the compromise respecting it, she cannot be considered as having waived her right to prosecute it.

But if this defence is overruled, it is nevertheless contended that Mrs. Walker, by accepting the provisions of her husband's will, waived her right to institute this suit; but this is giving an effect to the acceptance not warranted by the terms of the will, or anything connected with the case. Dr. Walker in his will saw fit to make a limited provision for his wife, and to declare that it was to be received, with the income under the trust deed, in full satisfaction of dower in his estate. Nothing is said about the other trust under which he received the separate property of his wife to be invested, and it is hard to see how his estate can be released from accounting for it, or the status of the complainant affected, because she consents to take under the will what is given her in satisfaction of dower.

It is objected that the executors are not liable to this suit because it was commenced within one year after they gave bonds for the discharge of their trust (see Gen. Stat. of Mass. c. 97, s. 16). But this defence is not now open to the respondents. To have availed themselves of it, it was necessary that it should have been presented at the earliest stage of the proceedings. In not doing so, they will be considered as having waived their right to insist that the suit was brought too soon.

The remaining questions in this case relate to the exceptions of the parties to the master's report. In dealing with these exceptions, it seems to us that all we are required to notice is embraced in three different points of inquiry:

First. Did the master err in allowing Dr. Walker 2,400 dols. as a second deduction from the income of the trust property?

Secondly. Should the interest charged against the trustee be compounded annually, or semi-annually?

Thirdly. Was the trustee entitled to any compensation for his services?

The solution of the first inquiry depends on the effect to be given exhibit B. attached to the bill in this case, which is a receipt or memorandum signed by the complainant, bearing date March 27, 1847. The complainant insists in the adjustment of the account the master mistook the effect of the instrument, and that he should have allowed as a credit against her 1,500 dols. instead of 2,400 dols. It is not easy, after this lapse of time, to tell the exact basis on which the accounts should be settled with reference to this receipt. It was a memorandum made when the parties were living in harmony, and after Dr. Walker had undertaken to invest for his wife the first cheque delivered to him by her, and after her purpose was manifest that the entire income of her estate should be invested to provide against the contingencies of the future. And yet this memorandum shows that she so far modified this purpose as to authorise her husband to give for her 1,200 dols. to each of her two sons, and expressed the intention of making an equal donation to her other children. The matter was probably adjusted between the parties, and, although there is no proof on the subject, the circuit court, doubtless, in approving this part of the master's report, acted on the idea that by long acquiescence it should be treated as having been settled. We cannot say that this view of the subject is wrong, and the exception is therefore overruled.

Secondly. The next exception relates to the manner of computing interest. That Dr. Walker acted in utter disregard of his trust, is too plain for controversy. He treated the money as his own; neither kept nor rendered any account of his trust, and his conduct throughout is irreconcilable with the intention to perform his agreement. There is not a shadow of excuse for his neglect. The reason assigned for it to his daughter, when on his sick bed, that he had not been able to find safe investments for the money was the merest pretence. It could not be otherwise, as he was an intelligent man, of large wealth, and well informed on the subject of investing moneys. The condition of his estate shows that he had abundant opportunities for profitable investment on his own account; and if so, how can it truthfully be said he could not find safe investments for the small sums in his hands belonging to his wife? A court of equity, the especial guardian of trusts, will not tolerate excuses of this sort on the part of a trustee, for omitting to discharge his duty to his cestui que trust. There is, therefore, no hesitation in the Court to allow, in the adjustment of the trustee's account, the interest to be compounded annually. It has been argued with earnestness that this is a case of severe treatment, and that the master should have allowed semi-annual rests, but we are not at liberty to discuss the subject, as the Court are equally divided in opinion upon the question which it presents.

Thirdly. The master was wrong in allowing any compensation to the trustee for his services, and the exception taken to that part of his report is, therefore, sustained.

To hold that, in a case like this, the trustee should be allowed compensation, when he literally did nothing towards executing his trust, but on the contrary was guilty of the grossest abuses concerning it, would be a departure from correct principle.

The sustaining this exception renders a modification of the decree in the Circuit Court necessary. That court passed a decree in favour of the complainant for 81,750.85 dols. It should have been increased by the addition of 1,682.38 dols., which sum was deducted, in the account stated, for the trustee's services.

The decree of the Circuit Court is therefore modified, on the basis that the complainant, at the time it was rendered, was entitled to recover from the respondents the sum of 83,433.23 dols.

Interest will follow from the date of the decree, at the rate allowed on judgments and decrees in Massachusetts.

A portion of the legislators of Connecticut seem not to be proud of the decided pre-eminence which that state has achieved in the divorce business. An attempt was recently made in the assembly to strike out of the divorce law that part known as the "omnibus clause," which is the clause that permits divorces to be granted for "any such misconduct as permanently defeats the purposes of the marriage relation." The judiciary committee reported in favour of striking out the clause, but the House, after a lengthy discussion, declined to concur with the report. The Hartford Post asserts that the legal talent of the assembly was opposed to making any change.—Albany Law Journal.

OBITUARY.

RIGHT HON. SIR F. POLLOCK, BART.

The death of the Right Hon. Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart., who for twenty-two years was Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer, took place at Hatton, near Hounslow, Middlesex, on the 22nd of August, at the advanced age of eighty-seven years. The deceased baronet, whose family was of Scottish extraction, was a son of the late Mr. David Pollock, of Piccadilly, by the daughter of Richard Parsons, Esq., Receiver-General of Customs. He was born on the 23rd of September, 1783, and was a younger brother of the late Sir David Pollock, who died as Chief Justice of Bombay in 1847; and elder brother of Field-Marshal Sir George Pollock, G.C.B., G.C.S.I., who took a distinguished part in the Afghan war, and still survives. Frederick Pollock was educated at St. Paul's School, and proceeded, in 1803, to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was in the first class in every examination, and achieved the position of senior wrangler and Smith's prizeman in 1806. In the following year he was elected a fellow of Trinity College, and graduated M.A. in 1809. He was called to the bar by the Hon. Society of the Middle Temple in 1807, being the same year that he received his fellowship, and went the Northern Circuit, where he soon attained great success and a wide reputation, but was not made a King's Counsel till 1827. For many years he led the Northern Circuit, and had a most extensive business in London and Westminster, being retained in almost every cause of importance. In 1831, when the reform agitation was at its height, Mr. Pollock was returned, in the Tory interest, one of the members for Huntingdon, which constituency he continued to represent till his elevation to the bench in April, 1844. On the formation of Sir Robert Peel's first administration, in 1834, Mr. Pollock was selected for the post of Attorney-General, and received the customary honour of knighthood; and Sir Frederick was re-appointed to the same office on Sir Robert Peel's second accession to power, in September, 1841. In April, 1844, on the death of Lord Abinger, Sir Frederick Pollock was nominated to succeed him as Lord Chief Baron of Her Majesty's Court of Exchequer, and was then sworn a member of the Privy Council. Sir Frederick held his judicial office with the highest ability and credit for two and twenty years, and retired in July, 1866, on the third accession to power of Lord Derby, when he made way for the Right Hon. Sir FitzRoy Kelly, the present Lord Chief Baron. On this occasion he was offered and accepted a baronetcy (to which he was gazetted in August, 1866) and a pension, to which he was entitled by length of service.

Sir Frederick Pollock's distinguishing qualities at the bar are well described in the Times:—"His success was owing not so much to any showy qualities or attractive powers as a speaker, for these he never possessed, as to the extraordinary reputation for industry and general ability which had followed him from Cambridge to London, and from London to the great cities of the north, supported and confirmed as it was by the accurate and extensive legal knowledge which he displayed on every occasion on which his services were called for. Hence he had many clients from the very outset, and never knew what it was to sit waiting for a brief. His business in the courts of Westminster, always select and lucrative, grew more and more extensive, and after a successful practice of some twenty years he obtained the well-earned dignity of a silk gown, being made a King's Counsel in 1827. From this time forward his progress was still more rapid than before; for many years he engrossed the leading business of his circuit, and found himself retained in nearly every cause of importance. 'Attorneys and suitors,' says one who knew him well at this period, 'alike thought themselves safe when they had secured his services, and not unfrequently were left lamenting when they were told that their adversaries had forestalled them.'"

But it is as a judge that almost the whole of the present generation of lawyers have known Sir Frederick Pollock. The Court of Exchequer varied greatly in power and in public estimation during the long period for which Sir Frederick Pollock presided over it. In his early days, while Parke and Alderson were among his puisnes, the Court stood at least as high in the confidence of the public as any English court has ever done. In his later days the reputation of the Court and the amount of business done in it greatly declined. But it was in no sense due to the Chief Baron that so ill-assorted a team as the barons of the Exchequer pulled ill together. The peculiar characteristics of Sir Frederick Pollock as a judge never changed. The first thing that struck everyone who had seen and listened to him on the bench, was his strongly-marked individuality. Nothing that he said or did ever seemed for a moment commonplace or conventional. No one could sit in his court for half an hour without feeling that he was in the presence of a very uncommon man. He had too a wonderful command of what we may call judicial eloquence. His judgments, whether right or wrong in the result (and every judge is sometimes wrong), were works of art; they stated the premises from which he started, and the conclusions at which he arrived in their logical order. He never fell into the ordinary slipshod style of modern judges, who merely give you their ideas in the chronological order in which they happen to have passed through their own minds. His language was always well chosen and singularly accurate; his illustrations always felicitous; and his manner and delivery, even in old age, were emphatic and impressive to a very rare degree. Much of his power arose from the high moral tone that ran as an under-current through everything. There were many more learned lawyers among his contemporaries on the bench, but few abler men, and very few more useful judges.

He succeeded in the title by his eldest son, now Sir William Frederick Pollock, one of the Masters of the Court of Exchequer, who was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in January, 1838. A separate notice of the numerous family of the deceased baronet will be found elsewhere.

MR. J. P. WILLIAMS.

Mr. John Price Williams, barrister-at-law, died at The College, Shrewsbury, on the 14th of August, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. The late Mr. Williams was called to the bar at the Middle Temple on the 3rd of May, 1839, and formerly practiced as a conveyancer.

MR. E. S. CAMPBELL.

Mr. Edward Selby Campbell, barrister-at-law, died at Camberwell on the 17th August, at the early age of thirty-two years. The deceased gentleman was the last surviving son of the late Dr. John Campbell, of the Tabernacle, Finsbury, and was called to the bar at the Middle Temple on the 30th of April, 1868. Mr. Campbell was a member of the Parliamentary reporting staff of the Morning Advertiser.

MR. R. E. CLARKE.

Mr. Robert Eagle Clarke, solicitor, of Thetford, Norfolk, died at that place on the 9th of August. The late Mr. Clarke was certificated as an attorney in Hilary Term, 1842, and held the following local offices:—Town Clerk, Clerk to the Burial Board, Clerk to the Magistrates, Coroner and Registrar of the County Court. He was also clerk to the Thetford Association for the Prosecution of Felons.

Mr. Edward Jackson, solicitor, of Walsollen House, Wisbeach, the senior partner in the firm of E. F. & E. H. Jackson, has withdrawn from the partnership, which will now be carried on under the style of F. & E. Jackson.

Sir Edward Smirke, barrister-at-law, late Vice-Warden of the Stannaries Court of Devon and Cornwall, upon whom the honour of knighthood was recently conferred, is the fourth son of the late Robert Smirke, Esq., R.A., a distinguished painter, and a younger brother of the late Sir Robert J. Smirke, R.A., formerly one of the architects to the Board of Works and Public Buildings. He was born in 1796, and is therefore in his 74th year; and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A., in 1816, and proceeded M.A. in 1820. Sir Edward was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in November, 1824, and for many years practised as a special pleader on the Western Circuit, and was for some time Recorder of Southampton; he also held successively the offices of Solicitor-General and Attorney-General to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales for his Duchy of Cornwall, which latter office he relinquished in 1854, on becoming Vice-Warden of the Court of Stannaries, which he has recently resigned. Sir Edward Smirke is a magistrate for the county of Cornwall. He married, in 1838, Harriet Amelia, youngest daughter of Mr. Thomas Neill, of Arlington House, Turnham-green, Middlesex.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

Very great stagnation has prevailed in all markets during the past week, and for the last few days the general impression that the war is likely to be of longer duration, that had previously appeared probable, has had a most depressing effect upon prices. The funds have declined during the last two days, and in the railway market, a similar tendency is apparent. On Thursday the bank rate of discount was reduced to 4 per cent. Money is abundant.

The report of the Royal Insurance Company for 1869, read at the annual meeting on the 5th inst., presents the following satisfactory results:—In the fire department the premiums for the period amount to £485,180, and the losses to £290,685, being an increase of premium and a decrease of loss as compared with the corresponding totals of the preceding twelve months. The net profit of this department, including interest, amounts to £78,154, which, with a single exception, is the largest surplus that has been announced as the result of a year's operations since the establishment of the company. The results of the business in the life department for the last twelve months have been as follow:—Total income from premiums, after deducting re-assurances, £213,420, of which the 1,248 new proposals completed during the year have contributed £19,003; interest from investments, £46,162; the claims, including payments of bonus additions, £104,383; and after payment of all claims, annuities, and expenses of every description, the amount added to the life funds for the year is £133,059. After providing for the payment of the dividend and bonuses, which amounted together to 10s. per share, the funds of the company stand as follows:—Capital paid up £289,095; reserve fund and profit and loss account, £286,925 10s.; life assurance funds, £173,401 9s. 1d.

Messrs. Longman have in the press "The Lives of the Lord Chancellors of Ireland from the Earliest Times to the Reign of Queen Victoria." By R. O'Flanagan, barrister-at-law.

THE LEEDS BANKRUPTCY COURT.—The Lord Chancellor has decreed the amount of retiring allowances and compensation to be paid to the officials connected with the late district court of bankruptcy at Leeds. Mr. Commissioner Ayrton, Mr. Young, official assignee, and Mr. Rawlinson, usher, retire on their full salaries. Messrs. J. Stephen and J. A. Yorke, registrars, and Mr. C. C. Templer, messenger, retire on pensions of two-thirds of their respective salaries—namely, to each of the registrars, £666 13s. 4d., and to Mr. Templer, £280 per annum. Messrs. Gordon, Birkenshaw, and Pickering, the three principal clerks of the official assignee's office at Leeds, Sheffield, and Hull will each receive a gratuity of over £600, estimated on the basis of a month's salary for every month's service. Mr. William Harpham, messenger's principal assistant, will be awarded about the same amount; and Mr. John Holland, messenger's clerk at Leeds, will receive under £300. The three head bailiffs (Messrs. Outhwaite, Chadwick, and Butterfield) will receive pensions of between £50 and £60 each; so will Mr. John Rhodes, second clerk to Mr. Young, official assignee. It is expected that the doors of the Leeds Bankruptcy Court will be finally closed about the end of September, when the official assignee will not have more than a dozen estates which have not been wound up from causes beyond his control, to hand over to the county court.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 3, 1870.

THE STATUTE-BOOK FOR THE PRESENT YEAR leads off with even more than its usual brilliancy. The first section of the first Act in the book contains a blunder of the first magnitude, a blunder so complete as to reduce the section to a dead letter.

The object of the section is to enable select committees of either House of Parliament, upon bills for confirming provisional orders, in certain cases to award costs to the parties before them. Accordingly it enacts that "any select committee of either House of Parliament to which any bill for confirming provisional orders has been referred, may award costs in like manner and subject to the same conditions as costs may be awarded by any select committee empowered to award costs by the Act of the 28th Vict. c. 28, and the provisions of the said Act, so far as they are applicable, shall refer to such select committees, and to the matters so referred to them." This section purports to give to the select committees in question the powers as to costs, whatever they may be, which are given to some other kind of select committee by the 28th Vict. c. 28. To see what these powers are, we of course turn at once to the 28th Vict. c. 28. We find it to be "an Act to authorise certain payments out of the land revenues of the Crown to provide compensation for certain claims in the Isle of Man;" and its one section has a good deal to do with Acts of Tynwald, but nothing to do with select committees or with costs. The preceding Act, 28 Vict. c. 27, does, it is true, empower select committees on private bills to award costs; and no doubt this was the Act intended to be applied; but unfortunately it is not mentioned.

We can only suggest that the first section of the first Act of next session should be a section to correct the blunder of the first section of the first Act of last session, and to give it some sense and some operation.

IT WAS ONLY TO BE EXPECTED that much excitement should be produced among the public by the announcement made in the French Chambers that forty thousand rifles were being manufactured in England for the French Government, and by the statements which have since appeared in the newspapers that a trade in arms is now being largely carried on between England and France. It was only to be expected too that these revelations should lead to the display of a good deal of looseness of conception as to the duties of neutrals, and a good deal of rashness in suggestions for remedying a mischief real or supposed.

At the risk of being tedious we must repeat what we have more than once said before, and what cannot be too clearly understood, that no rule of international law is violated when the subjects of a neutral state sell contraband of war, including arms, to a belligerent. It is the right of neutrals so to trade—a right which was freely exercised by Prussian subjects during the Crimean war, and by British subjects during the American war, and which has in fact been exercised during every modern war by any manufacturing nation which has found itself in the happy condition of neutrality. It is for the belligerents to protect their own shores as well as they can by seizing contraband goods when they can catch them.

It cannot be too clearly understood again that a trade in contraband of war, including arms, carried on by neutrals with a belligerent is a perfectly lawful trade according to our own municipal law. And we believe the municipal law of all the other great nations to be the same. When the recent Foreign Enlistment Bill was before Parliament, a strong effort was made to add arms to the things the sale of which to a belligerent is prohibited by that Act; and Parliament, under the advice of the Government, deliberately refused to alter the existing law on the subject. Whether the decision was a wise one or not is a question fairly opened to controversy, and we have not a word to say against those who protest against it most strongly. On the one hand the free export of arms to one belligerent nation is very apt to excite in the other that soreness of feeling which is too often the beginning of worse mischief. On the other hand, the history of the past teaches us that municipal law is very apt to create international law; rules for the guidance of our own citizens to develop into international obligations; and we may well hesitate before, in our own case, we add to the burdens of neutrality.

But another view has been put forward, of which we must speak very differently. By the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, s. 150, her Majesty may, by proclamation or Order in Council, prohibit the export of arms from the United Kingdom. And it has been loudly urged that, in the spirit, if not in the letter, the rules of neutrality require the Government to stop the sale of arms to France by thus prohibiting their export. Now it must be remarked, in the first place, that, though the power of the Crown now rests upon an Act of the present reign, the enactment is only a repetition of earlier ones. The special reservation of this power is at least as old as the 12 Chas. 2, c. 4. In early times it would have been unnecessary, for reasons depending upon the state of the law, which we need not here consider. We need scarcely say that in the days of Charles II. Acts of Parliament for the better enforcement of the duties of neutrality had never been thought of; and in fact there can be no doubt that the power of the Crown was given for the protection of ourselves, by preventing arms being sent abroad when we want them at home, or when they might be used against us, not for the protection of others, or the better discharge of our neutral duties. It is true, however, that the power is general, and we could not say that it might not, under some circumstances, be used in the interests of neutrality. It has, in fact, we believe, been so used, but only under quite exceptional circumstances. If we are not mistaken, during the war between Spain and her revolted South American Colonies, the export of arms to either belligerent was prohibited. But why? Because we were already bound by treaty to prevent their export to the revolted colonies; and the Government of the day considered that, as they could not permit the trade with both, they would best consult neutrality by permitting it with neither.

No such special circumstances exist in the case of the present war. Our Legislature has deliberately adopted as the general rule—the general condition of our neutrality during any war—that of free trade in arms with the belligerents. If our Government are to be called upon, or consent, to intervene and alter this rule according to their own judgment and upon their own responsibility, they will certainly not diminish the risk of dissatisfaction on the part of the belligerents, or of the appearance of partiality in ourselves. If a Prussian were asked to state the case in favour of an Order in Council at this moment he would probably state it thus:—Prussia does not want your arms; and if she did the French fleet could effectually prevent her getting them. France does want them; and Prussia has no fleet to prevent her getting them. It is idle to talk of selling to both alike when you know that only one either will or can come and buy.—This is plausible; and the only answer, a not very satisfactory one, is, that we have followed the rules of international law, and of our municipal law. We open our market to all alike, and that is all we have to do with; whether you can come and buy or not is not our concern. But suppose our Government were now to intervene and prohibit the export of arms, might not a Frenchman then say:—This is a prohibition in name applying to both belligerents, but in fact, as you well know, affecting only France. If any rule of international law or of your general municipal law had pressed hardly upon us, we should have had no right to complain; but this is an exception in your law specially made to our disadvantage; that is not neutrality—surely this complaint would be at least as difficult to answer as the other.

We are far from saying that one rule on this subject may not be much better than the other; and it may be very right that Parliament should re-consider the whole question. But we do say that, whatever rule be adopted, it will always in fact operate unequally upon the two belligerents, and so give rise to dissatisfaction and complaints. The way to reduce those complaints to a minimum and best show our neutrality is to adhere to a fixed and uniform rule without respect of persons. The way to aggravate complaint to the uttermost, and place our conduct in the most unfavourable light in the eyes of international jurists and of all impartial men, is to change our rule of conduct according to the particular circumstances of each war. Yet this is what the Government are now asked to do.

THE EXTRAORDINARY DIFFERENCE between the punishments ordinarily awarded for offences against property and offences against the person has often been the subject of remark. This difference is often not only explicable, but justifiable by the consideration that offences against property are ordinarily committed by habitual offenders, while with offences against the person this is much less frequently the case. But there are cases that admit of no such explanation or justification. On Wednesday, according to the daily papers, two men were charged before Mr. Newton at the Worship-street Police Court, with stealing a horse and cart. In the course of the proceedings we read that—

“Herbert Reeves, warder of the Coldbath-fields House of Correction, proved that in July, 1869, the prisoner Gashion was sentenced to nine months' hard labour for stealing a horse and cart, there being five other charges of fraud and felony against him at the same time.

“Mr. Newton expressed his great surprise at such a sentence, remarking that he had never heard of so inadequate a punishment. Penal servitude for several years would have saved the present trouble, and the country expense.”

If Mr. Newton could have known of a case which on the very same day came before Mr. Ellison at the Westminster Police Court, he would have met with an instance of punishment (if punishment we may call it) at least as inadequate as that of nine months' hard labour for stealing a horse and cart. We read that—“John James, labourer, was charged with assaulting his son, a boy ten years of age.

“Austin Porter, 42 B R. and James Wilson, 33 B R. stated that many complaints had been made of the prisoner's brutal conduct to this boy, and on Tuesday evening they were fetched to the cottages, and found the boy half-naked coming from the back yard drenched in water, the neighbours stating that prisoner had put him in a pail of water to wash the blood off his head. The officers went to the back yard and found a pail of water coloured with blood, and on asking the prisoner what was the meaning of his conduct he said he had a right to correct his own child. In his room was found the shirt the boy had been wearing covered in blood, and a thick broom-handle broken and covered in blood.

“There was actually no evidence of the assault, save the defendant's answer to the constables, but the boy was stripped in court, and besides fearful wounds and contusions on his back and arms, he had two black eyes, evidently inflicted with the same weapon.

“Prisoner said he had to work hard for his wife and family. The boy had been left to mind the house, and when he (the prisoner) came home he found the fire out, the baby choking on the bed, and the boy was fighting in the street; he ran for protection under the bed, and in trying to get him out the blows were inflicted.

“The police called the attention of the magistrate to the state of the boy's head. Blood was then exuding from a terrible cut on the head.

“Mr. Ellison said correction was necessary in moderation, but prisoner had inflicted most immoderate chastisement, he should take care there was no recurrence of it, and ordered prisoner to find two sureties in £20 to keep the peace to the boy for three months.”

If you steal a horse and cart nine months hard labour is a ridiculously inadequate punishment. If you cut open your child's head with a broomstick, give him two black eyes, and cover him with fearful wounds and contusions, after a long previous course of brutal conduct towards him, there is some danger lest a rigorous magistrate should “take care that there is no recurrence of it.”

MEETINGS OF THE London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, and of the various classes of persons interested in its affairs have been held to consider the award of the arbitrators. We ventured to anticipate last week that the award would not be received with unanimous satisfaction; and it is now very apparent among which of the various classes interested disappointment is mainly felt. It is among the debenture-holders, who complain that, though they are properly creditors, they have by the award been postponed to the preference shareholders. The knowledge, however, that the award, whether right or wrong, is without appeal and has the force of an Act of Parliament seems to be inducing all parties to make a virtue of necessity, and combine to make the best of things for the future.

MR. HIBBERT'S ACT to remove clerical disabilities has just been issued, and we are glad to find it almost entirely free from the defects which disfigured its author's original scheme, and on which we commented in this Journal upon its introduction. In its final shape it is a perfectly harmless, and will probably be a very useful, measure; and while it will certainly prove satisfactory to those gentlemen who desire to be divested of their sacred calling, it contains nothing to which even Archdeacon Denison could object. The vexed question of the “indelibility of orders,” with regard to which the minds of conscientious High Churchmen have not unnaturally been so much exercised, is wisely left untouched by Mr. Hibbert. “Once a clergyman always a clergyman,” will in one, and its only proper sense, still remain true; for a retired priest or deacon who desires to resume his functions will not require re-ordination. The Act simply deals with him as a citizen, providing that any “minister of the Church of England” who desires to be relieved of his duties, and expresses that desire, with certain prescribed formalities, shall also be relieved from his civil disabilities. The machinery to be adopted for the purpose is straightforward and inexpensive. The “minister,” after resigning his preferment, if he happen to hold any, may (section 3) execute and enrol in chancery a “deed of relinquishment” in a form prescribed by the Act. A copy of the deed is to be delivered to the Bishop of the diocese where the preferment was, or, supposing him to have held none, of the diocese where he resides, and notice of the execution of such an instrument is to be sent to the Archbishop of the province. By section 4 the Bishop shall, on application, cause the deed to be recorded, and a copy of the record is, by section 7, to be delivered to the clergyman executing it on payment of a fee not exceeding ten shillings. On completion of the enrolment and record of the deed the following consequences ensue with respect to the person executing it:—"He shall be incapable of officiating or acting in any manner as a minister of the Church of England, and of taking or holding any preferment therein, and shall cease to enjoy all rights, privileges, advantages, and exemptions attached to the office of minister of the Church of England. 2. Every licence, office, and place, held by him for which it is by law an indispensable qualification that the holder thereof should be a minister of the Church of England shall be ipso facto void and determined; and lastly (3), he shall be by virtue of this Act discharged and free from all disabilities, disqualifications, restraints, and prohibitions to which, if this Act had not been passed, he would, by force of any of the enactments mentioned in the first schedule to this Act or any other law, have been subject, as a person who had been admitted to the office of minister in the Church of England, and from all jurisdiction, penalties, censures, and proceedings, to which, if this Act had not been passed, he would or might under any of the same enactments or any other law have been amenable or liable in consequence of his having been so admitted, and of any act or thing done or omitted by him after such admission."

The general effect of this comprehensive enactment is to replace the retiring minister exactly in the same civil position as he occupied before he was ordained. He resigns his ecclesiastical privileges and resumes his layman's rights. Among these the most important is, of course, the right, if elected, to sit in the House of Commons. Whether the clergy ever at any period of our history had a right to sit there, when returned, is a debatable point; but since 1803, at all events, when, in order to get rid of the "Reverend" Horne Tooke, who was regarded by the powers that then were as a troublesome demagogue, Parliament expressly declared (by what is known as Horne Tooke's Act) both priests and deacons disqualified, the gates of the Lower House have been definitely closed to them. This prohibitory Act and "other law" (if there be any common law rule of exclusion) are not to apply to clergymen retired from business, and to them, therefore, the field of political ambition is open. That is no doubt a cause of sincere self-congratulation; at least, to those of them who have political instincts. Lest they should be too much elated, however, we take leave to remind them that they must now also take their turn in the jury-box. If the sufferings of jurors are to any extent truly depicted by the commercial part of the community, this liability to serve will be a sobering reflection.

IN THE COURSE OF THE PROCEEDINGS in the bankruptcy of the O'Donoghue, M.P., a question seems to have been raised whether the debtor, whose residence was in Ireland, and who only came to England from time to time to attend Parliament, could be made bankrupt in England. But surely there can hardly be much serious doubt upon the point. By the common law of bankruptcy, as it may not improperly be called, any one who commits an act of bankruptcy in England may be adjudicated bankrupt by an English court, wherever his ordinary residence may be. And to any person who recollects the semi-criminal origin of the bankrupt laws, this rule requires little explanation. Section 59 of the Act of 1869 specially provides that when the debtor is not resident in England proceedings are to be taken in the London court.

It is true that by the Irish Bankruptcy Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 60), s. 31, the Irish Court of Bankruptcy has "exclusive jurisdiction in bankruptcy over all traders residing or carrying on business exclusively in Ireland." But we can see no reason why an Irish non-trader who commits an act of bankruptcy in England should not be made bankrupt here.

CONTRACTS UNDER SECTION 7 OF THE RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC ACT, 1854 (17 & 18 VICT. c. 81).

II.

In our last article we noticed the rule of construction which is applied by the Courts in reading contracts under section 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854. The cases in which there has been any discussion since that statute as to this principle are Peck's case (11 W. R. 1023, 32 L. J. Q. B. 241), where a condition "that the company shall not be responsible for the loss of or injury to" certain specified goods, was held to apply to any injury, however caused, "including gross negligence and even fraud or dishonesty on the part of the servants of the company" (per Lord Westbury, C.). So, in McManus v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (7 W. R. 547, 28 L. J. Ex. 353), a condition "the owners undertaking all risks of conveyance, loading, and unloading whatsoever, as the company will not be responsible for any injury or damage, however caused," was held to amount to a stipulation "for exception from liability from the consequence of their own negligence, however gross, or misconduct, however flagrant." In Robinson v. The Great Western Railway Company (13 W. R. 660, 35 L. J. C. P. 123) horses were delivered to the company "to be carried entirely at the owner's risk," and it was held that this did not include delay, for which accordingly the company were held liable, notwithstanding the contract, which, under the circumstances, was held to be valid. Erle, C.J., says, "The contract of the company is to deliver the horses in a reasonable time at the owner's risk, . . . and there is a duty entirely distinct from the questions of damage which may arise from accident on the journey. If a railway company are bound to carry horses in twenty-four hours at the owner's risk, and the horses do not arrive accordingly, then, whether the horses are damaged or not, there is a breach of contract for which the company are liable." It must be remembered that in contracts with carriers by water the old rule still prevails—viz., that the Courts will endeavour so to construe a contract as not to allow it to protect carriers from the consequences of their own negligence: Grill v. General Iron & Co. Company (14 W. R. 873); Ahrloff v. Briscall (15 W. R. 202); Lenne v. Dudgeon (16 W. R. 80); Czech v. General Steam & Co. Company (16 W. R. 130). In all these cases a somewhat forced construction was put upon the contracts which limited the carrier's liability.

Having now ascertained the form of the contracts required by the statute, and the rules of construction to be applied to them, we proceed to consider what contracts will be held to be reasonable. This, it will be remembered, is a matter of law (Peck's case). It may be laid down as a general rule that conditions which purport to relieve the company from all liability whatever in respect of goods carried by them are prima facie unreasonable, and therefore void. This was first clearly established in McManus v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, in the Exchequer Chamber. There the contract of carriage was, as we have before stated, "subject to the owner's undertaking all risks of conveyance, loading, and unloading, whatsoever, as the company will not be responsible for any injury or damage, however caused." The majority of the Court held that this contract was unreasonable, and therefore void. Again, in McCance v. London and North Western Railway Company (13 W. R. 154, 31 L. J. Ex. 71, per Bramwell, B.), it is said that a condition that horses "are to be carried without any risk on the part of the company is an unreasonable condition." This principle has since been adopted by the House of Lords in Peck's case, which is the leading case upon these contracts. There the condition was that the company were not to be responsible for "the loss of or injury to any marbles, musical instruments, toys, or other articles which, from their brittleness, fragility, delicacy, or liability to ignition, are more than ordinarily hazardous, unless declared and insured according to their value." This condition, as we have seen, was held to apply to any injury, even if caused by negligence or dishonesty of the company's servants, and was therefore held to be unreasonable.

In Gregory v. The West Midland Railway Company (12 W. R. 528, 33 L. J. Ex. 155) the defendants received cattle for carriage on condition (1) that the defendants "are to be free from all risk or responsibility with respect to any loss or damage arising in the loading or unloading, from suffocation, or from being trampled upon, bruised, or otherwise injured in the transit, from fire, or from any other cause whatsoever, it being hereby agreed that the same is to be carried at the owner's risk; (2) that the owner or his representative is required to see to the efficiency of the waggons before he allows his stock to be placed therein, and complaint must be made in writing to the station inspector or clerk in charge, as to all alleged defects either at the time of booking or before the wagon leaves the station." Both these conditions were held to be unreasonable, and therefore void. In Allday v. Great Western Railway Company (13 W. R. 43, 34 L. J. Q. B. 5), a condition with respect to cattle, that "the company are not to be subject to any risk in the receiving, loading, forwarding in transit, and unloading, nor to be amenable for any damage, actual or consequential, arising from suffocation, from being trampled on, bruised, or otherwise injured, from fire or any other cause whatsoever, nor from any consequences arising from over carriage, detention, or delay in or in relation to the conveying or delivery of the said animals however caused" was held unreasonable. And, on the authority of Allday's case, it was also held in Kirby v. Great Western Railway Company (18 L. T. N. S. 685) that a condition that the company should not be liable for any consequences arising from over carriage, detention, or delay in the conveying or delivering of cattle in time for a particular market, however caused, was unreasonable. Booth v. North Eastern Railway Company (15 W. R. 695, L. R. 2 Ex. 173), is the last case on this branch of the subject, and there the same principle was acted upon, and a condition that the owner of cattle sent by the defendant's line "undertakes all risks of loading, unloading, and carriage, whether arising from the negligence or default of the company or their servants, or from defect or imperfection in the station, platform, or other places of loading or unloading, or of the carriage in which the cattle may be loaded or conveyed, or from any other cause whatsoever," was held to be unreasonable. On these authorities there can be no doubt now that conditions purporting to relieve a company from all liability are prima facie unreasonable; and the older decisions, where the contrary has been held, must now be considered as overruled. Those cases are Wise v. Great Western Railway Company (4 W. R. 551, 25 L. J. Ex. 258), and Pardington v. South Wales Railway Company (5 W. R. 8, 26 L. J. Ex. 105).

It will be noticed that the rule we have deduced from the decisions is that conditions purporting to relieve a company from all liability are prima facie, but not absolutely and necessarily, unreasonable under all circumstances. If nothing is brought to the notice of the Court except the fact that goods were delivered on such conditions and were damaged, the company is not protected, because such conditions are prima facie unreasonable. It is, however, always competent for the company to show that such conditions are, in the particular case, reasonable, regard being had to all the surrounding circumstances. For instance, if a company has two rates for particular descriptions of goods, and carries the goods at a higher rate under the ordinary common law liability of a common carrier, and at the lower rate without any liability at all, and the difference between the two rates is reasonable, regard being had to the difference in liability, and a bona fide choice is given to a person sending goods whether he will send his goods at the higher or lower rate, and he chooses the lower rate, and the contract embodying the conditions relieving the company from all liability is in writing and signed, then the company is relieved from all liability in accordance with the terms of their contract. That is to say, the contract which on its face appears unreasonable is in fact reasonable, because the owner of the goods had the option of sending them under the protection of the common law liability, and he preferred the other way of sending the goods on account of the reduction in the rate to be paid for their carriage. The first case in what this appears to have been held is Simons v. The Great Western Railway Company (26 L. J. C. P. 25). There goods were received on special or mileage rates on a condition, amongst others, that "goods conveyed at special or mileage rates must be loaded and unloaded by the owners or their agents, and the company will not be responsible for any risk of storage, loss, or damage, however caused, nor for discrepancy in the delivery, as to either quantity, numbers, or weight, nor for the condition of articles so carried, nor for detention or delay in the conveying or the delivery of them, however caused." This condition was set out on the pleadings, and on demurrer it was held "that the plea which is based on the mileage rate in proportion to the risk incurred is a good plea, and that that regulation is just and reasonable." The meaning of this decision is more fully explained in Harrison v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company (8 W. R. 524, 29 L. J. Q. B. 209), by Blackburn, J., who says, "if you look at the case of Simons v. The Great Western Railway Company, though the judgment does not enter into the details of what the Court decided, yet it will be found that they decided that the 15th condition," (the one above set out) "by which the company were to be answerable for no damage whatever if the goods were conveyed at special or mileage rates, was reasonable when coupled with other conditions, . . . which decision, I think, must be taken to be this, that such a condition, to be reasonable, must be one giving parties applying to the railway company a bona fide reasonable alternative." Harrison v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company was afterwards overruled in the Exchequer Chamber (31 L. J. Q. B. 116, 10 W. R. C. L. Dig. 74), but this explanation by Blackburn, J., is not affected by the judgments there given. In Peek's case it seems to have been thought that the condition might have been reasonable, but there were no special circumstances brought before the Court to convince them that the conditions, which were prima facie unreasonable, were in fact, in that instance, reasonable. Lord Cranworth expressly says that if the company had shown that the sum charged by them for the insurance required by them had been reasonable in fact the condition would probably have been held reasonable. That this is the meaning of Peek's case is now clear from Robinson v. The Great Western Railway Company (13 W. R. 660, 35 L. J. C. P. 123), where Erle, C.J., referring to Peek's case, says "it seems to me that the learned lords who decided that case recognised the doctrine that it is reasonable for a railway company to have two modes of carriage—one by which they take a great responsibility, and another by which they carry at a cheaper rate but at a greater risk to the bailor."

LEGISLATION OF THE YEAR.

CAP. I.—An Act to empower committees on bills confirming provisional orders to award costs and examine witnesses on oath.

Section 1 of this Act, which was intended to carry out the first object indicated by its title is unfortunately rendered inoperative by a blunder to which we call attention in another column.

By 21 & 22 Vict. c. 78, s. 1, committees of the House of Commons on private bills were empowered to examine witnesses on oath. Section 2 of the present Act gives a similar power to committees of the House of Commons on bills confirming provisional orders.

CAP. VI.—An Act to extend the jurisdiction of the judges of the superior courts of common law at Westminster.

It had long been believed by most competent observers that the delay of justice in the superior courts of law, and the heavy arrears with which they were encumbered were in the main due to the want of any proper economy of judicial power, and might be removed by a better distribution of forces. The judges of one court might be seen day after day and all the year round with little to do and plenty of spare time on their hands, while the judges of another were struggling in vain against accumulated arrears. This state of things was partly the fault of the law, but partly, also, of the judges. For example, ever since 1830 (11 Geo. 4, and 1 Will. 4, c. 70, s. 4), a judge of any court has had power to sit at Nisi Prius in London or Westminster and try causes in any other court. Yet this power was never acted on, and the commonly supposed absence of such a power was one of the commonest complaints against the system.

The present Act is excessively clumsy in its wording. Indeed, it is more. If critically examined, its most important section, section 2, is quite nonsensical. But we believe that this slight difficulty will be got over; and the Act is at least a little more comprehensive in its scope than most of its predecessors dealing with the same subject. In substance, the Act contains three important provisions.

By section 2 a Court which is overworked may, by a very roundabout process—a genuine piece of red tape—procure the services of a judge from another court. In banc this power will probably be frequently exercised, and with great advantage to the public. Indeed it has already been so upon some occasions. As to Nisi Prius sittings, there seems every reason to think that the Act will remain a dead letter. The judges had the power of helping one another to clear their lists before, and they chose not to do so. We believe they will act in the same way for the future.

Section 4 enables any Court to sit in banco in two divisions. This most salutary provision has already borne very valuable fruit.

Section 5 enables any number of courts of Nisi Prius to sit at the same time in London or Westminster. This is also a most useful power, though we believe it has not yet been acted upon.

CAP. IX.—An Act to amend the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act 1856, and for other purposes relating to the preservation of peace in Ireland.

In 1847, the statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 2 was passed to prevent "crime and outrage in certain parts of Ireland." The Lord Lieutenant was empowered to apply this statute by proclamation to any district in Ireland. The statute dealt chiefly with the management of the constabulary and the carrying of arms, which is forbidden in certain cases in proclaimed districts. This statute has been re-enacted or continued from time to time, and some few alterations have been made by the subsequent Acts.

The statute we are now noticing is to amend the Act of 1847, under the name of the Peace Preservation Act (Ireland) 1856, a re-enacting Act, with which part 1 of this statute is to be construed, and to give still further powers to the Irish executive, especially with respect to the possession and sale of arms and gunpowder, the proclaiming of districts, the arrest of persons on suspicion, and the repression of seditious newspapers. It also provides for giving compensation for personal injury by agrarian outrages. These objects have been carried out in a very clumsy manner, the sections on each subject being scattered up and down the Act most curiously.

By sections 6, 7, 10, 12, 14, 19, and 37 no person, with certain exceptions, is to carry arms within a proclaimed district without licence (revolvers requiring a special licence), or to sell to, or keep in repair for, any person not duly licensed, any firearms. Special powers are given to persons acting under special warrants to search for and seize arms. Licences for arms may be revoked by the Lord Lieutenant in any district specially proclaimed, and the holders of the licences required to deposit their arms at a specified place (section 19). All persons making, repairing, or selling any firearms are required to keep an account of what and to and for whom they so sold or repaired, &c. &c., and to send a copy of such account to the police every month. The sale and possession of gunpowder is dealt with in sections 11, 35, and 36, which prohibit the dealing in gunpowder in Ireland without a licence, and require all persons dealing in gunpowder to keep an account similar to that required in the case of firearms. In proclaimed districts no gunpowder is to be sold except to licensed dealers or persons licensed to keep arms.

By section 18, the Lord Lieutenant may specially proclaim a district, and then he acquires the power of revoking, in such district, licences for arms (section 19), and of closing public-houses (section 24); and in such specially proclaimed districts persons out at night under suspicious circumstances may be arrested, and if not out of their house upon lawful occasion, they may be imprisoned for six months. Strangers wandering and sojourning in such districts may be arrested and required to give security for good behaviour (section 25). By section 29 the venue of indictments found in specially proclaimed districts may be changed on application of the Attorney-General. Sections 20, 21, and 22 relate to the posting of special proclamations, making a copy of the London Gazette containing the publication of any such proclamation conclusive evidence of the facts necessary to authorise such proclamations, and requiring copies of the proclamations to be laid before Parliament. Sections 26—28 relate to matters of procedure.

The provisions respecting newspapers attracted more attention than any other part of the Act when it was passed. They are of a very stringent nature, and practically give the Lord Lieutenant an unlimited power of suppressing any newspaper in Ireland. By section 60, when it appears to the Lord Lieutenant that any newspaper published in Ireland after the Act "contains any treasonable or seditious engraving, matter, or expressions, or any incitements to the commission of any felony, or any engraving, matter, or expressions encouraging or propagating treason or sedition, or inciting to the commission of any felony," he may serve a notice in a specified form upon the printer, publisher, or proprietor, and publish the notice in the Dublin Gazette, and if, afterwards, such newspaper contains any treasonable or seditious engraving, matter, &c., &c., all the plant, materials, paper, and copies of such newspaper are forfeited to the Crown. Any newspaper printed elsewhere than in Ireland, published or circulated there, and containing such treasonable or seditious matter, expressions, &c., shall be forfeited to the Crown. Power is given to seize the plant, &c., of forfeited newspapers under a warrant of the Lord Lieutenant (sections 31, 32), and no action is to be brought for such seizure, except as prescribed in section 33; which allows an action, if brought within three months, against "the person or persons to whom such warrant is addressed, or any of the assistants of such person or persons," and a claim of damages, on the ground that no notice was duly published or served, or because the newspaper did not contain treasonable or seditious matter, &c., &c. The action is to be tried as an ordinary action of tort, and if the defendant obtain the verdict, he shall be entitled to his costs. If the plaintiff gets the verdict, he shall, after final judgment, be entitled to "such damages as may lawfully be awarded by the jury, together with his costs of suit, and where any judgment shall be given for the plaintiff, there shall be paid to the plaintiff, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, the damages awarded him, together with his costs of suit." It is difficult to understand the effect of section 33. The plaintiff, in case of success, is to be paid, not by the defendant at all, but from some special fund. This is intelligible enough, because the defendant ought not to be held responsible for the consequence of the warrant being improperly issued. But the defendant is spoken of all through the section as if he were personally liable. There is no provision that he shall not be liable to execution on the judgment; that he will have any assistance in defending the action, or that he is bound to defend it; or that, if he obtains the verdict, he is to be indemnified for costs to which he may be put, in addition to the costs for which the plaintiff is liable. The defendant's liability also, whatever that may be, is the same, whether the plaintiff's complaint is that the warrant was improperly issued although properly executed, as if the newspaper was not seditious, &c., or that the warrant was improperly executed although properly issued, as if the defendant seized plant, not on the premises of the newspaper and not connected with the newspaper. The section is an absurd one, and we do not hazard an opinion as to its construction. Provision is made in section 39 for the giving of compensation by the grand jury in cases of personal injury or murder by crime "of the character generally known as agrarian, or arising out of any illegal combination or conspiracy," and a machinery is provided for this purpose.

In addition to the provisions we have noticed, 15 & 16 Geo. 3, c. 21, and 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 44, passed for the repression of violence and crime, are applied to proclaimed districts (section 8). Section 14 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 2, respecting search for arms, is repealed. In any proclaimed district where a crime has been committed persons may be summoned before justices, and required to give evidence, although no person is charged with the crime (section 13). Search warrants may be issued to search for documents in the handwriting of persons suspected of writing threatening letters (section 15). By section 35 witnesses bound by recognisance absconding before a trial or the hearing of a charge may be apprehended. The statute contains a large number of definitions, and many forms for proceedings under it. It is to continue in force until the 1st of August next, and of course applies to Ireland only.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

MISREPRESENTATION IN PROSPECTUS—SHAREHOLDERS' REMEDIES.

Ship v. Crosskill, M.R., 18 W. R. 618.

It was long ago settled that bills will lie, on the ground of fraud, to recover subscriptions to bubble companies (Colt v. Woollaston, 2 P. Wms. 154). And where a prospectus has been issued, under the authority of directors, containing statements about the company which turn out to be untrue, and were intended to deceive, a person who applied for shares on the faith of the prospectus is entitled to a decree for repayment against the directors personally as well as the company, and to have his name removed from the register of shareholders (Henderson v. Lacon, 16 W. R. 328). In such a case there must be (1) a distinct misrepresentation in the prospectus; (2) a guilty knowledge by the directors of the misrepresentation—the misrepresentation in the particular case consisting in a statement that the directors and their friends had subscribed a large portion of the capital.

The case of Henderson v. Lacon may very well be contrasted with Ship v. Crosskill. In the latter case the plaintiff had had his name removed from the register of shareholders, upon the ground of the excess of the objects contemplated by the memorandum over those contemplated by the prospectus; a ground which, in the absence of fraud, almost necessarily entitles the applicant to that species of relief (Downes v. Ship, 17 W. R. 34). This would have entitled him to prove in the winding-up of the company for the calls paid, or, if the company had not been wound up, to bring an action for the recovery of the calls. But he filed a bill to make the directors personally liable, and this, in the opinion of the Master of the Rolls, they could not be, unless each of them had been guilty of a distinct fraud. There had been no fraud in the case, in the opinion of the judges before whom the matter of the company had come, and if there had been, it would have been necessary for the plaintiff, as the Vice-Chancellor Wood showed in Henderson v. Lacon, to prove that the directors had severally been privy to it. Stewart v. Austin (15 W. R. 112), which was decided on demurrer, establishes that variance between the prospectus and memorandum enables a man to have his name taken off the register, but does not, if fraud be not proved, entitle him to maintain a suit for the recovery of his money against the directors personally, instead of bringing his action against the company. In these, as in all other suits to recover money, it is personal misconduct or fraud alone that confers the title to relief against the defendants.

CONDITIONS OF SALE—RIGHT TO RESCIND.

Mawson v. Fletcher, M.R., 18 W. R. 798.

It was said by Lord Cairns in Duddell v. Simpson (15 W. R. 115, L. R. 2 Ch. 102) that under the usual condition of sale, that, if the purchaser shall insist upon any requisition or objection, which the vendor shall be unable or unwilling to remove, the vendor may annul the sale, there are four matters which must concur, before there can be a right to give notice to rescind the contract. First, there must be an objection to the title; secondly, there must be an inability or unwillingness on the part of the vendor to remove that objection; thirdly, there must be a communication to the purchaser of the existence of this inability or unwillingness; and, fourthly, there must be an insisting by the purchaser on his objection, notwithstanding this communication. In Mawson v. Fletcher the objection was, that the minerals under a small part of the property did not belong to the vendor, but to someone else. This was properly an objection to the title, which the vendor, either from inability or unwillingness, did not remove, and as it was insisted on, the purchaser gave notice rescinding the contract. It is, of course, an objection to the title that the rights of third parties are involved. This rescission of the contract was held to be a complete defence to a suit for specific performance, with an abatement for the minerals in question, instituted by the purchaser. A mere misdescription may be the subject of compensation; and where the extent of the vendor's interest is unintentionally misdescribed the purchaser may be compelled to take the property with an abatement (Hoy v. Smithies, 22 Bear. 510). Where, however, the objection is to title, Duddell v. Simpson and the present case clearly establish that the vendor is at liberty, under the above condition, to rescind, although the purchaser offers to complete on an abatement being allowed.

LIABILITY OF SEPARATE ESTATE.

McHenry v. Davies, M.R., 18 W. R. 855.

Though a married woman cannot bind herself personally, it has never been disputed that she can bind her separate estate. The separate estate of a married woman is bound by her general pecuniary engagements (Hulme v. Tenant, 1 Bro. C. C. 16), provided it appear that such engagements were made with reference to and upon the faith or credit of that estate (Johnson v. Gallagher, 9 W. R. 506, 3 D. F. J. 494); and whether they were so made or not is a question to be decided by the Court upon the circumstances of the particular case. If the circumstances under which a married woman enters into a pecuniary engagement are such as to tend to the conclusion that she was contracting not for her husband, but for herself, in respect of her separate estate, that separate estate will be liable to satisfy the obligation. Thus, where a married woman, having separate estate, contracted to take shares in a joint stock company, which was afterwards wound up, the Court, being of opinion that such contract was entered into upon the credit of her separate estate, and that the deed of settlement did not exclude married women from being shareholders so as to bind their separate estate, placed the married woman on the list of contributories in her own name, so as to bind her separate estate (Mrs. Matthewman's case, 15 W. R. 146, L. R. 2 Eq. 781). And where a married woman, living separate from her husband, entered into a contract, for specific performance of which a bill was filed against her, the Court of Appeal (Lord Hatherley and Lord Justice Giffard) thought that the circumstance of living separate from her husband was at once a strong reason for saying that, in making the contract, she intended to bind that property, out of which alone she could pay that which she contracted to pay (Picard v. Hine, 18 W. R. 178, L. R. 5 Ch. 274). It might be different where a married woman was living with her husband (Johnson v. Gallagher, ubi sup.) as the presumption that she acted as the agent of her husband would then arise and have to be displaced before the creditor could enforce his equity against her separate estate. This leads us to consider McHenry v. Davies. A lady not separated from her husband in the ordinary sense of the word, but residing alone at Paris and having a banker's account of her own, draws a cheque and endorses a bill of exchange for the purpose of enabling her agent to raise money. The bill and cheque are cashed by a banker at Paris, and are dishonoured. The Master of the Rolls held that she was bound to make good the amount out of her separate estate irrespective of any equities between herself and her agent. She had acted like a feme sole, and allowed those with whom she had dealings to suppose that she was a feme sole, and could not afterwards be heard to say that she was a married woman in order to escape liability. If a feme covert, the Master of the Rolls said, employs an agent, and gives documents to him with her name on them for the express purpose of enabling him to raise money on the credit of her name, she is liable to make good out of her separate estate, to the person advancing money on the faith of her name, the amount so advanced. If she had given a bond, for example, we apprehend that the charge thereby created on her separate estate would have been subject to the equities between her and her agent. But the security given was a negotiable security, and given for the express purpose of raising money, so that she could not afterwards dispute her liability on the ground that the agent had not paid over to her the proceeds of the security given.

AGREEMENT NOT TO TRADE WITHIN CERTAIN LIMITS— BREACH BY DEFENDANT ACTING AS MANAGER.

Dales v. Weaver, V.C.J., 18 W. R. 993.

It was held in this case that an agreement, entered into upon the sale of a business, not to carry on the business, directly or indirectly, either alone, or in partnership with, or with the assistance of any person, was broken by the vendor carrying on the business as assistant or manager to a third party who supplied the stock-in-trade and the business premises, that amounting in the opinion of the Vice-Chancellor to carrying on the business with the assistance of another person. The case is distinguishable from Allen v. Taylor (18 W. R. 888) where the agreement was that the vendor would not carry on the trade of a rag dealer during a particular term, either in his own name or that of any other person in the town of Nottingham; and a motion to restrain him from acting as manager of a third party's rag business in that town was refused, on the ground that the agreement did not meet the case, the right to act as the agent of another not being excluded, as in the former case. Allen v. Taylor resembled Clarke v. Watkins (11 W. R. 819), where the defendant agreed to serve the plaintiff in his business as a chemist, and that he would not himself carry on the same trade within certain limits. The bill was filed to restrain him from acting as agent for another firm within the limits, and the Lords Justices refused to restrain him from so doing; the Lord Justice Knight Bruce, however, only saying that at that stage of the suit no injunction could be granted. There can be no doubt that both in Clarke v. Watkins and Allen v. Taylor the spirit, if not the letter, of the respective agreements was violated. But the letter of the agreement ought to have been so framed as to cover the case of the defendant acting as manager.

COMMON LAW.

CAUSA REMOTA AND CAUSA PROXIMA—NEGLIGENCE— DAMAGES.

The Lords, &c., of Romney Marsh v. Corporation of Trinity House, Ex., 18 W. R. 869.

This case is likely to cause some misapprehension if it is not carefully read. The action was for damage done to a sea-wall of the plaintiffs by a vessel of the defendants. The vessel, through the negligence of the crew, struck the ground near the plaintiff's wall, and the wind and tide then carried her against the wall and injured it. The vessel continued bumping against and damaging the wall for several days. Finally it was sold by the defendants and broken up. After the vessel struck the wall she could not have been prevented from continuing to injure the wall, except by breaking her up. To have broken up the vessel at once would have caused the destruction of property on board her that was in fact saved. The defendants were not guilty of any negligence in the management of the vessel after she struck the wall, unless the omission to break her up at once was negligence.

The plaintiffs alleged two distinct grounds of claim in their declaration—(1) that the defendants so negligently navigated their vessel, that it was thereby driven against the plaintiff's wall and damaged it; (2), that the defendants' vessel, having been driven against the defendants' wall by stress of weather, the defendants so negligently managed her while against the sea-wall that she thereby damaged the sea-wall. These two causes of action are quite distinct. The first is for the damage caused by the consequences of the negligent navigation of the vessel before she struck. The second is for the consequences of the negligent management of the vessel after she struck. The second count admits that the vessel was first driven against the sea-wall by perils of the seas, and not by the negligence of the crew. If the Court were of opinion that the defendants were liable for all or any part of the damage, the plaintiffs were to recover £98. There was no question therefore of the amount or measure of damages. The Court decided that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover under the first count, on the ground that "the immediate effect of the negligence was to put the vessel into such a condition that it must necessarily and inevitably be impelled in whatever direction the wind and tide were giving at the moment to the sea, and this was directly upon and towards the plaintiff's wall." On the second claim the Court held that the defendants were not entitled to recover, as there is no principle of law which would compel a shipowner, in the position of the defendants, to destroy his property to save that of others. There was, as we said, no question as to damages, and the judgment does not deal with the question. It is necessary, however, to notice that the case by no means decides that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover for the damage done by the vessel striking against the wall each tide during the time between the first collision and the day on which she was sold by the defendants. The decision is that if the vessel was first carried against the wall without negligence, the defendants were not liable for damage which could only have been prevented by breaking up the vessel. That is, that the mere fact of not breaking up the vessel until after all the defendants' property was saved was no negligence. It was also held, however, that the first collision was in fact caused by the defendants' negligence, and therefore it seems that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover for all the damage done by the vessel both by the first collision and subsequently, and probably the plaintiffs did recover for this damage, although it is not stated of what items the sum of £93 was made up. The result of the case therefore seems to be that the plaintiffs were not entitled to anything under their second count, but that under the first count they were entitled to recover all that was claimed under both counts. Lastly, it must be remembered that the case does not decide that under no circumstances would it be negligence to leave a vessel bumping against a sea-wall and injuring it (even where the damage could only be stopped by breaking up the vessel), but only that, under the facts of this case, the vessel was not so left as to amount to negligence by its owners.

REVIEWS.

Early Sketches of Eminent Persons. By JAMES WHITESIDE (now Lord Chief Justice of Ireland). Edited, with Notes, by WILLIAM DWYER FERGUSON, LL.D. Dublin: Hodges & Co. 1870.

It has become a common practice now-a-days, as soon as a man has attained to eminence in any department of life, to collect and publish every scrap he has ever written in his life; but it is a custom more honoured in the breach than in the observance. Slight magazine sketches, written for the moment and never intended to be permanently preserved (and Chief Justice Whiteside's sketches are of this class), do not acquire any new value by reason of their author subsequently attaining to eminence. The world would not have been much the poorer, nor Chief Justice Whiteside's reputation much the less, if this book had remained unpublished.

The papers, however, here collected are readable enough. They took little labour, we fancy, in the writing, and they cost little in the reading. The papers on political personages, such as those on Lord Grey and Sir James Mackintosh, are of a very trivial character. Those to which the reader will turn with most interest are those in which one who was destined himself to attain rare eminence as a forensic orator gives us the impressions made upon him when a student by the principal leaders of the bar at that time. Of the English portraits probably the most satisfactory is that of Denman. Scarlett's style of speaking, and the source and means of his extraordinary success at nisi prius, are effectively described. But the writer appears to us to have, on the whole, underrated Scarlett's powers. And the editor, in his supplementary note, certainly most unduly depreciates his judicial qualities.

The Irish sketches are more valuable than the English. Those of Peter Burrowes and Mr. Justice Burton will be read with interest, because they give some account, if not a very comprehensive one, of two men who deserve to be better known than they are.

The best paper in the book is the last, "The Irish Exchequer as it was in 1829." It must have been a curious court. Here are two charges to juries of Lord Guillemaire, the then Lord Chief Baron: "On the trial of a criminal for stealing stockings several witnesses deposed to his good character; after which his Lordship charged the jury in this concise and rather comic strain—'Gentlemen of the jury, here is a most respectable young man, with an excellent character, who has stolen twelve pairs of stockings, and you will find accordingly.'"

"Upon the trial of a recent action for debt, to which the defendant had pleaded as a set-off a promissory note of somewhat long standing, and an old broken-down gig, with which he had furnished the plaintiff, the following charge was spoken, with infinite gravity, by the learned Chief Baron:—'Gentlemen of the jury, this is an action for debt, to which the defendant has pleaded as a set-off two things—a promissory note, which has a long time to run, and a gig, which has but a short time to run. The case seems clear. You may find for the plaintiff.'"

The following sketch of an important functionary of the court is perhaps the best thing in the book:—"A few moments before the Chief Baron, slowly, but authoritatively, the crier ascends the steps of the court, and in an instant quells any squabbles for places which may have arisen; then, entering his commodious box, placed exactly opposite Charley Fleetwood's, these two luminaries of the Court of Exchequer appear in astronomical conjunction. The Chief arrives—the trial begins—the crowd gathers—the passages are choked up—the barristers impeded; then begins the crier to exert his authority in a voice which would have silenced his celebrated predecessor of the Roman forum, and which sometimes discomposes the gravity even of Charley Fleetwood himself:—"Make way there for the gentlemen of the bar; make way, I say, for King's counsel. So, you'll not make way? Tipstaff, where are you? Do your duty. Call the sheriffs. Bailiffs, take them scheming fellows into custody." Meantime, the progress of the trial is arrested, as it is utterly impossible that even Daniel O'Connell could be heard while this storm lasts. The Chief Baron sits most composedly; never interrupting or correcting his crier, for whose invectives he has a peculiar relish. The crier, if not promptly obeyed, rises in his wrath, and rather unceremoniously accosting the doubtful characters by whom he is surrounded, vociferates, 'Go home, you loungers; you idle, scheming, skulking fellows, have you nothing to do? Have you no business to mind? What brings you here? What do you want with law, and what do you know about it? Gentlemen, take care of your pockets.' After this burst subsides the trial is resumed."

To one accustomed to English courts of justice this account will seem almost incredible, for it seems to suggest that in Irish courts there are officers who really try to keep the passages clear, and secure access to the court for those whose business calls them there! But Ireland is a strange country.

COURTS.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY. (Before Mr. Registrar HAZLITT.)

Aug. 31. — In re The O'Donoghue, M.P.

This was a first meeting for proof of debts and appointment of trustee and inspectors. Adjudication of bankruptcy was made in this case on the 9th inst, on the petition of Mr. J. R. A. Wallinger, of Brussels, late of Clarendon-road, Bayswater, gentleman. The bankrupt is member of Parliament for Tralee. He is described in the proceedings as "Daniel the O'Donoghue, member of Parliament, of No. 3, St. James's-street, Pall-mall, in the county of Middlesex, of no occupation." The claim of the petitioning creditor arose upon a judgment recovered on the 22nd March, 1870, the action being brought on a bill of exchange for £130, dated the 22nd June, 1863, payable at one month, drawn by Josiah Erck upon the bankrupt, and endorsed by him to Mr. Wallinger. The amount claimed under the summons issued in this court on behalf of the petitioning creditor appears to be £185 18s. 7d.

Proofs to the amount of about £700 having been tendered and admitted,

Mr. T. Plews, who represented the bankrupt, said that as the meeting was now duly constituted, three or four creditors being present personally or by proxy, he desired to make a short statement on behalf of the O'Donoghue for the purpose of explaining his position. The bankrupt had been in Ireland pending the present proceedings until the last three or four days, a strong impression being entertained that a person who had his legal domicile in Ireland and only stayed in this country at intervals in order that he might discharge an important public duty was not amenable to bankruptcy proceedings in England; and this question would have to be determined. However, the O'Donoghue felt that it would be more becoming on his part to meet his creditors here, and he would submit as soon as possible a full and true statement of his affairs. It was also his intention to make a proposal which he believed would be for the interest of his creditors and meet with their approval. Some further information was required from Ireland and upon that being obtained the necessary accounts would be furnished. The creditors would probably be asked, towards the end of October, to accept a proposal by the bankrupt and consent to the annulling of the bankruptcy.

Mr. Vallance, as representing creditors, expressed his satisfaction at the statement made by Mr. Flews, and he had no doubt that they would assent to a reasonable arrangement. His clients had no hostile feeling towards the bankrupt; indeed, some of them regretted that the bankruptcy should have occurred.

THE REGISTRAR.—The Court must assume that the creditors will be prepared to entertain a satisfactory proposal. The course adopted by the bankrupt is creditable to him, and his proposal will, no doubt, receive a favourable consideration.

Mr. Davis, on behalf of creditors, said he disapproved of the proceedings instituted in this Court, and would be ready to accede to the bankrupt's proposal.

Mr. Registrar HAZLITT thought the bankrupt had acted very fairly, and the creditors would no doubt meet him in a similar spirit. Bankruptcy under such circumstances was no disgrace, but the sooner a satisfactory arrangement was made the better.

Mr. Croysdill, public accountant, Old Jewry Chambers, was then nominated as trustee. No committee of inspection was appointed.

The O'Donoghue was in attendance, but no examination took place. His debts, due principally to creditors resident in London, are supposed not to exceed £3,000. The sitting for public examination was fixed for the 19th of November.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. CHARLES S. C. BOWEN, barrister-at-law, of the Western Circuit, has been appointed Revising Barrister for the southern division of Wiltshire. Mr. Bowen was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in January, 1861.

Mr. J. H. TILLY, of the firm of Tilly & Thomas, Public Accountants, 1, Circus-place, has been appointed by Vice-Chancellor Bacon, Official Liquidator of the Vale of Rheidol Silver Lead Mining Company, the Santa Clara Silver Lead Mining Company, and the Lisburne Consols Silver Lead Mining Company.

Mr. CHARLES DIVER, of Great Yarmouth, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Sir,—In your article upon the Act to "facilitate the arrest of absconding debtors," you refer to the Debtors Act of 1869 as if it continued the broad power which existed previous to that Act of arresting an absconding debtor after an action has been commenced. I would point out that section 6 of that Act only gives a power to arrest where the absence of the defendant will materially prejudice the plaintiff in the prosecution of his action. I understand this to mean that if the plaintiff can show that the defendant's absence will make it more difficult for him to prove his case (for example, if he bonâ fide requires the defendant's evidence, or to obtain from him an affidavit of discovery), he is entitled to apply for an order, but that otherwise he cannot do so. In fact, he may arrest the defendant to compel him to make out his case, but, if his case is clear without the defendant, the latter cannot be prevented from leaving the country. Can a greater anomaly and absurdity exist?

I am not aware that the point has ever been decided by any court, but I believe the decisions at chambers have been to the above effect, and I cannot see how any other view can be entertained, the words of the section being clear.

The Act just passed will not be of much service. The particulars which have to be delivered, and the demands which have to be made, before a summons can be issued, will frighten the debtor away in most cases. In the county court here the judges require that the demands shall be made on separate days, and there must therefore be a delay of at least three days after the attorney is instructed before an order can be obtained. Inasmuch as steamers leave here for America nearly every day, and for other places as often, while Ireland and Scotland and the Isle of Man are delightfully easy of access; and inasmuch also as debtors in this part of the world are exceedingly wide awake, you may almost as well attempt to put salt on a bird's tail as to catch any absconding debtor in Liverpool in the present state of the law. In less lively districts, perhaps, some use may be made of the new Act.

The old Absconding Debtors Act answered very well. I have frequently arrested debtors under it within two or three hours after receiving instructions, sometimes after they were on board the steamer, and were just about to sail, and by this means debts to the amount of many thousands of pounds recoverable in no other way may have been made good.

The repeal of practically all arrest for debt in 1869 was made principally on the motion of the various chambers of commerce of the country; and the present Act has been passed at the instance of commercial men who have found to their dismay when they wanted to get something out of an absconding debtor what the chambers of commerce had done. But the new Act is almost useless; and as the law stands at present, I may, owing you £1,000, look in to wish you good-bye on my way to the steamer, informing you of my retirement, with that very sum in my pocket, to the far west, and of my sincere intention never to repay a farthing of the money; and you must grin and bear it as you may.

Liverpool, Sept. 1.

G. H.

[Our correspondent's construction of the Debtors Act is probably correct, and it is not at all inconsistent with our remarks (ante p. 861). We were speaking with reference to the time at which, not the purposes for which, an absconding debtor might be arrested. That the working of the new Act will be what our correspondent fears is but too probable. But only experience can absolutely decide the question.—Ed. S. J.]

OBITUARY.

MR. T. PARSONS.

The death of Mr. Thomas Parsons, barrister-at-law, took place at Melbourne on the 31st of May, in the sixty-third year of his age. The late Mr. Parsons was called to the bar at Gray's inn in January, 1841, and formerly practised as a conveyancer and equity draughtsman. He emigrated to Melbourne about ten years ago.

MR. G. B. TOWNSEND.

Mr. George Barnard Townsend, solicitor, of Westminster and Salisbury, expired suddenly at Mudeford, near Christchurch, Hants, on the 29th August. For some years past Mr. Townsend resided chiefly in London, but during the summer months his family occupied Gundimore House, at Mudeford. While returning from an angling excursion, in company with his brother (a barrister), Mr. Townsend suddenly fell backwards, and died almost immediately. The late Mr. Townsend, who was certificated in Trinity Term, 1837, was the principal in the legal firm of Townsend, Lee, & Houseman, which has a large business as Parliamentary and railway agents.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—It is stated that Mr. Hamer Hatton Stansfeld, one of the official assignees attached to the Court of the late Mr. Commissioner Foulsham, and since discharging the duties of provisional assignee under the old insolvencies, has retired on his full allowance. During the present vacation, and up to November next, the registrars will act as Chief Judge in bankruptcy in rotation, and the senior registrar will dispose of all motions and applications in pending bankruptcies. Mr. J. F. Miller, the chief registrar, has retired, after twenty-seven years' service, on the full allowance of £2,000 per annum.

LEEDS BANKRUPTCY COURT.—A recent London Gazette contains a notice from the Lord Chancellor, ordering that all the business still pending in the Leeds District Court of Bankruptcy, and in the sub-districts of Hull and Sheffield, if not disposed of by the 30th of September next, shall be transferred to the county courts at Leeds, Hull, and Sheffield respectively, according to the bankruptcy court in which such business was pending on the 31st December last; and all property in the bankruptcies now vested in Mr. G. Young, the official assignee, shall be transferred on the 30th of September to the respective registrars of the county courts to which the business of the bankruptcies shall be transferred, to whom also shall be transferred all the books, papers, documents, and money belonging to the respective bankruptcies.

THE AMERICAN LAW COURTS.

There are in each State of the Union two sets of Courts, the one belonging to and administering the laws of the particular State, the other belonging to and administering the law of the United States. The latter are called District Courts, and they have cognisance of all suits to which the United States are party, or in which different states are plaintiffs and defendants, and they have extensive admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; they have also cognisance of all crimes committed against the United States. Thus, if a letter is stolen from the Post-office, as the department is under Government, the offender is tried in one of the District Courts. Besides these, there are Circuit Courts established by Congress in the ten Circuits into which the United States have been divided, and their chief duty is to enforce obligations of the people of the United States in their national character, or which result from the laws passed by Congress. But many of the District Courts have been clothed with Circuit Court powers, and the system is too technical and complicated for explanation here. I need not say that amongst the judges, advocates, and juries, there are to be found some of the ablest men who have ever adorned the profession; but I will only speak of a few peculiarities which struck me. In the first place, there is no legal costume, not even a gown; and this, I think, is a mistake. No sane people would think of introducing our wigs, which, I believe, astonished the Japanese when they were here more than anything else they saw in England; but an appropriate dress would add dignity and respect to the bench and the bar. There is certainly in some of the Courts a want of what we should think proper decorum. At Chicago I listened for some time to a trial where the question was as to the right of the plaintiff to what, in the Illinois law, is called a mechanic's lien. The subject in dispute was dull enough, but the scene was amusing. When I entered the Courts people were smoking ad libitum; but this was during an adjournment, and when the trial was resumed the judge said that they must put out their cigars. The jury sat on rows of chairs, in front of which was a low iron bar; and the counsel, in addressing them, walked backwards and forwards, over and anon spitting vehemently. One of them frequently declared that his learned friend had got into a "pretty tight fix," and this accounted for the weakness of his argument. In the meantime the judge, whose observations showed that he was an acute lawyer, descended from his seat, and talked with some of the bystanders—I was going to say he joked, but he looked much too dyspeptic for that. In Philadelphia I once heard an advocate, who was interrupted by a judge, address him with great earnestness as "my dear sir!" Public officers in the United States, from the President downwards, are underpaid, and the judges are no exception to the rule. Their salaries are quite inadequate to their station; and I met one day at dinner a distinguished and able judge, who was just leaving the bench to resume his practice at the bar, for the avowed reason that he wanted a better income for his family. This is a great evil; but a worse one is that of choosing the judges by popular election, and "running" the candidates, as if they were striving for a political office. I think that in Philadelphia this system is discontinued, and it ought to be abolished everywhere.—Impressions of America, by W. Forsyth, Q.C.

LEGAL RESTRICTIONS ON ATTORNEYS' CHARGES.

By the seventh section of the new pension law the fee of an agent or attorney prosecuting a claim for bounty land is limited to 25 dols., and by the eighth section he is rendered liable to 500 dols. fine, and five years' imprisonment, if he should receive or contract to receive a greater sum. This penal provision is consistent with the previous legislation of Congress upon the subject of the relation of attorney and client in the matter of pension and bounty applications. The honourable gentlemen who have charge of the drafting of pension laws seem to think that service in the United States army renders a man, as well as his heirs, totally incompetent to enter into an ordinary contract for the collection of the amount designated by law as the reward of military labours. We suppose that occasionally cases have occurred in which claim agents have charged unreasonable sums for the duties performed by them in the adjustment of soldiers' claims, but we do not believe the evil ever reached such a point as to demand the passage of a law of the character mentioned. And, even allowing the charges of attorneys in the claim business to have been uniformly excessive, there is no justice in an enactment declaring that the taking of an exorbitant fee is a crime, which shall consign its perpetrator to a long imprisonment. Laws of such a character are both wicked and foolish. They are wicked, because they punish, with undue severity, a trifling fault, and tend thereby to confuse men's ideas of right and wrong. They are foolish, because their severity prevents them from being carried out, and men do not hesitate to disobey them. They are an injury to the very class they are designed to protect, by compelling them to pay not only the value of the labour performed for them, but an extra premium to compensate for the risk of breaking the law. Claim agents will not attend to difficult cases for the statute fee. If they charge more there is danger, and they cannot face that danger without remuneration. Consequently, the claimant must pay a much larger sum than would be required if no law existed. Some people pretend that these laws regarding attorneys' fees are unconstitutional, and that the commissioner of pensions is not anxious to have the United States Supreme Court pass upon them. How that may be we do not know; but we do not remember that any Washington attorney has ever been tried for violating these laws, although we are told that during the eight years last past they have been constantly disregarded by persons practising before the departments.—Albany Law Journal.

LEGAL CANDIDATES FOR PARLIAMENT.—Mr. Commissioner Kerr, Judge of the London Court, and Mr. Douglas Straight, barrister-at-law, of the Home Circuit, are candidates for the representation of Shrewsbury, which has become vacant by the death of Mr. W. J. Clement—the former in the Liberal and the latter in the Conservative interest. Sir Richard Bagge, Q.C., who was formerly M.P. for Hereford, and was Solicitor-General for a few weeks at the close of Mr. Disraeli's administration in 1868, is the Conservative candidate for Mid-Surrey, which seat has become vacant by the elevation of the Hon. W. Brodrick to the House of Peers by the demise of his father, Viscount Midleton.

LEGAL STAFF OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—It is affirmed that Sir Denis Le Marchant, who has been clerk to the House of Commons since 1830, will retire before the next session of Parliament. Sir Denis, who was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1822, began his public career as principal secretary to Lord Chancellor Brougham in 1830, and was appointed clerk to the Crown in Chancery in 1834. From 1836 to 1850 he filled the office of secretary to the Board of Trade, secretary to the Treasury, and under-secretary in the Home Department, and in 1850 became clerk to the House of Commons. The salary of the office is £2,000 per annum, and the patronage vests with the Crown. It is believed that Sir Erskine May, barrister-at-law, who has been assistant-clerk to the House of Commons since 1856, will succeed Sir Denis, and that Mr. Palgrave will succeed Sir Erskine as first clerk assistant, with a salary of £1,750. Mr. Postlethwaite, principal clerk of the Journal Office, whose salary is £1,000, also retires, and will be succeeded, it is presumed, by Mr. Bull.

At the recent commencement of the law department of the University of Chicago, the degree of Bachelor of Laws was conferred upon Mrs. Ada H. Kopley, who had pursued the regular course of studies, and had passed a very creditable examination. The Legal News informs us that "there was some question with the college authorities as to the proper wording of the degree conferred upon Mrs. Kopley. It was stated that it could not be Maid of Laws, as she possessed a 'married disability,' in the shape of a husband." The progressive spirit of the female portion of the nineteenth century is rather tough on the English language. Not content with having it settled that "he," "his," and "him," relate to the feminine gender, or with having a New York firm of female brokers called "bulls," the grave authorities of the University of Chicago demonstrate to us that a woman, and a married woman at that, may be a bachelor. While we believe that "bachelor" is more honoured in the breeches than in the present observance, we are not disposed to appeal to the ghost of Webster or Worcester. We accept the fact, and sincerely hope that the Supreme Court of Illinois will do the same, and find some means of giving the statute such a liberal construction as to admit the fair bachelor into the bosom of the bar.—Albany Law Journal.

By the death of Sir Thomas Montgomery Cuninghame, of Corshill, Ayrshire, which took place in London on the 30th August, his son Lieutenant-Colonel William James Cuninghame, V.C., commandant of the Inns of Court Volunteer Corps, becomes a baronet.

A NEW LEGAL PEER.—The Hon. William Brodrick, M.P., barrister-at-law, has become a peer by the death of his father, the Very Rev. Viscount Midleton. The new peer was born on the 6th January, 1830. He was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1851, but did not proceed to the degree of M.A. till 1861. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn on the 17th November, 1855, and has practised on the Home Circuit as an equity draughtsman and conveyancer. Viscount Midleton, who is a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for Surrey, unsuccessfully contested the representation of the eastern division of that county in 1865, but in December, 1868, was elected for Mid-Surrey. Viscount Midleton married, on the 25th October, 1853, Augusta Mary, third daughter of the Right Hon. Sir Thomas Fremantle, Bart., by which lady he has a family of two sons and four daughters. The Hon. G. C. Brodrick, barrister-at-law, of the Western Circuit, is a brother of the new peer.

The conference committee of the United States Senate and House on the appropriation bill has abandoned the amendments made by the Senate, increasing the salary of the judiciary. While hundreds of thousands are squandered annually on all sorts of chimerical schemes; while our prudent legislators legislate to themselves munificent salaries, and cling to their franking privileges with the tenacity of leeches, the highest judicial officers in the country are left with salaries hardly adequate to compensate a police justice.—Albany Law Journal.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

There have been few features to record in the markets for securities during the past week. The public funds have undergone but few fluctuations, and during the last day or two increased steadiness has been manifested. The demand for discount is very limited, and the glut of money very great and increasing. On Thursday the Bank rate of discount was again reduced to 3½ per cent., a movement which had been fully anticipated.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 10, 1870.

THE PRESENT WAR between France and Germany has given rise to much discussion respecting the rights of belligerents, duties of neutrals, contraband of war, &c., &c. As yet, however, no question has been raised as to the right of a neutral to allow its subjects to lend money to one of the belligerents. It is clear that the neutral state cannot lend money to a belligerent without losing all right to be treated as a neutral. It has been said also that a neutral is under an additional duty to forbid the raising within its territories of loans for belligerents. With the constantly increasing numbers of combatants in modern war, and with the use of more and more elaborate war-materials of all kinds, belligerents require an ever-increasing amount of money, and gold is therefore becoming more than ever important in every war that is not very speedily terminated. Neither France nor Germany have yet been obliged to have recourse to foreign countries for loans, but if this war should unhappily continue one or both of them will probably endeavour to borrow on the London Stock Exchange for the support of the war. Would it be a breach of England's neutrality to allow such a loan to be brought out and subscribed for in London? There is not much authority upon the subject. There is one case (De Wutz v. Hendricks, 9 Moore, 486, 2 Bing. 314) which is often cited as an authority to show that it is illegal by English law to raise money in England for a belligerent at peace with this country. Without examining this decision in detail we may say that it does not in any way support this proposition. It is one of a sufficiently numerous class of cases which are constantly cited as authorities for propositions which they do not decide. Amongst writers on international law, there is but little to be found on this question. Phillimore (International Law, 3, 221), indeed, says that to allow the raising of loans for belligerents is contrary to international law; but his chief authorities for this view are De Wutz v. Hendricks and one of Milton's sonnets. Halleck (International Law, 526), takes the same view, and cites as his authority Phillimore and De Wutz v. Hendricks. Bluntschli (Das Moderne Völkerrecht, 768) also agrees with Phillimore, and cites (although he usually quotes no authorities) De Wutz v. Hendricks. Most of the other writers on international law omit all discussion of the question, probably because they consider that it falls within the general rule that neutrals are entitled to continue their trade just as if no war existed, subject only to the liability of capture at sea, and to the duty of preventing the sailing of armed ships from their ports.

The rule has been shortly but forcibly laid down by an Attorney-General of the United States, "that an enemy may come into the territory of a neutral power, and there purchase and thence remove any article whatsoever, even instruments of war, is a law of nations and long universally established" (see Twiss, Law of Nations Time of War, 431). If this passage correctly states the rule of international law, and if we believe that it does correctly state it, it is clear that a belligerent may raise loans in a neutral territory without involving the neutral in any breach of neutrality. Gold is useless in war, except to obtain war material in some shape or another, and if the war material may itself be furnished by the neutral, a fortiori, money may be furnished in the same way.

We do not by any means say that it is desirable that the law should be as it is. On the contrary we believe that the more nearly war is reduced to the condition of a duel strictly confined to the combatants, and fought out according to fixed rules, the less misery will war cause, and the nearer we shall be to its ultimate suppression; and to prevent aid from neutrals in money or arms would tend to this end. What the law is and what the law ought to be are, however, frequently very different things. We hope that a speedy termination of the war may deprive this question of the practical importance which it possesses at the present moment.

THE NEW LAW COURTS BUILDINGS will occupy, according to the altered plan, a square block, extending from Carey-street on the north, to the Strand on the south. The south-east corner will be a trifle to the east of Temple Bar, and the north-east, estimated roughly again, will be some fifty yards west of the south-east corner of Carey-street. On the Strand and Carey-street sides the general run of the line of buildings will be pretty nearly level with the street. On the Bell-yard side there will remain an unoccupied strip extending the whole length of the building and averaging about fifty feet in width, while on the western side there will be a considerably larger portion of vacant ground, of very irregular form, on which it is considered that additional offices may hereafter be erected. Of the whole block which we have thus roughly described, about two-thirds, reckoning from the west side eastwards, are appropriated to the main block containing the courts and central hall. Along the eastern side of the remaining one-third, and occupying nearly half its width, runs the block of buildings appropriated to the offices, its southern extremity resting on Temple Bar, and its northern end facing the entrance to Union Bank Chambers. With the addition of two projecting members which unite it with the courts block, this offices block resembles rudely a letter E turned backwards. Between it and the courts block there are thus, a central quadrangle rather long and narrow and running north and south, and two entrance court-yards, one outside each end.

So much for the main outlines of the geography of the Palace of Justice. Let us now examine the arrangements of the courts and central hall block somewhat more in detail. The floor of the courts will be four feet above the level of Carey-street, and twenty-one feet above the level of the Strand, while the central hall will be a story lower, only four feet above the level of the Strand. The arrangement is this. Outside of all, running all round the oblong courts block (except over the north and south entrances and some staircases) are twenty-one judges' private rooms, which are thus disposed around the building as a sort of padding to fence off the noisy world outside. These private rooms will be accessible by several private staircases and entrances. The judges' rooms are four feet above the level of the floor of the court, from which they are separated by a judges' corridor running round the building each way. Inside this shell are fourteen courts, with a large light-space and a witnesses' stairs between every two of them. Inside these, again, is a bar corridor running right round the building. Inside the bar corridor comes a zone occupied by more light-spaces and a few consultation rooms; and inside all these, like a hollow kernel of the whole, is the central hall. Thus the zone of courts is secured from the outer noise by the zone of judges' rooms, and from the inner buzz of the central hall by the bar corridor and light-shafts. There will be public galleries to the courts, accessible by passage communicating with Carey-street by two separate entrances, and with the Strand by two staircases, one on either side of the principal entrance. Besides the judges' private entrances and those leading to the public galleries, to the central hall there will be four main entrances from without. The principal and public entrance will be from the Strand, through a doorway flanked by the two stair-towers leading up to the public court galleries. Passing between these towers, and through the portal, we shall gain the central hall by ascending some four feet of steps and passing beneath the bar corridor and some consultation rooms. Staircases right and left of the hall will lead to the several courts. At the opposite end of the building will be the bar entrance, one foot above Carey-street, with robing-rooms on either side, and leading to a bar-room on the same level, that is, three feet below the bar corridor, which is reached by passing through the bar-room. There are also delineated on the plan two smaller entrances passing under the courts—one opening into the vacant ground on the west side, and the other into the quadrangle.

There will be no buildings above the courts, and of course nothing above the central hall. The highest zone of buildings will be the outer one of the judges' rooms, which will stand thus walling in the whole, as it were.

The judges' rooms will be surmounted by the Vice-Chancellors' chambers, while immediately below them two more floors will be appropriated to offices. In order to render the various courts more quickly accessible from each other the central hall is spanned by a bridge communicating at each end with the bar corridor. In the court zone the courts are arranged in the following order:—On either side of the Strand entrance, an Exchequer and a Common Pleas court right and left. Then, in the western side there are, reckoning northwards, two more Exchequer courts; Divorce, Admiralty, Bankruptcy, Vice-Chancellor's, and a Master of the Rolls' or Appeal courts. Reckoning northwards, on the eastern side there are—first, two more Common Pleas courts, then three Queen's Bench courts, a Vice-Chancellor's court, and a Vice-Chancellor's or Appeal court. And on either side of the Carey-street or bar entrance are the Lord Chancellor's and Lords Justices' courts respectively. So far as noise is concerned, the quietest courts will, of course, be those on the eastern or quadrangle side. In the offices block, which we described as placed over against the courts block somewhat in the form of a reversed letter E, the ground or Strand floor will contain common law, writ, appearance and judgment offices, Common Pleas masters, accountant general and record, writ and report offices. Above these another floor will contain more common law, writ, appearance and judgment offices, Queen's Bench masters, and registrars in Chancery. On a third floor there will be Exchequer masters, Queen's Remembrancer, and more Chancery registrars, while a fourth floor will house the taxing masters, and the stationery department.

The Admiralty and Probate registrars are not finally disposed of, but a note in the plan states, that they are to be located either over the Vice-Chancellors' chambers, or between the quadrangle and its southern court-yard.

We have now described, roughly, though rather more minutely than in our impression of August 6, the general characteristics of the modified plan which Lord Hatherley, as Chairman of the Commission, signed on August 3. It is evident that the commissioners regretted extremely that so much curtailment should have been insisted on; and we cannot but consider it an ill-judged piece of retrenchment on the part of the present Government. Economy in the public service is an excellent thing, towards which the Government cannot be blamed for pressing, but it is possible to overstep the mark, or rather, in striving after economy, to lose sight of efficiency. Already in the matter of military administration, it has been found necessary to make a hasty rush from retrenchment to enlargement, to rebuild at much cost what we had just pulled down. A system can always be changed and re-changed, but our new Palace of Justice must be built once for all. However, it seems too late now to complain on this head. Adopting a phrase employed by the commissioners in their report, we may say that if the funds at the disposal of her Majesty's Government are so limited as to render any change necessary, the arrangements of the plan now signed by Lord Hatherley seem the best that could be made compatible with so much curtailment. The arrangements for rendering the courts as quiet as possible seem very good; but we should like to assure ourselves that the courts will be found large enough. It appears from the report that, upon the Treasury Commissioners notifying the reductions they proposed to have made in the scheme, and the manner in which they proposed to have them worked out, the Courts of Justice Commissioners resolved, on July 27, that as it seemed that economy of space might prompt the omission of some of the offices previously included, the omission ought to be made in the following order:—1, Land registry; 2, Middlesex registry; 3, Acknowledgment of deeds by married women; 4, Enrolment; 5, Petty bag; 6, Solicitor to Suitors' Fund; 7, Lunacy; 8, Taxing masters; 9, Record, writ and report; 10, Accountant-General; and further, that the omission of the last three offices would render the work of concentration very incomplete. According to the plan, as we understand it, the deficiency only stops short of thus being "very incomplete," for we do not find any lunacy offices marked on it. What a pity that the concentration is not to be made quite complete.

To enable the commissioners to complete their task, their powers were extended to the 12th of August last. They have completed their report and ended their labours. The list of the Courts of Justice Commissioners at the date of the report numbers 38, and since the first appointment of the commissioners in 1865 there have been 33 removals (including those of Lord Cairns and Sir Roundell Palmer, who, on going out of office, were re-appointed by name). Of the 33 removals, 7 (including those of four Lords Justices), were by death, and the remainder on the quittal of office by ex officio members.

WE PRINT IN ANOTHER COLUMN a report of a case of some importance, in which Mr. Registrar Murray, sitting for the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, gave his decision a few days ago. The facts were shortly these:—Before the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, the debtor gave to his creditor two deeds by way of security, by which he covenanted to pay certain sums of money on a certain day (which day was long before 1861), with interest up to that day; but there was no covenant to pay interest after that day. After 1861 the creditor recovered judgment for the amount covenanted to be paid, with interest up to judgment. The creditor now sought to have a debtor's summons against his debtor for the amount of his judgment, and interest upon that amount from the date of judgment. The learned Registrar, however, held that he was not entitled to a summons. The question turned upon certain sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. By section 7 a debtor's summons can only issue for a debt "sufficient to support a petition in bankruptcy." By section 118 "no person not a trader shall be adjudged a bankrupt in respect of a debt contracted before the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861."

It was contended for the creditor first, that though the original debt became due before 1861, yet that it was merged in the judgment which was recovered after 1861, and that the latter thereby became a new debt contracted after 1861. The learned Registrar, however, held otherwise. The precise point has not been, as far as we know, decided either under the similar section of the Act of 1861 or the present Act. But there are a number of cases which show that though a common law right of action may be merged in a specialty or a judgment, courts of bankruptcy look on the original debt as still subsisting and as the real debt for the purposes of the bankruptcy. This has been repeatedly held in favour of the creditor (see Ex parte Griffiths, 1 W. R. 236, 9

D. M. & G. 175, and the many cases there cited), and it is difficult to see why the same rule should not apply in favour of the debtor.

Secondly, it was argued for the creditor that, even if the original debt accrued down to 1861 was too old, still the interest accrued due since that date was a new debt, for which the summons might issue. To this there was a short and simple answer, though it does not seem to have been suggested to the Registrar. By the express terms of section 6, a petitioning creditor's debt must be "a liquidated sum due at law or in equity;" and in this case interest could only be recovered as unliquidated damages. The learned Registrar came to the same conclusion upon another ground. He held that it would have made no difference whether the interest had been payable by express contract or only as damages; "the date at which the debt was contracted must be the date of the deed." If the learned Registrar meant to lay down that, if at any time and under any circumstances, money becomes payable under a contract made before 1861, this will be a debt contracted before 1861, it seems to us a dangerous doctrine. There are, no doubt, expressions of Lord Cranworth's in Williams v. Harding (14 W. R. 503) tending to support such a view, but that case is not an authority for any proposition so wide.

WE CALL THE ATTENTION of registration agents to the fact that, although by the Naturalization Act, 1870, aliens can hold real property in the United Kingdom, such real property is not to qualify them for the Parliamentary franchise. If an alien claims a vote he may, if not objected to, be placed upon the register, especially as in many cases it is not possible from his name to discover that a person is an alien. Of course on a petition the vote of an alien would be struck out as null and void; still it is by no means desirable to rest satisfied with this circumstance. We happen to know that this warning is necessary on account of several aliens having already claimed votes on the strength of the new Act.

MR. JUSTICE BYLES has appointed Wednesday, the 14th of September instant, for the trial of the Brecon election petition. His Lordship will arrive at Brecon on Tuesday evening, the 13th, and open his court at ten o'clock on Wednesday morning.

THE HALF-YEARLY GENERAL MEETING of the Solicitors' Benevolent Society will be held on Wednesday, October 12, at the Law Library, Bristol.

CONTRACTS UNDER SECTION 7 OF THE RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC ACT, 1854 (17 & 18 VICT. C. 31).

III.

We have already noticed several cases where conditions prima facie unreasonable have been upheld because the plaintiff, having a reasonable alternative between such contracts and another way of sending his goods voluntarily agreed to the conditions in question. This principle is also recognised in Allday v. The Great Western Railway Company (13 W. R. 43, 34 L. J. Q. B. 5) and in Booth v. North Eastern Railway Company (15 W. R. 695, L. R. 2 Ex. 173). In neither of these cases was there an alternative offered, and in both the conditions were held unreasonable, as mentioned in our last article. In the latter of these cases the effect of the plaintiff's having a reasonable alternative is very clearly stated. Kelly, C.B., says, "In order to disentitle the owners of the cattle carried to complain, a choice must be left to him to accept or to refuse the offer of the company. If he accept it he is disentitled; if he reject it the company are thrown back upon or left to their common law liability." It was also held in this case that the fact that the company granted, and the plaintiff accepted, a free pass for a person who travelled with the cattle did not affect the unreasonableness of the condition.

In order to enable a company to rely on an alternative contract offered to the plaintiff it must appear that such alternative was itself reasonable. A company cannot offer a choice of two unreasonable contracts and then rely on the one actually chosen. In Lloyd v. Waterford & Limerick Railway Company (15 Ir. C. L. 37), horses were sent by the defendants' line "at the low rate of charges above mentioned, solely on the condition that the company shall be free from all liability in respect of them." The plaintiff had an alternative that "the company will undertake the risk of conveyance only in consideration of an additional payment of £20 per cent. on the low rate of charge; but no claim for damage will be entertained by the company unless the injury is stated and pointed out to the company's agent at the time of unloading." It was held that the latter part of the alternative condition was unreasonable; that the plaintiff had, therefore, no reasonable choice; and that the contract was consequently void. No question seems to have been raised as to whether the additional £20 per cent. was a reasonable amount to add to the fare. It seems to have been assumed that it was reasonable. It is to be noticed that it appeared to be the opinion of the Court that the latter part of the alternative contract would be prima facie unreasonable if it stood alone as the contract of carriage.

It would seem also that if any particular descriptions of goods are peculiarly liable to injury in carriage, as glass, china, &c., or liable to deterioration, as fish, meat, fruit, &c., &c., it may be reasonable with regard to such goods to require that the company shall not be liable for such injury or deterioration, or that a rate should be paid for them higher than that which is usually paid for other kinds of goods not so liable to damage. That, is the reasonable amount for the carriage of such goods may be higher than that for the carriage of other goods, and if they are carried at the rate usually charged for other goods it is not unreasonable that then the company should not be liable for damage.

Having examined the decisions which have established the form and nature of the contract required by the statute, we shall now collect the decisions upon some conditions which we have not yet noticed. In Simons v. The Great Western Railway Company (4 W. R. 651, 2 C. B. N. S. 620, 26 L. J. C. P. 25) a condition that the company were not to be liable "for the loss, detention, or damage of any package insufficiently or improperly packed, marked, directed, or described, or containing a variety of articles liable by breaking to damage each other," was held to be unreasonable because "it seems to relieve the company from a loss by reason of insufficient packing, it being quite immaterial whether the goods are properly packed or not if the whole package is lost and they rely on that as the ground of relief." In the plea in which this condition was set up there was no mention of any special circumstances which might make it reasonable. In White v. The Great Western Railway Company (5 W. R. 488, 26 L. J. O. P. 158, 2 C. B. N. S. 7) a quantity of cheese was sent on a contract "at owner's risk," and subject to (amongst others) the conditions that the company "will not under any circumstances be liable for loss of market or other claim arising from delay or detention of any train, whether at starting or at any of the stations, or in the course of the journey." Channell, B. (then Serjt. Channell, and sitting as commissioner), at the trial decided that these conditions were reasonable, and the Court apparently were of opinion that he was right. The decision, however, went on another point, and it must be remembered that it was before Peck's case was decided in the House of Lords; and if it is inconsistent with Peck's case, it must now, of course, be considered as overruled. And it would seem that according to Peck's case such a condition would now be held prima facie unreasonable. In Lewis v. The Great Western Railway Company (29 L. J. Ex. 425, 5 H. & N. 867) a condition that "no claim for deficiency, damage, or detention, shall be allowed unless made within three days after delivery of the goods, nor for loss unless made within seven days after the time when they should have been delivered" was held reasonable; and the Court seemed also to think that the condition "the company will not be answerable for the loss or detention of any goods untruly or incorrectly described or declared in the declaration or receiving note furnished by the company," was also reasonable. The opinion, however, as to this second condition is not so strongly expressed as it is as to the other condition. And it would seem that it was sufficient for the decision that the first condition was reasonable. It is difficult to see how the decision that the second condition is reasonable can be reconciled with Simons v. The Great Western Railway Company, where a very similar condition was held to be unreasonable. The argument given in Simons' case for holding such a condition unreasonable seems so strong that it is probable that the decision in Simons' case will be more likely to be followed than that of Lewis's case. In Beal v. South Devon Railway Company (8 W. R. 651, 29 L. J. Ex. 441) a condition respecting the carriage of fish "exempting the company from all liability for loss or injury arising from delay or detention of train, or from any cause other than gross neglect or fraud" was held reasonable. In Harrison v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company (31 L. J. Q. B. 113) a condition that the railway company were "not to be liable in any case for loss or damage to any horse or other animal above the value of £10, or any dog above the value of £5, unless a declaration of value signed by the owner or his agent at the time of booking shall have been given to them," was held by the majority of the Court (Wilde, J., dissenting) to be reasonable. This decision was in the Exchequer Chamber, and it reversed the judgment in the court below. It is doubtful, however, whether this decision can now be supported, as it seems inconsistent with Peck's case, since decided in the House of Lords. In Aldridge v. The Great Western Railway Company (15 Q. B. N. S. 528, 33 L. J. C. P. 161), it was held reasonable that a company should make a condition that they were not to be liable "in respect of goods destined for places beyond the limits of the company's railway; and as respects the company their responsibility will cease when such goods shall have been delivered over to another carrier in the usual course of further conveyance. Since the decision of this case it has, however, been held, as we stated in our first article on this subject, that the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, s. 7, does not apply to contracts for carriage beyond the line of the company making it (Zunz v. South Eastern Railway Company, 17 W. R. 1096, L. R. 4 Q. B. 539); and, therefore, such a contract as that in Aldridge v. Great Western Railway Company would be good because the statute does not extend to it, and it, therefore, falls within the ordinary rule of contracts.

We have now, we believe, enumerated all the cases on this part of section 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, which have been decided in the Superior and Appeal Courts of Common Law. Other cases have, of course, arisen in inferior courts to which we have not space to refer (See Woodger v. Great Eastern Railway Company, 12 S. J. 766; Brown v. Midland Railway Company, 14 S. J. 395). At the risk of being thought to indulge in unnecessary repetition we venture to state again as briefly as possible the rules to be deduced from the decisions we have discussed. First, no company can relieve itself from liability for the neglect or default of its servants, except by a contract which is in writing, signed by or for the consignor, and is also reasonable. Secondly, whether or not a contract is reasonable under this section is a matter of law and not of fact. Thirdly, the section only applies to liability for the neglect or default of a company, and not to their liability as insurers. Fourthly, it only applies to contracts for carriage over the contracting company's own line. Fifthly, conditions purporting to relieve a company from all liability in respect of goods carried are prima facie unreasonable and void; but such condition may be shown to be reasonable under special circumstances, as if the sender of the goods had a bona fide reasonable choice between sending the goods under the common law terms or on the special terms, and voluntarily chose the special terms.

LEGISLATION OF THE YEAR.

CAP. XIV.—An Act to amend the law relating to the legal condition of aliens and British subjects.

The passing of an Act such as the Naturalization Act, 1870, was a paramount necessity of the session of 1870 after the labours of the Royal Commission, and the diplomatic negotiations on the subject. The Act makes four great alterations in the English law relative to aliens and the capacity of being or ceasing to be a British subject. First, aliens are enabled to hold real property, with the restriction that it is not to qualify them for the Parliamentary or any other franchise. Secondly, the jury de medietate linguæ is abolished. Thus, except that they cannot exercise any franchise or be registered as owners of British ships, aliens are now placed, as regards property, on exactly the same footing as British subjects. Thirdly, the maxim nemo potest exuere patriam is rendered obsolete, by a British subject being enabled to expatriate himself by voluntary naturalisation in a foreign state, and by enabling a British subject born abroad and being thereby a subject of the state where he is born to make a declaration of alienage, and so to cease to be a British subject. It will be noticed, however, that when a person born abroad, who by birth is a natural-born British subject, i.e., whose father or grandfather, ex parte paterna, was a natural-born subject, does not make a declaration of alienage, he still continues a natural-born British subject. Fourthly, a certificate of naturalization granted by a Secretary of State gives the grantee all political and other rights of a British subject just as an Act of Parliament does, whereas formerly a certificate expressly excepted the capacity of being a member of Parliament and sitting in the Privy Council.

Having thus indicated the four great points wherein the Act alters the antecedent law, it will be desirable to epitomise the provisions of the Act. The sections are classed under seven heads. The first treats of "the status of aliens in the United Kingdom," and embraces four sections (2—5). Real and personal property may be held by and succeeded to through an alien, with the proviso that the section (2) shall not qualify an alien to hold real property out of the United Kingdom, or for any office or franchise, nor shall it give him by implication any rights, nor shall the section be retrospective—i.e., it shall not affect estates or interests to which a person is or may be entitled in possession or expectancy in pursuance of any disposition or in consequence of any death before the Act. A naturalized alien may, where a convention has been entered into with the state of which such alien was originally a subject, and in pursuance thereof, make a declaration of alienage, and thus cease to be a British subject (section 3); and a British subject born abroad, if by birth a subject of the state where born, may make a declaration of alienage, and thus cease to be a British subject (section 4). The 5th section abolishes the jury de medietate linguæ.

The second head is "Expatriation," and includes only section 6. This section enacts that a British subject who has been or may hereafter be voluntarily naturalized in a foreign state shall ipso facto cease to be a British subject, and become a "statutory alien"; but a British subject naturalized in a foreign state before the Act has two years from its date within which he may make a declaration of British nationality and take the oath of allegiance. If he does so he is to be deemed a British subject, but not within the limits of the state where naturalized, unless, by the law of that state or by any treaty, the making of the declaration and taking the oath have made him an alien to such state.

The third head is "Naturalization and resumption of British nationality," and includes sections 7, 8, and 9. A certificate may be granted (or withheld at discretion) by a Secretary of State to an alien, who adduces satisfactory evidence of (1) his having for not less than four years resided in the United Kingdom or served under the Crown; (2) his intention, when naturalized, to reside in the United Kingdom or to serve under the Crown. The four years are to be within such limit previous to the application for the certificate as the Secretary of State may generally or specially appoint. The certificate is not to take effect until the grantee has taken the oath of allegiance. The grantee of a certificate is, "in the United Kingdom, to be entitled to all political and other rights, powers, and privileges, and subject to all obligations to which a natural born British subject is entitled or subject in the United Kingdom," with the qualification that, within the limits of the foreign state of which he was a subject at the time of his naturalization, he shall not be deemed a British subject unless he has ceased to be a subject of such state by the laws thereof or by any treaty. The section (7) authorises the grant of a certificate to any person about whose status as a British subject there may be any doubt, as well as to persons naturalized before the passing of the Act; the object in this last case being to enable them to obtain those political privileges which they would not have if naturalized by certificate under the old law. The wording of the section is open to this objection, that the introduction of the words "in the United Kingdom," where italicised above, may raise a question whether the grantee of a certificate of naturalization has, where the qualifying words do not apply, the privileges of a British subject out of the United Kingdom as well as in it, but we presume that it would be held that by implication he has. The 8th section authorises the grant of a certificate of re-admission to British nationality to a natural born British subject who has become a statutory alien. The applicant has to perform the same conditions, and the certificate has precisely the same effect, as in the case of the grant of a certificate of naturalization, but there are these differences—the governor of a British possession may grant a certificate of re-admission to nationality, although he cannot one of naturalization, and residence in such possession counts as equivalent to residence in the United Kingdom for the purposes of the latter certificate.

The fourth head is the "National status of married women and infant children," and embraces but one (the 11th) section, which lays down five rules. They are shortly (1) a married woman is a subject of the state of which her husband is a subject; (2) a widow, who being a natural born British subject, became an alien by marriage, may obtain a certificate of re-admission to British nationality; (3) when a British born father, or a British born mother, if a widow, becomes a statutory alien, their infant children resident in the state of which the parents are subjects shall, if subjects of such state, cease to be British subjects; (4) a certificate of re-admission granted to a father or to a mother, if a widow, shall cover their infant children, if resident in the British dominions; (5) a certificate of naturalization is to have an analogous effect.

The fifth head is "Supplemental provisions," and embraces sections 11 and 12, the first of which gives the Secretary of State power to make certain regulations for carrying the Act into effect, and the latter contains certain regulations as to the method of proving certificates granted in pursuance of the Act, and other matters of evidence.

The sixth head contains the miscellaneous provisions in sections 13 to 16, and the defining clause, section 17. The Act is not to affect the royal prerogative of granting letters of denization (section 13), nor to qualify an alien to be the owner of a British ship (section 14). A British subject who becomes a statutory alien is not thereby discharged from liability for antecedent acts (section 15). The colonies are to have power to legislate with respect to naturalization, subject to confirmation or disallowal by her Majesty (section 16). The seventh and last heading is the repealing section.

In our remarks upon the bill when it made its first appearance in the Lords (ante p. 389) we objected to the 8th section then part of the bill, which conferred upon the Secretary of State the power of revoking the grant of a certificate of naturalization in certain specified cases. The section was also objected to in the House by Lords Westbury and Penzance, and the result was that it was struck out. There is, therefore, no power to revoke the grant of a certificate of naturalization except of course by Act of Parliament. A naturalized alien may, however, divest himself of his status as a British subject in two ways—first, by being voluntarily naturalized in a foreign state; and, secondly, by a declaration of alienage when a convention providing for such a contingency has been entered into by the Crown with the state of which he was originally a subject. In this latter case he again becomes a subject of such state.

CAP. XV.—An Act to transfer to the Commissioners of her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings the property in and control over the buildings and property of the county courts in England, and for other purposes relating thereto.

Hitherto the county court buildings throughout the country have been vested, as matter of property, in the treasurers of the respective courts, or, where there was no treasurer, in a person specially appointed by the Treasury. The power and duty of making contracts for cleaning, lighting, and maintaining the courts have belonged to the Commissioners of the Treasury. The appointment of the servants of the court has lain with the registrar.

By this Act everything is handed over to the Board of Works. The buildings are to be vested in them; they, not the Treasury, are to make the necessary contracts; and they are to "give such directions to the registrar of each court, with regard to the hiring and dismissing of servants, as shall seem fit." This Act will tend to simplify things, and, therefore, will probably be of some service.

Of course, the Act contains a blunder; we should hardly recognise it as an Act of Parliament without one. But, happily, this time it is a harmless one, a mere piece of slovenliness. It is no worse than that "twice they slew the slain." The 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 52, was expressly repealed by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 2. It is again expressly repealed by the present Act.

CAP. XVII.—An Act to provide for the equal distribution over the metropolis of a further portion of the charge for the relief of the poor.

Our readers must be well aware of the effect of the Union Chargeability Act, 1865, in transferring generally the costs of supporting the poor from the parishes to the unions. This was done by charging such costs on the common fund, to which every parish in the union was bound to contribute, in proportion, not to its chargeable poor, but to the annual rateable value of the property in it assessed to the relief of the poor.

The common fund, indeed, seems as convenient to poor law reformers as the consolidated fund once was to statesmen; it has a back broad enough to bear almost anything. At first it was modestly asked only to find relief for destitute wayfarers, wanderers, and foundlings, who became chargeable; and then to maintain such paupers as had become irremovable by length of residence, and the requisite term of residence has been twice reduced since the original Act. Next it had to find the expenses of examining, removing, and maintaining pauper lunatics; and now it has to bear the costs of relieving, vaccinating, and burying the poor generally. The reasons for casting these ever increasing burdens on the common fund are equally well known and appreciated. The poor parish often worked for the rich parish, and yet had the exclusive duty of maintaining its own poor, while the rich parish had scarcely any poor to maintain, and was not bound by law to do anything to relieve the destitution existing beyond its own borders. Not unfrequently, too, in country districts some large landowner had evaded the liability to maintain the poor by pulling down the cottages in his own parish, and drawing his necessary supply of labourers from an adjoining one, which latter had, unaided, to support them in times of sickness or distress. It was to remedy this state of things that the Union Chargeability Act, 1865, was passed, and in country districts it seems to have answered its purpose well. But in the metropolis it was otherwise. The poor, as we know, we have always with us, and, in highly civilised states, it seems to be a law of their being that they should increase in a greater ratio than the country at large increases in wealth, and that this increase should be chiefly manifested in the immediate neighbourhood of the great centres of wealth. In the metropolis, though the area of the unions is small, their relative population is great, and it was found that the East-end Union would be almost entirely composed of crowded streets and courts inhabited by the poor, and a West-end Union of spacious squares and terraces inhabited by the rich, while in many cases the former was mainly employed in ministering to the comforts and luxuries of the latter. In fact, it turned out that the unions in the metropolis bore much the same relation to one another that the parishes did; and therefore something analogous to the Union Chargeability Act, but applying to a wider area than that of a union, was required to distribute the poor-rate fairly over the metropolis. This was in part effected by the Metropolitan Poor Law Act, 1867, and now more completely by the Metropolitan Poor Law Amendment Act of last session.

By the 61st section of the former Act (30 Vict. c. 6) a fund, called the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund, was established. This fund was to be raised by contributions from the several unions, parishes, and places within the limits of the metropolis, as defined in the Metropolitan Management Act, 1855, and the contributions were to be assessed (section 64) by the Poor Law Board in proportion to the annual rateable value of the property comprised in the several districts. It was made the duty of the Poor Law Board to appoint an officer, to be called the Receiver of the Common Poor Fund, and on the precept of the Board the contribution of each union or parish was to be paid to him. Each half-year the auditor was to certify to the Poor Law Board what money had been expended by each union or parish in respect of expenses chargeable on the Common Poor Fund; and the Board was thereupon to issue its precept to the receiver of the fund to repay thereout to the guardians of such unions and parishes the sums so expended by them. The 69th section defines the expenses which may be thus repaid out of the fund; and they are briefly, the expenses incurred in maintaining lunatics and small-pox and fever patients in asylums established under the Act; in supplying medicines to the poor receiving relief from the guardians; in paying certain salaries, registration and vaccination fees; and in providing temporary wards under the Metropolitan Homeless Poor Acts—all of which are obviously expenses that may fairly be spread over the whole metropolis. This was but tentative legislation, and as it was found to answer as far as it went, much greater burdens have now been laid on the Common Poor Fund. By the Act of last session (33 & 34 Vict. c. 18), that fund is further charged with the maintenance of the in-door poor in the metropolis above the age of sixteen, the incidence of the taxation for out-door relief and for maintaining pauper infants being left as before. The Act is entitled "An Act to provide for the equal distribution over the metropolis of a further portion of the charge for the relief of the poor," and it would seem that the portion to which it applies must be a considerable one. We should not be surprised, however, if legislation were hereafter carried still further in the same direction.

There are some minor provisions for ensuring the satisfactory working of the Act, which may be worth a brief notice. To remedy the evil of overcrowding in workhouses, of which we have lately heard so much, the Poor Law Board is to certify the maximum number of paupers to be maintained in any workhouse or asylum, and no payment is to be made out of the Common Poor Fund for any number in excess of that maximum. Economy is to be promoted by limiting the sum to be paid for each pauper out of the fund to five pence a day. And compliance with the orders of the Poor Law Board in the very necessary matters of alterations and enlargements of workhouses, drainage, ventilation, medical appliances, &c., is to be secured by giving the Board power, in the case of a disobedient union or parish, to refuse to issue their precept to the Receiver for making any payment to such union or parish out of the Common Poor Fund. Recalcitrant guardians, however, are left a locus penitentie, and if they comply with the order in the next half-year after their default, the Poor Law Board may, if it sees fit, include in the precept for that half-year the sums omitted from their last precept.

Such are, in outline the provisions of the Metropolitan Poor Amendment Act of last session; and we sincerely trust they may have the effect intended by their authors of lightening the excessive weight of poor-rates in some parts of London, and of alleviating the sufferings and diseases of unhappy paupers now too often at the mercy of niggardly guardians and sheer bungledom.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

STATUTES OF LIMITATION—TRUST

Stone v. Stone, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 225, L. R. 5 Ch. 74.

The limitations applicable to equitable matters are a branch of equity upon which very little has been written. So far as suits relating to realty are concerned, the matter is now statutory (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27). For claims in equity not coming within the provisions of this Act as to realty there are no statutory enactments binding expressly the court of equity, but that court "which is never active in relief against conscience or public convenience, has always refused its aid to stale demands where the party has slept upon his right and acquiesced for a great length of time" (Lord Camden in Smith v. Clay, 3 Bro. Ch. Rep. 639 n). Further than this, "as often as Parliament had limited the time of actions and remedies to a certain period in legal proceedings, the Court of Chancery adopted that rule and applied it to similar cases in equity (Lord Camden, ubi sup.). And in Hovenden v. Annesley, 2 Sch. & Lef. 630, Lord Redesdale said:—"Courts of equity . . . are not within the words of the statutes, because the words apply to particular legal remedies; but they are within the spirit and meaning of the statutes, and have been always so considered. I think it is a mistake in point of language to say that courts of equity act merely by analogy to the statutes; they act in obedience to them." But the court of equity does not follow or consider itself bound by any limitations as between trustee and cestui que trust; this exception, however, arises only where a trust has been created by a direct act, and not merely constructively by implication of law. The case of a settlor covenanting to pay money upon trusts has proved a doubtful one. In Burrows v. Gore, 6 W. R. 699, 6 H. of L. Cas. 907, there was a difference of opinion on the matter in the House of Lords. A settlor on his daughter's marriage executed two bonds to secure two sums payable at his death, and on the same day a marriage settlement was executed by which the bonds were vested in trustees on certain trusts. At the date of the suit afterwards instituted, the Statute of Limitations had long barred any claim on the bonds, if they were to be regarded as merely creating the relation of obligor and obligee. Lord Cranworth said that if the settlor had simply agreed to give the money to be settled, "he would then have been dealt with as a trustee; because if a person agrees to give a sum of money as an inducement to another to marry his daughter, and that marriage takes place, in that case the parent who so agrees to give the money is considered as holding the money on trust." And his Lordship did not consider that the case was altered by his giving the additional security of a bond. He, therefore, held that the Statute of Limitations did not apply. Lord Chelmsford avoided pronouncing a decision on this question. Lord St. Leonards and Lord Wensleydale gave an opinion the other way, Lord St. Leonards saying that if a settlor agreed to give any specific property, "or any tangible thing that was actually marked out," he became a trustee, but dissenting from the idea that he became a trustee by merely agreeing to pay a sum of money out of his general assets.

In Stone v. Stone a settlement contained a recital that the husband had paid a sum to the trustee, which the trustee then covenanted to hold on certain trusts, and the settlement further contained a covenant by the husband that he would within twelve months pay another sum to be held on like trusts. Neither sum was ever paid. The Statute of Limitations being pleaded to a claim on the settlor's estate, Vice-Chancellor James held that the trustee had not constituted himself a trustee in respect of either sum, and so allowed the bar. Lord Justice Giffard, on appeal, agreed with the Vice-Chancellor as to the second sum, considering the case of the covenant to be that of a mere legal obligation; but he considered that in the case of the sum recited to have been paid, the settlor had constituted himself a trustee, and that the statute, therefore, did not apply. Lord Cranworth, we may presume, would have considered the settlor had become a trustee in both cases. Whenever the leading case of Burrowes v. Gore is cited, Stone v. Stone will now be added.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS ACTS, S. 28—FUND "PRESERVED" TO LITIGANT.

Smith v. Winter. Ex parte Hartley, V.C.J., 18 W. R. 447.

The 28th section of this Act (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), empowers the Court or judge before whom any suit, &c., shall be depending to declare any solicitor employed in prosecuting or defending the same entitled to a charge for his taxed costs "on the property recovered or preserved" through his instrumentality, and to make such order for payment of such costs as the Court or judge may think proper. We discussed this subject rather fully (ante 13 S. J. 314), when commenting upon Scholefield v. Lockwood (17 W. R. 184). In Bailey v. Birchall (2 H. & M. 371), a solicitor acted for a plaintiff who obtained an injunction restraining the dealing with a testator's estate, and a receiver. Ultimately this plaintiff proved to have no interest; afterwards his solicitor petitioned under this section of the Act to have his costs raised and paid to him. Vice-Chancellor Wood said it was no unprecedented thing that a solicitor should have a lien on a fund secured, irrespective of his client's interest, and he instanced the case of a solicitor employed by a creditor in an administration suit, who would have his costs, even though no part of the assets might become applicable in payment of that creditor. Considering, therefore, that the fund had here been preserved for all parties, he allowed the petitioning solicitor a charge on the testator's estate, for his costs. But note, the Vice-Chancellor's language, from which it seems that had the receiver not been necessary for the securing of this fund for all parties, the charge might not have been allowed. The present is one of several subsequent cases in which the same liberal view has been adopted. In Watson v. Round (12 W. R. 452), the costs of a solicitor who had obtained a foreclosure decree were held a charge on the estate foreclosed. In Scholefield v. Lockwood (ubi. sup.) the solicitor had acted for a defendant to a foreclosure bill, who had been declared entitled to redeem. Lord Romilly considered this was an interest "preserved" though not recovered, and declared the solicitor entitled to a charge on the defendant's interest quantum valeat. In the present cases the solicitor's client was a defendant to an administration suit who had possessed herself of the testator's property, the bill charging that she claimed to hold beneficially. She denied that she so claimed and submitted how far she was a trustee. She had to pay the costs of the inquiries, and the dividends of some stock were ordered to be paid to her from time to time. The Vice-Chancellor held that her solicitor was entitled to a charge on her dividends.

SOLICITOR—GUARANTEE AGAINST COSTS.

Fielden v. Northern Railway Company of Buenos Ayres, V.C.J., 18 W. R. 729.

It is imprudent, to say the least of it, for a solicitor to give his client a guarantee against the expenses of a suit. There is a broad distinction between such guarantees, however, according as they may be given before the commencement of a suit, or after it. A guarantee against expenses given before the commencement of the suit cannot but wear the appearance of instigating litigation, whereas a solicitor who has incurred expense in the prosecution of a suit on behalf of a penniless client, may see no chance of getting recouped, unless by inducing his client to prosecute his suit, in order to recover his costs from the opposite side; and in such a case he could hardly be blamed if he did so. In Fielden v. Northern Railway Company of Buenos Ayres the guarantee was not given until after the institution of the suit, and then under circumstances which, in the words of the Vice-Chancellor, rendered the giving it not so very reprehensible. Certainly there was nothing like instigating litigation about the case; and in consequence the Court refused to make any order on the petition, which prayed that the costs might be paid by the solicitor personally.

We gather that the Vice-Chancellor, in a proper case, would have followed Cockle v. Whiting, 1 R. & M. 43. This was an application that the solicitor might be ordered personally to pay the costs of the suit, for that he had guaranteed his client against the expenses—quare, whether before the institution of the suit. Vice-Chancellor Leach did not in that case make the order, because the charge was not made out, but would have done so if the charge had been sustained, on the authority of Dungey v. Angove, 2 Ves. 304. Some general remarks by the Master of the Rolls on the cases where the Court has made the solicitor pay the costs of proceedings, will be found in Ex parte Gregg, 18 W. R. 589, to which we refer the reader.

THE APPORTIONMENT ACT (4 & 5 WILL. 4, C. 22)—LIFE ANNUITY.

Sutton v. Ennis, M. R. (Ir.), 18 W. R. 882.

According to this decision, the Apportionment Act may apply where the annuity ceases with the death of the annuitant, and does not go over to some other person. The general opinion, founded on the language of section 2, giving the remedy "when the entire portion of which such apportioned part of the annuity shall become due and payable," is that the statute applies in no case where the annuity is not a continuing annuity, for the simple reason that the portion never does become payable where the annuity expires between two periods of payment. According to Mr. Joshua Williams (Law of Personal Property, 7th ed., p. 263, 4), where the property ceases with the interest, and does not go over to another, as in the case of a life annuity, the Act appears inapplicable; and the right to an apportioned part should therefore, if desired, be expressly conferred. In a case, however, where an annuity was bequeathed to one for life, who died eight days before the annual portion became due, and the executors refused to pay the apportioned part, owing to the authorities at Somerset-house having expressed an opinion that there was no case for apportionment, the Vice-Chancellor Kindersley held that the annuity ought to be apportioned (Trimmer v. Danby, 2 W. R. 380). The Vice-Chancellor treated the case as if the testator had bequeathed the annuity to A. for life, and after A.'s death, to his residuary legatees as a continuing security. And in Carter v. Taggart (16 Sim. 447), where a fund was charged with £150 per annum in favour of the testator's wife during her life, his Honour held that the wife's executor was entitled to an apportioned part of the annuity for the interval between the death of the wife and the last preceding day of payment, on the ground that such was the intention of the Act, exactly as if it were a question between tenant for life and remainderman. We think we are warranted in our conclusion that terminable annuities ought to be apportioned in every case where the fund whence they arise goes over to someone else upon the termination of the annuity, exactly as if the annuity, and not the corpus representing it, were continued to such person. This was quite the view of the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, who, in Sutton v. Ennis, held that the statute gave the apportionment of the annuity, even though such annuity ceased with the annuitant's death, holding, as Lord Romilly did in Llewellyn v. Rous, L. R. 2 Eq. 27, that the Act was a remedial Act, and ought to be construed liberally. It may be well to observe that, by an Act which received the royal assent on the 1st of August, all rents, annuities, dividends, and other periodical payments in the nature of income (whether reserved or made payable under an instrument in writing or not) are, like interest on money lent, to be considered as accruing due de die in diem, and are to be apportionable accordingly.

OVERDUE BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Re The European Bank (Limited); Ex parte The Oriental Commercial Bank (Limited), L.J.G., 18 W. R. 474.

The point actually decided by Lord Justice Giffard in this case is not one on which much doubt could be entertained. It may shortly be put thus—that when A. takes a bill of exchange from B., even for good consideration paid to B., but after the bill is due, if B. was possessed of the bill merely as a trustee for C., and without authority to part with it, A. merely becomes trustee for C., and the proceeds of the bill belong to C. and not to A. The case was complicated by the peculiar dealings of Mr. Demetrio Pappa with the funds of various companies; and the point was also discussed whether A. could recover upon the bill against the acceptor. Some expressions used by the Lord Justice might be thought to indicate an opinion that A. could not recover. This, however, is not at all clear, and the decision cannot be considered as an authority except upon the proposition we have stated. The general rule is that the indorsee of an overdue bill takes it subject to the equities attaching to the bill itself, and it is also generally understood that the equities must arise out of the original transaction (see per Williams, J., in Holmes v. Kidd, 5 H. & N. 893, 7 W. R. 108), that is to say they must in some way affect the acceptor's contract. In one case, decided in 1817, Lee v. Lugury, 8 Taunt. 114, in which the facts were somewhat similar to the present, it was held that the indorsee could not—after notice not to pay given to the acceptor by the person really entitled to the proceeds—recover against the acceptor on his bare legal title. The facts there were peculiar, and in ordinary cases we think it may be taken that equities between subsequent parties would not affect the liability of the acceptor to pay the actual holder even if he had taken the bill when overdue. The question to whom the proceeds would belong, which was all that arose in the case we have been considering, is a totally different one.

We may add that it is quite consistent with the facts as reported that there was no indorsement to the Eastern Commercial Company (the A. in our proposition) such as they could have recovered upon. Neither the argument nor the judgment, however, seems to have proceeded on this ground, and, therefore, there may have been other facts which prevented this point being taken.

RECTIFICATION OF CLERICAL ERROR IN AN AWARD.

Mordue v. Palmer, V.C.B., 18 W. R. 1068.

It is a well-known rule of law that when an award has been made the arbitrator is functus officio, and cannot by any fresh exercise of judgment alter or revise it. In Hensfree v. Bromley (6 East, 309) where an award had been made, and was ready for delivery, pursuant to the terms of reference, an alteration by the arbitrator in the sum awarded made for the purpose of including costs, though made on the same day, and before delivery of the award, was held to be void just as if the alteration had been the act of a mere stranger tampering with the deed, whose act, notwithstanding Pigott's case (11 Rep. 27a) would not avoid the deed (Sugd. Pow. 603). So in Irvine v. Elnon (8 East, 54) it was held that the arbitrator could not, after the delivery of an award, though within the time of submission, correct a mistake in the calculation of figures. In Hensfree v. Bromley Lord Ellenborough seems to have considered the alteration of the award to be void, as involving a new and distinct act of judgment formed by the arbitrator after his authority was at an end. That eminent judge would unquestionably have allowed the correction of a mere clerical error. An arbitrator is, in the opinion of the Vice-Chancellor, at liberty to correct clerical errors after the award is made, where no exercise of judgment is required of him. Hence, in the case before us, where the arbitrator discovered a clerical error in that which purported to be his award, consisting in the omission of the words in italics from the following sentence:—"I order that the charges of this my award and the costs of this reference shall be paid and borne by the defendant," and forthwith issued a second award pursuant to his correction, the second award was allowed to stand, it appearing that the words omitted formed part of the arbitrator's own draft, and had been omitted by the clerk in copying. The rule above referred to, therefore, only applies to cases where the arbitrator attempts to exercise his judgment after the expiration of his authority.

COMMON LAW.

COUNTY COURTS—ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION—"CLAIM"—COLLISION—NECESSARIES.

Everard v. Kendall, C.P., 18 W. R. 892.

Hewitt v. Cory, B.C., 18 W. R. 954.

The Dorset, Adm., 18 W. R. 1008.

Admiralty jurisdiction has been conferred upon certain county courts by two very badly drawn statutes—viz., 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51. By section 3 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, county courts having admiralty jurisdiction are to have jurisdiction over (amongst other causes) "(2) as to any claim for towage, necessities, or wages—any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed £150; (3) as to any claim for damage to cargo or damage by collision—any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed £300." Section 4 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, enacts that this section "shall extend and apply to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed £300." By section 9 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, if any person shall take in a superior court proceedings which he might have taken in the county court, "and shall not recover a sum exceeding the amount to which the jurisdiction of the county court in that admiralty cause is limited, he shall not be entitled to costs." In consequence of the careless way in which these statutes are drawn, their meaning was not apparent until they received judicial exposition. The three cases at the head of this notice have cleared up the law on several important points.

In Hewitt v. Cory it was held that "recover" in section 9 includes the taking out of money paid into court in an action; and also that the right to costs under that section is fixed by the amount "recovered," and does not depend upon the amount "claimed" under section 3, as the wording of section 3 might seem to imply. The question in Everard v. Kendall was whether the jurisdiction given by section 3 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, and section 4 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, extended to a collision between barges in the Thames propelled by oars only. There is no definition of ship or vessel in either statute, and the words of those sections are wide enough to include barges. It was argued, however, that the admiralty jurisdiction of county courts is not more extensive than that of the High Court of Admiralty; and it was admitted that the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction over the collision, as its jurisdiction is limited to ships, as defined by section 2 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), which excludes vessels propelled by oars only. The statutes giving admiralty jurisdiction to county courts contain no provision that such jurisdiction shall not exceed the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty; but section 7 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, provides for the transfer to the Court of Admiralty in certain cases of admiralty causes from the county court. This section furnished a strong argument to show that county courts have not a more extended jurisdiction than the Court of Admiralty, because, if they had, the Court of Admiralty might have to decide causes under section 7, over which it had no original jurisdiction whatever. The Court appear to have been much influenced by this argument, and decided that the county court had not any jurisdiction over the collision, because the Court of Admiralty had no such jurisdiction.

The point actually decided refers only to cases of collision, and merely establishes that "ship" and "vessel" in these two statutes, giving admiralty jurisdiction to county courts, mean such ships and vessels as are within 24 Vict. c. 10. The case is, however, to some extent an authority for a much wider proposition—viz., that in no case under 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71 have these county courts jurisdiction where the Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction, and this principle has been affirmed by the Court of Admiralty in the subsequent case of the Dowse. There a cause of necessities was instituted under section 3 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71. The necessities were supplies to a British ship one of whose owners was domiciled in England. The Court of Admiralty have no jurisdiction in such a case (24 Vict. c. 10, s. 5), and it was held on the same principle as in Everard v. Kendall that the county court had, therefore, no jurisdiction.

This principle limits very much the wide wording of this statute, and it extends to cases other than those we have noticed. For instance the words "any claim for damage to cargo" and "all claims for damage to ships" must now be read with considerable limitation. It must be noticed, however, that Everard v. Kendall and the Dowse have only decided that this principle applies to 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, they do not show that it applies to 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, and indeed Sir B. Phillimore in his judgment in the Dowse expressly says that the Court of Admiralty "under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, has an appellate jurisdiction as to claims arising out of agreements for the use or hire of a ship and the carriage of goods in a ship, as to which there was no original jurisdiction." If this be so the county courts under the latter statute have a jurisdiction wider than that of the Court of Admiralty. No question as to this point has, however, yet come before any of the courts.

Mr. Spencer Percival, the barrister for the City of London, will commence his sittings on Friday, the 16th inst., at 11 o'clock, in the Court of Common Pleas, Guildhall. The lists and notices of liverymen will be first received.

COURTS.

JUDGES' CHAMBERS.

Aug. 19.—Norwich Election Petition.

The following is a copy of the order made by Mr. Justice Byles in the above petition, whereby the most important clauses of the petition have been ordered to be cancelled, and the trial of the petition consequently postponed until the decision of the Court of Common Pleas has been obtained on the validity of the order:—

"Upon hearing counsel on both sides, and upon reading the affidavits of the petitioner and another, and of the respondent, I do order that the fifth and sixth paragraphs of the petition filed herein be struck out. And I further order that the petitioner shall be at liberty (if he shall think fit) to stay all further proceedings herein until the tenth day of next term, that he may have the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas on the validity of this order.

And I further order that the petitioner do give notice in writing of his election to proceed or stay on or before Tuesday next, the 23rd August, and that in default of such notice proceedings on the petition, as amended, shall go on."

Notice has, we believe, since been given of the petitioner's intention to stay proceedings pending the appeal.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

(Before Mr. Registrar MURRAY.)

Sept. 7.—Bartlett v. Hudson.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 7 and 118—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 90—Debtor's summons—Debt contracted before passing of Bankruptcy Act, 1861.

This was an application to dismiss a debtor's summons issued under section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869; and the question turned upon the 118th section of the same Act, which provided that "no person not being a trader shall be adjudged a bankrupt in respect of a debt contracted before the date of the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861." The amount claimed by the summons was £13,500, due upon a judgment recovered in 1866, and it was admitted that the debtor was a non-trader.

From the evidence, it appeared that in the year 1855 the debtor, in consideration of two several sums of £5,000 advanced to him by the creditor, executed two several deeds, each of which was identically the same with the other, by which certain property was conveyed by way of security; and each deed contained a covenant for payment of the principal sum advanced on a day fixed (in June, 1855), with interest in the meantime at £5 per cent. Beyond that covenant, there was not any further covenant by the debtor for payment of interest, in case of default being made on the day fixed. Default having been made in payment, no steps appeared to have been taken by the creditor to enforce the covenant until March, 1866, when he issued a writ, and judgment, having been allowed to go by default, was signed on the 5th of May in the same year for the sum of £13,500, being the amount of the principal debt, with interest to the date of the judgment. That was the judgment upon which the debtor's summons had been issued, and the debtor, by his particulars, claimed a further sum of £2,160 for interest upon his judgment, making the whole claim of £15,660. The debtor, having filed the usual affidavit that he was not indebted in a sum sufficient to support a bankruptcy petition, applied to the Court for the dismissal of the summons.

Brough, in support of the application, cited Williams v. Harding, 14 W. R. 503, where the House of Lords held that no debt was capable of sustaining an adjudication unless the liability in posse as well as in esse had originated subsequently to the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. As to the interest, that he contended was merely an incident of the original debt—something in the nature of a penalty or damages for non-payment of the principal; it arose out of the original debt, and the obligation to pay it was contracted at the time when the debt itself was incurred (Newton v. Grand Junction Railway Company, 16 Mee. & W. 139; Price v. Great Western Railway Company, ib. 247). In regard to the judgment, that was only a mode of enforcing the original debt, and did not in this instance constitute a fresh debt.

Mr. J. T. Treherne, for the debtor, contended (1.) that the original debt was put out of consideration and became merged in the judgment, the date of which must be taken as the date of the debt being contracted; (2.) assuming this were not so, then, although the principal debt was contracted before 1861, yet, as regarded all arrears of interest accruing after that time, fresh liabilities were constituted, all of which were, in fact, debts contracted since the passing of the Act of 1861 (Warleigh v. Tucker, 6 W. R. 755).

Mr. Registrar MURRAY, in giving judgment, said that upon the face of the particulars and the summons there was nothing to show that the debt was not one amply sufficient to support a bankruptcy petition. As to the first contention of the debtor, there was no doubt that, for many purposes, where a creditor obtained judgment for a debt the judgment operated as an extinguishment of the original debt, or, in other words, the original debt became merged in the judgment. But that the original debt was not extinguished or satisfied for all purposes was abundantly clear. There were numerous authorities to show this. And, amongst others, he might refer to the cases in which creditors had been held competent to make a debtor bankrupt on the original debt, notwithstanding that they had obtained judgment upon it after an act of bankruptcy committed; the petition being supported not on the judgment but in the original debt on which it was founded. To use the words of Lord Justice Turner in Ex parte Griffiths (3 De G. M. & G. 173), "The result of the cases was that where a debt existed in the shape of a judgment it must be considered to be due in respect of the original debt for the purpose of supporting a bankruptcy." Then, as to the second objection, it was said that all interest becoming due after the passing of the Act constituted in fact a fresh debt contracted after that time. He could not accede to that proposition. It seemed to him immaterial whether the deed contained a covenant to pay accruing interest or not. In the one case the mortgagee would be entitled to the accruing interest by virtue of the express contract; in the other he would get it in the nature of damages, the very nature of the mortgage deed showing an intention on the part of the contracting parties that the debt was to be a debt carrying interest; and therefore it was that in suing upon a covenant to pay principal and interest upon a given day it was the invariable practice of the courts of law to give interest by way of damages, and for courts of equity to allow the mortgagor to redeem only on the terms of his paying such interest. But whether the creditor got his interest under express contract or as damages, the date at which the debt was contracted must, as it seemed to the learned Registrar, be the date of the deed. The argument was that till the interest accrued due there was no debt. But in point of fact the moment the debtor executed the deed of 1855 he became liable to pay not only the principal sum but all interest which might be awarded against him; and having put himself under this obligation he incurred a debt. If this had been res integra he would have had little difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the summons could not be supported. But the point was really concluded by Williams v. Harding (14 W. R. 603), which was a stronger case than the present.

Summons dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the debtor, Elmslie, Forsyth, & Sedgwick.
Solicitors for the creditor, Treherne & Wolferstan.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. ROBERT JOHN WALCOTT, barrister-at-law, has been gazetted Attorney-General of the colony of Western Australia. Mr. Walcott was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in May, 1847, and for some years has practised at Jamaica. The Attorney-Generalship of Western Australia, which confers a seat in the Executive and Legislative Councils of the colony, is worth £500 per annum.

Mr. RICHARD BERENS BRADFORD HAWKINS, solicitor, of Woodstock, Oxfordshire, and clerk to the Woodstock Board of Guardians, has been appointed Clerk to the Waywardens of the Wootton District of Highways, in place of Mr. Henry Churchill, the missing solicitor, of Deddington. Mr. Hawkins was certificated in 1846. The other candidates for the office were Mr. W. O. W. Lovell, solicitor, of King's Sutton and Deddington; and Mr. C. D. Faulkner, solicitor, of Deddington.

Mr. JOHN HOUGHEN, solicitor, of Thetford, Norfolk, has been elected Town Clerk of that borough, and also Clerk to the Local Board, in succession to Mr. R. E. Clarke, solicitor, deceased. Mr. Houghen, who was certificated in 1839, is also Clerk of the Peace and Registrar of the County Court, and had formerly occupied the position of mayor of Thetford.

Mr. ODDEN F. READ, solicitor, of Mildenhall, Suffolk, has been appointed Clerk to the Borough Magistrates of Thetford, Norfolk, in succession to the late Mr. R. E. Clarke. Mr. Read has also received the appointments of Clerk to the Commissioners of Taxes, and of Clerk to the Burial Board. Mr. Read, who is a son of Mr. James Read, sen., of the firm of Isaacson & Read, solicitors, of Mildenhall, recently purchased the goodwill of the business of the late Mr. Clarke, town clerk of Thetford, whom he has been appointed to succeed in the above-named offices.

Mr. EDWARD ARNOLD, solicitor, and town clerk of Chichester, has been appointed Clerk to the Magistrates of that city, vice Mr. James Powell, jun., deceased. Mr. Arnold has also been appointed, by the town council, to be Coroner for the city of Chichester, which office also became vacant by the death of Mr. Powell.

OBITUARY.

MR. JOHN COLLYER.

The death of John Collyer, Esq., one of her Majesty's Judges of County Courts, took place at his seat, Hackford Hall, near Reepham, Norfolk, on the 1st inst, in the seventieth year of his age. The deceased gentleman was the eldest son of the late Ven. John Bedingfield Collyer, M.A., Archdeacon of Norwich (who died in 1857) by Catherine, youngest daughter of the late William Alexander, Esq., of London, who was the eldest brother of the first Earl of Caledon. Mr. John Collyer was born on the 15th July 1801, and was educated at the Charterhouse, and afterwards proceeded to Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1822, and M.A. in 1825. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in November, 1827, and was for some years a fellow of his college. In 1842 Mr. Collyer was appointed Commissary of the diocese of Norwich, and in March, 1847, he became a judge of county courts, Circuit No. 35, which includes parts of Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire, and Huntingdonshire; he was also a magistrate for the county of Norfolk. Mr. Collyer was the author of "A treatise on the Law of Partnership," and of "Reports" of cases in Chancery before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce. In March, 1837, he married Georgiana, eldest daughter of Sir William Johnston, seventh Baronet of Hiltown, Aberdeenshire, by which lady he has left several children. The Collyer family, it is believed, are descended originally from Flemish Protestant refugees, who settled at Cripplegate, in the city of London.

MR. JAMES POWELL, JUN.

The death of Mr. James Powell, Jun., solicitor, of Chichester (firm Powell & Arnold), took place there on the 28th of August, in the 46th year of his age. The deceased gentleman was the eldest son of Mr. James Powell, solicitor, who for many years held the office of Town Clerk of Chichester, and was also clerk to the city justices; upon whose resignation, in 1866, his son was appointed to succeed him in both offices. Mr. J. Powell, jun., was also coroner for the city of Chichester, and Clerk to the Guardians of the City Incorporation. More than two years ago his illness commenced, when his partner, Mr. Edward Arnold, was appointed to act for him in his various offices; but about a year ago, Mr. Powell resigned the town clerkship, when Mr. Arnold was elected to fill the vacant post, continuing to officiate in the other appointments till the present time. Mr. J. Powell, jun., was certificated as a solicitor in 1846, and was in partnership with his father till his retirement from business.

MR. H. S. SELFE.

We have to record the death of Henry Selfe, Esq., one of the magistrates of the Westminster Police Court, which took place at his residence, St. George's-square, Piccadilly, on Tuesday last, at the age of sixty years. The late Mr. Selfe was born in 1810, and was educated at Rugby, and afterwards proceeded to the University of Glasgow. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in June, 1834, and for many years practised at the Parliamentary bar, and on the Oxford Circuit, besides attending the Worcestershire and Gloucestershire sessions. During this period he was for some years Recorder of Newbury, which office he filled till 1856, when he was appointed a magistrate of the Thames Police Court, being transferred thence to Westminster in March, 1863. In 1858 Mr. Selfe was nominated, in conjunction with Messrs. Ffrench and Aspinall Turner, a member of the Weedon commission for inquiring into the state of the Army Clothing Department. He was one of the earliest promoters and constant supporters of the Canterbury settlement in the colony of New Zealand, and for many years acted as agent to the settlement in England; he accompanied Lord Lyttelton on a short visit to the colony in 1867. Mr. Selfe married in 1840 Anna Maria, eldest daughter of the late Ven. William Spooner, Archdeacon of Coventry, whose wife was aunt of Sir Lucius O'Brien, Bart., now Lord Inchiquin. Mrs. Selfe (who survives) is a sister of Mrs. Tait, wife of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who was a contemporary of Mr. Selfe at Glasgow. One of his sons is Mr. E. H. Selfe, barrister-at-law, of the Oxford Circuit.

MR. J. JONES.

Mr. John Jones, solicitor, of Newtown, Montgomeryshire, died suddenly on the 25th of August. Mr. Jones was certificated as an attorney in Trinity Term, 1861, and acted as an agent for the Liberal cause in Montgomeryshire.

MR. C. CAVE.

Mr. Charles Cave, solicitor, of Bracknell, Berkshire, expired on the 27th of August, after a long illness, at the age of sixty-one years. The late Mr. Cave was certificated as a solicitor in Easter Term, 1833, and held the office of Clerk to the Guardians of Easthampstead Union since its formation (nearly forty years ago); he was also Clerk to the Assessment Committee, and to the Easthampstead District Highway Board.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

SOCIAL SCIENCE CONGRESS.

The jurisprudence department of the Social Science Association at their forthcoming meeting on the 21st inst. will be well supported. On the contraband of war question, Mr. John Westlake and Dr. Waddilove will read papers. On the question of the liability of railway companies to compensation for the acts of their servants, Mr. Joseph Brown, Q.C., will read a paper. Mr. Daniel, Q.C., will open the discussion on the question whether or not it is desirable to establish tribunals of commerce. The Right Hon. Sir Walter Crofton will preside over the repression of crime section, and the questions in that section will be ably introduced by gentlemen of practical experience. In the health department Mr. W. H. Michael, barrister-at-law, will read a paper on the modifications desirable in the existing sanitary laws and administration, and the discussion will be opened by Sir Charles Adderley, M.P. The subject of the adulteration of food, drink, and drugs, and what legislative measures ought to be taken to prevent it, will be brought forward in a paper by Dr. Letheby who will be supported by the editor of the Food Journal. In the economy department Mr. Rupert Kettle, county court judge, who has of late taken great interest in disputes between masters and workmen, will preside over a section for the consideration of the question of "How far is it desirable and practicable to establish courts of conciliation or arbitration between employers and employed?" The congress assemblies on Wednesday 21st, on which day the inaugural address will be delivered by the president, the Duke of Northumberland, at 8 p.m. The addresses of the chairman of council and presidents of departments will be delivered on successive days. The departments commence their work after the address, at eleven. There will be a working men's meeting and two soirees in the evenings, and as a relief to the fatigues of business excursions have been arranged to the Roman Wall (on the invitation of Mr. John Clayton, solicitor, who has liberally offered to provide luncheon), and to the manufactures on the Tyne, including the extensive works of Messrs. Palmer & Co., who will also entertain the visitors. The Duke of Northumberland will also invite a large number to visit Alnwick Castle on the concluding day of the meeting. Preparations on a large scale are being made in the way of private hospitality. The meeting promises to be one of the most successful which the association has held for many years.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

Events abroad during the past week, as they seemed from day to day likely to increase or diminish the duration of the war, have caused corresponding fluctuation, not only in foreign securities, but in our own funds. During the last day or two a somewhat steadier tone has prevailed, with an upward tendency. The demand for money has slightly increased, the action of the Bank directors in not again lowering the rate of discount having encouraged this tendency. The supply, however, is still very abundant.

In railway shares, except those of the companies most closely connected with France, there has been a slight rise.

Mr. Basil Field, solicitor, of the firm of Field, Roscoe, Field, & Francis, and Mr. Samuel H. C. Maddock, solicitor, have recently joined the Board of Directors of the Law Union Fire and Life Insurance Company.

We learn that the Home Secretary has refused to sanction the salary of £350 to the newly-elected clerk to the Gateshead magistrates (Mr. S. Robson), on the ground that the fees being £480, there would be a surplus of £130 to go to the borough. This being considered too large a surplus, either the fees will have to be reduced, or the clerk's salary increased. The clerk (Mr. Robson), taking advantage of this objection of the Home Secretary, has applied for an increased salary, but the magistrates object to the advance.

The Salford Town Council have granted the sum of £100 to Mr. George Brett, solicitor, late Town Clerk of that borough, in consideration of the extra services rendered by him in connection with the passing of the Salford Improvement Act.

The salary of Mr. William Foyster, clerk to the borough magistrates of Salford, has been increased by the Town Council from £500 to £600 per annum.

Judge Bradwell, in a recent speech at Chicago, said that the reason so few criminal cases were tried before the women jurors in Wyoming was, that in that territory a defendant's lawyer may challenge twenty jurors without giving any reason, and that the lawyers, fearing the women would convict, thus took many cases out of their hands. The feminine standard of morality was too high.—Albany Law Journal.

The Solicitors' Journal.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 17, 1870.

THE FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL WORLD were startled not a little by a letter in the Times of Monday from a Mr. Brock suggesting that cheques were liable to an ad valorem duty under the new Stamp Act. Mr. Brock has, it appears, addressed a communication to the Solicitor to the Inland Revenue, and obtained a reply to the effect that a cheque is within the definition of a bill of exchange in the new Stamp Act, with a reference to the 47th section, by which it is enacted, "the term bill of exchange, for the purposes of this Act, includes also drafts orders, cheques, and letters of credit." Fortified with this official letter, and finding in the schedule to the Act a scale of ad valorem duties on bills of exchange, Mr. Brock rushed into print with the theory that cheques are subjected to an ad valorem duty. Had he taken the trouble to read the schedule carefully, he would not have announced the discovery of such a mare's nest. The ad valorem duties are imposed upon bills of exchange payable otherwise than on demand. The duty upon a bill of exchange payable on demand is one penny. A cheque is an inland bill of exchange payable on demand, therefore the duty on a cheque is one penny—the same amount as heretofore. A moment's reflection will show how extremely undesirable it would be to impose a heavy duty on cheques. The payments made by cheques are enormous in the aggregate, and cheques are not unfrequently drawn in the City for £12,000 or £15,000. The duty on a cheque for £15,000 is now one penny; if it paid the ad valorem duty on a bill of exchange for a similar amount, it would pay £7 10s. Debts would then be paid and accounts settled not by cheques, but by currency; an immense increase in the circulating medium of the country would be necessary, and this would involve a consequent additional expense. It was the weight of these considerations that gave rise to the entire exemption of cheques from all stamp duty up to the year 1858, and to the fact that, when a duty was imposed upon them, that duty was fixed at a penny, at which low rate it is continued by the new Act.

WE LEARN from the columns of a contemporary that a scheme is on foot for the establishment of a "court of reference," having a chancery court presided over by an equity barrister, a common law court presided over by a common law barrister, a solicitor with whom "subscribers may confer," legal representatives "with whom solicitors may have conferences," "a chamber barrister retained," and so on. There is nothing new in all this. This sort of Joint Stock Justice Company (Limited) has been proposed a hundred times over; and the common sense of the community has always known how to deal with the proposal.

No doubt the present practice of arbitration is very faulty, and no one has spoken more plainly of its defects than we have done. And there is a clear need for a court in which an arbitrator (that is to say, a single judge without a jury, and who need not be a man of the same standing and experience as a judge of a superior court) shall sit from day to day to dispose of the cases referred to him. We have for years past pointed out the need of such a change, and the Judicature Commissioners have reported most strongly in favour of it. But if we are to have such a court, as we believe we soon shall, let it at least be the court of her Majesty, and the judge a public officer. We have no desire for any fresh statutes of præmunire. We prefer trusting to popular intelligence. But though free trade and open competition are excellent things in their way, we do not at all wish to see the administration of justice brought within their operation. If one "court of reference" were only established and proved anything like a good thing for its promoters, we should have a dozen more started at once, with their rival chancery courts, and common law courts, and solicitors, and legal representatives, and chamber barristers and all the other privileges that look so well on paper, each trying to undersell the others, and each striving to surpass the others in that particular branch of free trade which consists in adulteration.

The fact is, all such schemes are too absurd to deserve serious consideration; but it is necessary to notice them because they may tend to encourage confused ideas and excite false hopes in those who do not reflect upon consequences.

LAST WEEK WE NOTICED the question whether it would be a breach of neutrality to allow France or Prussia during the war to raise loans on the London Stock Exchange, and we expressed an opinion that to do so would not involve any breach of neutrality. We are glad to see that this question has been noticed in the money article in the Times on Monday last, and again on Wednesday, in a letter to the Times from Mr. Abdy, the editor of "Kent's International Law." It is well that this subject should receive full consideration before the question is practically raised by either belligerent, and while the examination of the law upon the point is necessarily impartial.

Mr. Abdy refers to our article, which had been cited in the Times, and supplements the authorities we gave by a passage from his own notes to Kent. It seems that Mr. Abdy agrees with the view of the law which we have expressed, but in the passage he cites from his book there is an ambiguity which involves the rule of law intended to be laid down in much obscurity. He says (about which there can be no dispute), that it is a breach of neutrality for a neutral state to lend money to a belligerent, and he continues, "but the acts of individuals independent of and unknown to their Government cannot in the matters of loans any more than in the sales of munitions, be considered violations of neutrality." Does this mean that a neutral government is bound to stop the raising of loans or the sale of munitions if those transactions are not unknown to them? This would seem to be the implied meaning of the words, but we should think that this is not what the learned author intended to express, and that if the words "and unknown to" were omitted the passage would more accurately state his meaning.

A neutral Government either is or is not bound to prevent the sale of munitions of war, and the raising of loans by belligerents. If it is not bound to do so it is perfectly immaterial whether such sales or loans are or are not known to it. If a neutral is bound to prevent these acts, then it is clear that it is bound in addition to take all reasonable means to ascertain whether its subjects are engaged in these forbidden transactions, and no Government could successfully shelter itself under a simple plea of ignorance.

We notice this point because it is so very important that the rules of international law upon which may hang questions of future peace; and war should be stated as accurately as possible. The present rule concerning the raising of loans in neutral countries can be stated with as much clearness as any rule of municipal law, and it is a pity that doubts should be suggested upon such a question by the use of inaccurate language.

DANGEROUS PREMISES.

Few questions more frequently present themselves to practising lawyers, then questions as to whether a person, who has had to go, or has gone upon the premises of another, and has there sustained an injury, which he thinks is due to the negligence of that other, is entitled to any remedy. In what cases and to whom is the owner of premises responsible for negligence? This is the form in which the question usually presents itself; but it is not the form in which it can be most advantageously discussed. Negligence means the breach of a duty. And the true question therefore is:—Under what circumstances is there a duty imposed upon the owner of premises to take any precaution for the safety of those coming upon the premises, and what in each case is the limit of that duty. This is the question which we propose to consider in the present article.

As we wish to examine the question in its broadest and simplest form, we must point out at the outset that there are several classes of cases, complicated by considerations so special as to make them valueless for the purpose of throwing light on the general rule, and which must, therefore, be put aside. The most important of these classes of cases are, first, those in which any special relation arising out of contract exists between the parties, whereby the owner of premises has expressly or impliedly bound himself to take some special degree of care for the safety of those who have come upon his premises and there been injured. Under this head falls the case of railway companies, who are bound by the implied terms of their contract to take certain precautions for the security of their passengers.

Secondly, there is another class of cases arising out of the special relation of master and servant. A servant who undertakes an employment is held, in a peculiar degree, to undertake it subject to all its risks. And the master's obligations towards him are substantially less than they might, under corresponding circumstances, be towards others (see Priestly v. Fowler, 3 M. & W. 1; Indermaur v. Dames, 15 W. R. 434, per Willes, J.).

Thirdly, there are cases in which special obligations are imposed upon the owners of premises, expressly or impliedly, by statute (see in illustration of this, Clarke v. Holmes, 10 W. R. 405).

Putting aside, then, these exceptional cases, which, if they were not put aside, would only tend to obscure the general principles of law, the instances which arise in practice may be conveniently divided under four heads:—The first case is that of a wrong-doer, a trespasser upon the premises in question. The second case is that of one who is only not a trespasser upon the premises, a mere licensee. The third case is that of one who is not merely allowed to come upon the premises, but is invited and induced to come there for purposes of business. The fourth case is that of a person who is upon the premises as of right, they being part of a highway.

Before considering these cases severally, it is necessary to point out one source of confusion which has sometimes led to unnecessary difficulty in understanding the subject, an error which may, we think, be traced even in some of the judgments in which it has been dealt with. This error consists in not clearly distinguishing between a man's right to go upon premises, and his right to personal safety while there. The latter is the right correlative to the duty which we are now considering; and it is a right quite distinct from the other right, though its extent may, in many cases, be materially affected by the existence or non-existence of the other right. For example, the right of a person using a highway to personal security from danger is more extensive than his right over the highway. He has no right to transgress the limits of the highway by a single yard; if he does he becomes at once a trespasser. Still, if anyone open a pit so near the highway that anyone using the highway is likely to fall in, he is liable for the consequences, though no one can in fact be injured without being at the moment a trespasser (see Barnes v. Ward, 9 C. B. 392, and the cases which have followed it). In the same way if the question be whether a mere licensee has, under given circumstances, any right to be protected from danger while upon the premises which he is licensed to enter, the question is by no means answered by showing that he has no right to go upon the premises at all, but is there only by sufferance.

Of the four sets of circumstances which we have enumerated, the two extreme cases, the first and the last, give rise to little substantial difficulty. As to a mere trespasser, it is clear that he is entitled to expect no precautions to have been taken to render the premises safe for his use. The owner is not bound to anticipate his presence, or make preparation for his security. Though, of course, it must be remembered that a man's being a trespasser does not authorise a trespass upon him; and it must further be remembered that there are instances in which special exceptions to the general rule have been introduced by statute.

In the case of a highway, too, no great difficulty exists. We have seen already that not only is the owner of the soil of the highway not at liberty to interfere with it to the detriment of passengers; but that the owner of adjoining land is liable for the consequences if he creates a danger to those using the neighbouring highway. It is in the two intermediate cases that the difficulty has arisen—namely, in the cases of mere licensees, and of persons coming upon the premises by the inducement of the owner.

As to this second case, the law may now be said to be tolerably well settled, though its application to particular states of facts, is often very difficult. In the leading case of Indermaur v. Dames (14 W. R. 586, 15 Id. 434), the duty of the owner of premises towards one thus coming upon them is defined: "Such a visitor, using reasonable care on his own part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual dangers which he knows or ought to know; and, where there is evidence of neglect, the question whether such reasonable care has been taken, by notice, lighting, guarding, or otherwise, and whether there was contributory negligence in the sufferer, must be determined by the jury as a matter of fact."

In order that a person going upon premises may be entitled to the benefit of this rule, two things must concur:—First, he must have been invited or induced to go there, though this invitation need not, of course, be express, but may be implied from a course of business or otherwise. Secondly, he must go for some purpose of duty or business, not as a mere voluntary visitor; and, therefore, a guest who comes to enjoy the hospitality of a house is not within the rule (Southcote v. Stanley, 1 H. & N. 247). But, with respect to what is a sufficient invitation or inducement, and what a sufficient purpose of business, the Courts have in the later cases shown a tendency to construe the rule liberally in favour of plaintiffs. There has never been any doubt that customers coming to deal at a shop fall within the description. In Indermaur v. Dames the premises were a sugar refinery, and in them was an open shaft which, at the time, might have been fenced. The plaintiff fell down the shaft. The plaintiff was a gasfitter, and had been sent to the premises by a patentee, who had put certain gas apparatus for the occupier (which was to be paid for if it answered) to test the apparatus. It was held that the plaintiff was within the protection of the rule of which we are speaking. In Smith v. The London and St. Katharine Dock Company (16 W. R. 728), the defendants had a dock for the reception of ships, and they provided and managed the gangways which afforded communication to the ships. The plaintiff went on board a ship to do business with one of the ship's officers, and in returning by the gangway, was injured in consequence of the gangway having been moved and rendered unsafe. In Holmes v. North Eastern Railway Company (18 W. R. 800) it appeared that at one of the defendants' stations it was the usual course of business to unload coal in a particular way, and for the consignees to assist in the unloading, and for this purpose to pass along a certain paved way. The plaintiff's waggon of coal could not on a particular occasion be unloaded in the usual way, and with the assent of the station master he proceeded to unload it in a different way. For this purpose he passed along the paved way, and was injured through a defect in the way arising from what the jury found to be the defendants' negligence. Each of these cases was held to fall within the rule to which we have referred. Wilkinson v. Furrie (1 H. & C. 633), which at first sight may seem scarcely consistent with these cases, differs from them in one material point, namely, that the accident happened not from any "unusual danger" (to use the terms of the judgment in Indermaur v. Dames), but simply from the plaintiff falling down an ordinary flight of stairs in a passage which he had gone into in the dark.

Far more difficulty arises in the case of a mere licensee. In this case it is clear that the owner of premises is not ordinarily bound to take any care to render the premises free from danger, usual or unusual. The licensee takes his chance of the premises as they are. Thus, a person who allows the public to pass across his lands is not bound to secure that every bridge over water in the land is safe (Gautret v. Egerton, 15 W. R. 638); nor to fence any quarry holes which may be open in it (Hounsell v. Smyth, 8 W. R. 277, 7 C. B. N. S. 731); nor to protect any machinery which may be there (Bolch v. Smith, 7 H. & N. 736). The owner of a loft who gratuitously allows people to go there and sleep is not bound to fence or guard such trap-doors as there may be in it (Sullivan v. Waters, 14 Ir. Ch. 460).

But is the owner of premises in no case under any liability to a mere licensee? In the last case to which we have referred a very learned judge—Pigott, C.B.—thus expressed himself:—

"I do not attempt to rest my judgment in the case now before us upon any general rule or test directing us, where the owner of premises, which he licenses another to use, shall and where he shall not incur the obligation to guard the licensee against danger. From the authorities in their present state I am unable to extract any such general text or rule. That the owner may incur such obligation is shown by some of the decisions; that in many cases he will not is shown by others."

There are two cases in which it may be suggested that the owner of premises may be liable to a licensee. The first is where he allows the licensee to come upon the premises, knowing of some unusual and concealed danger, which the licensee cannot see for himself. In such a case, is the owner liable for the consequences? In favour of holding him liable there is the analogy of the case of a gratuitous lender of a chattel, who is liable if he lends it knowing of a concealed and dangerous defect (see Blackmore v. Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, 6 W. R. 336, 8 E. & E. 1035; McCarthy v. Young, 6 H. & N. 329). And there are also a number of dicta in the case which we have already cited.

The second case in which it may be supposed that the owner of premises is liable to a mere licensee is where, after the licensee has used the premises, the owner does something, which produces a concealed danger, which the licensee cannot see or guard against, lays a trap, as it has been expressed. In favour of the liability in this case there is the case of Corby v. Hill (5 C. B. N. S. 556). But it must be observed that there is some doubt whether some at least of the judges in that case regarded it as a case of mere license or a case of invitation and inducement. And, besides, the case has undoubtedly been received with some dissatisfaction. There are further a number of dicta, especially in Bolch v. Smith, Indermaur v. Dames, Gautret v. Egerton, and Sullivan v.

Waters, tending to support this view. Upon the whole, it must be said that the duty of the owner of premises towards a mere licensee is still unsettled. But it is probable that in the end his liability in the two cases we have pointed out will be established.

ACQUIESCENCE AND PART PERFORMANCE.

It is a principle of equity that where the owner of property stands by and suffers a stranger to lay out money upon it under a supposition that he has a right, the owner shall be bound by the facts as he permits them to be understood, and shall not exercise his legal right in opposition.

In the Earl of Oxford's case (1 Ch. Rep. 1, 2 White & Tudor, 548) the fact of an outlay having been made, rendering the property so much more valuable, was held to entitle the maker of the outlay to the protection of the Court. The Earl of Oxford's case was decided by Lord Chancellor Ellesmere in 13 Jac. 1, before the passing of the Statute of Frauds, but cases of this class are taken out of the operation of the statute by acquiescence, which renders the statute inapplicable.

"There are several instances," said Lord Hardwicke in East India Company v. Vincent, 2 Atk. 82, "where a man has suffered another to go on with building upon his ground and not set up a right till afterwards, when he was all the time cognisant of his right, and the person building had no notice of the other's right, in which case the Court would oblige the owner of the ground to permit the person building to enjoy it quietly and without disturbance," i.e., where at law an action of ejectment would lie. Thus, where the lessee of premises holden under a corporation applied to them for the grant of an adjoining slip of land which they verbally resolved on giving, and upon the faith of their resolution the lessee entered, incurred expense in building on the slip and continued in quiet possession without rent being either paid or demanded of him for nine years, when the corporation brought ejectment the lessee was advised to file a bill to restrain them from proceeding with the action. The case made by his bill was not proved, but the Court expressed an opinion that both principle and authority would be found for compelling the corporation to make a legal demise in pursuance of their resolution, though not under the corporate seal: Marshall v. The Corporation of Queenborough, 1 S. & S. 520. This was a case of a stranger building on land upon which he believed he had a right to build, and the real owner standing by and permitting him to continue in that belief until the expenditure was incurred.

Instances of the application of this principle often occur in the case of landlord and tenant. An intending tenant is allowed, for instance, to enter on land and lay out his money upon it, in the expectation that a lease will be granted, and equity will not allow his expectation to be frustrated, but will decree specific performance as of a contract to grant the lease, where the recognition of the existence of such a contract can be inferred from the acquiescence of the landlord. It need scarcely be added that relief in respect of expenditure under an erroneous opinion of title or an expectation of a larger interest, or that the enjoyment would not be disturbed with the knowledge and permission of the other party, requires a case of bad faith clearly made out (Dann v. Spurrier, 3 B. & P. 399, 7 Ves. 231). If, on the other hand, the expectation be not warranted by any act or word of the landlord, nor has been created or encouraged by him, the tenant has obviously no equity to the protection of the Court (Pilling v. Armitage, 12 Ves. 78).

In Gregory v. Mighell (18 Ves. 326), before Sir William Grant in 1811, there had been a parol agreement to grant a lease for twenty-one years, possession under which was taken by the intending tenant, who was suffered to remain in possession, and lay out his money thereon, after which the landlord brought ejectment. Considering the owner's acquiescence as equivalent to part performance, the Master of the Rolls decreed specific performance of the parol agreement, and stayed the action. In Stiles v. Cooper (3 Atk. 692), a remainderman in tail, who might at law have ejected the lessee, for want of the usual covenants in the building lease, was held to be debarred, by six years' acquiescence and receipt of rents, from controverting the lease, and the Court directed a new lease to be executed, with the proper and usual covenants, for the remainder of the term. In Pain v. Cooper (5 W. R. 340, 3 Sm. & Giff. 449, 1 D. & J. 34) there had been a parol agreement for a lease, which, by the direction of the owner, the intending lessee instructed a solicitor to put into writing. This was done, and the draft agreement was sent to the owner, who let the intending lessee into possession, and directed the solicitor to prepare a lease in conformity with the draft agreement, but subsequently objected to the lease so prepared, and gave the tenant notice to quit, and the Lords Justices held that the delivery and taking of possession was a sufficient part performance of the agreement, as expressed in the draft, to exclude the Statute of Frauds.

Perhaps the most important case of this class of recent date is the case between Sir John Ramsden and his tenants at Huddersfield, which came before the House of Lords in Ramsden v. Dyson (14 W. R. 926, L. R. 1 E. & I. App. 129). The law was there laid down by Lord Kingsdown as follows:—"If a man, under a verbal agreement with a landlord for a certain interest in land, or under an expectation, created or encouraged by the landlord, that he shall have a certain interest, takes possession of such land, with the consent of the landlord, and, upon the faith of such promise or expectation, with the knowledge of the landlord, and without objection by him, lays out money upon the land, the Court will compel the landlord to give effect to such promise or expectation." In Ramsden v. Dyson, according to the defendant's evidence, the tenant laid out his money in building on a plot of Sir John Ramsden's land, in the belief, created or encouraged by Sir John's agents, that he was at any time entitled to call for a lease, and, which was equally essential to the case, Sir John Ramsden's agents knew that he believed this to be his right, and yet suffered him to proceed. It is obvious that the person who lays out his money on the land of another, supposing it to be his own, while the other is in ignorance that the money is being laid out, acquires no right thereby, as the essential element of acquiescence is wanting. In point of fact, the tenants failed to establish their right; but the case, regarded from their point of view, was in principle the same as that to which we have adverted, as applying to cases where the owner of land sees a stranger building on it in the mistaken belief that it is his own (Thornton v. Ramsden, 12 W. R. 880, 4 Giff. 419). If a stranger builds on land, knowing it to be the property of another, equity will not protect him. "If a stranger builds on my land," said Lord Wensleydale in Ramsden v. Dyson, "supposing it to be his own, and I, knowing it to be mine, do not interfere, but leave him to go on, equity considers it to be dishonest in me to remain passive, and afterwards to interfere and take the profit. But if a stranger builds knowingly upon my land, there is no principle of equity which prevents me from insisting on having back my land, with all the additional value he has added to it."

A case, depending to some extent on the foregoing rule, is that of the Unity Joint Stock Bank v. King (6 W. R. 264, 25 Beav. 72), where a father allowed his two sons the use and occupation of a piece of ground, whereon they erected a granary, and made lasting improvements at their own expense, and it was held that they had a lien on the premises for their outlay.

The principle stated by Lord Kingsdown was referred to in the recent case of Baukart v. Tennant (13 W. R. 639, L. R. 10 Eq. 141), where it was suggested that the plaintiffs erected their copper works adjoining the canal, under an expectation, created and encouraged by the owners of the canal, that they should have the continued enjoyment of the water of the canal for the purposes of their works. Had the plaintiffs succeeded in establishing their case they would probably, judging from what the Vice-Chancellor said in his judgment, have obtained a decree in their favour, by the application of the above principle to their case. In Clavering's case (5 Ves. 690) some person was carrying on a colliery and had sunk a shaft at a considerable expense. Mr. Clavering saw the thing going on, according to Lord Loughborough, and in the execution of that plan it was very clear the colliery was not worth a farthing without a road over his ground, and when the work was begun he said he would not give the road. The end of it was that he was made sensible that he was to give the road at a fair valuation. Here two things are clear, first that the way was essential to the use of the colliery, and secondly, though Lord Loughborough does not expressly say it, that Mr. Clavering had allowed the colliery owner to lie under the belief, created or encouraged by himself, that he was to have the road. So in Powell v. Thomas (6 Ha. 300), a colliery owner was constructing a tramway over lands not his own, and wrote a letter offering to take land of the defendant for that purpose at a valuation. The defendant did not answer the letter, and the plaintiff made the tramroad and used it for four years afterwards, when the defendant brought ejectment against him, as a mere trespasser, whereupon he filed his bill for an injunction, charging acquiescence, and an injunction was granted, staying the action upon his giving judgment therein, and paying into Court the utmost value of the land taken by him for the purpose of the tramway. So where A. diverted a watercourse which put B. to great expense, and the diversion being a nuisance to B. he brought an action, an injunction was granted at the suit of A. to restrain it, it being proved that B. saw the work while it was going on, and connived at it, without showing the least disagreement, but rather the contrary (2 Eq. Cas. Ab. 522, pl. 3).

The rule of law that a parol licence, when executed, is not countermandable, but only when executory (Web v. Puternoster, Palmer, 71), involves the same principle. A parol licence to put a skylight over the defendant's area, which impeded the light and air from coming to the plaintiff's window, was held incapable of being recalled at pleasure after the work had been executed at the defendant's expense; at all events, without tendering the expenses he had been put to (Winter v. Brockwell, 8 East, 308). All these cases involve, more or less, the general principle to which we have adverted—namely, that if a stranger lays out money on the property of another, supposing it to be his own, and the right owner, knowing what is going on, does not interfere at the time, he will not be allowed to interfere at all afterwards, or, if at all, only on giving compensation.

LEGISLATION OF THE YEAR.

CAP. XIX.—An Act to amend "The Railway Companies Powers Act, 1864," and "The Railway Construction Facilities Act, 1864."

The amended statutes are chapters 120 and 121 of 27 & 28 Vict. The object, amongst others, of these statutes was to enable railway companies in certain cases to obtain further powers, or to make branch and other railways respectively on complying with the conditions of a general Act of Parliament, without being obliged to procure in each case a special Act. Railway companies upon complying with the prescribed conditions are enabled under these two statutes, unless the application is opposed, to obtain the necessary authorisation from the Board of Trade in the shape of a draft certificate. The certificate has then to be laid before both Houses of Parliament, and unless either House resolves that the certificate ought not to be made, it comes into operation, and has the same force and effect as if its contents had been expressly enacted by Parliament.

If the application is opposed by any railway or canal company, the Board of Trade, by sections 7 and 8 of chapter 120, and sections 9 and 10 of chapter 121, shall not proceed further in the matter, but the applicants may seek by way of bill in Parliament such powers as were sought by them by way of certificate, and such bill may be opposed in the ordinary way.

The amending Act which we are now noticing repeals (section 2) sections 7 and 8 of chapter 120, and sections 9 and 10 of chapter 121 of the Acts of 1864 and part 1 of the schedule to each of these Acts, in which is given a form of notice of opposition to an application under the Act. Sections 3 and 4 provide a fresh machinery in cases where there is opposition to an application for a certificate. There is no alteration made with reference to unopposed applications. By section 3, where a notice of opposition is lodged (the form for which is given in a schedule), the Board of Trade may nevertheless proceed upon the application, but they shall in such case settle a "provisional certificate." Such provisional certificate shall be to the like effect as a draft certificate when there is no opposition, and when confirmed shall have all the force of a certificate duly made by the Board of Trade under the Act of 1864, but previously to such confirmation it shall not be of any validity whatsoever. By section 4 the Board of Trade are within a specified time to procure a bill to be introduced into either House of Parliament for an Act to confirm the provisional certificate, which shall be set out at length in the schedule to the bill. Such bill may be opposed as in the case of a bill for a special Act. There are also provisions relating to costs and other matters of detail. This part of the statute is strictly limited to procedure, it does not affect any rights, and its effect is to throw upon the Board of Trade the duty of introducing a bill when an application is opposed instead of allowing the applicants to do so for themselves.

Section 33 of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 121, which prescribes a certain gauge for all railways made under that Act, is repealed by section 5 of the amending Act, and it is provided that the gauge of every railway under the Act shall be prescribed by the certificate. Sections 4, 6, 7, and 8 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 57, which forbid the alteration in the gauge of any railway, and the construction of railways contrary to that statute, are applied (also by section 5) to railways made under the authority of a certificate under the Act of 1864, or the amending statute. Section 9 extends to railways made under a certificate; all enactments amending, perpetuating, &c., the enactments described in part 4 of chapter 121 of the Act of 1864. The short title of the Act is, "The Railways (Powers and Construction) Acts, 1864, Amendment Act, 1870."

CAP. XX.—An Act to amend the Mortgage Debenture Act, 1865.

This Act is to be construed as one with the Mortgage Debenture Act, 1865 (which is referred to in this Act as "the principal Act"), and the present Act may be cited for all purposes as "The Mortgage Debenture (Amendment) Act, 1870."

The general scope of the principal Act may be gathered from the following passage of an article in the Spectator at the time of the passing of the Act, transcribed into this journal (S.J., vol. 9, p. 975):—"The object of the Mortgage Debentures Act is twofold: first, to enable companies to advance money to owners of freehold, copyhold, and leasehold property; and, secondly, to enable companies to borrow money themselves on the security of debentures secured on their mortgage securities."

In this legislation the protection of the debenture holders is aimed at in two ways: first, by requiring that the mortgage securities against which any mortgage debenture company will be permitted to issue mortgage debentures shall be subjected to a compulsory valuation, to be made by a surveyor appointed or approved by the Enclosure Commissioners, and the value of the property must exceed the amount of the advance made by the company in respect thereof to the extent of one-third at least of such value; and, secondly, by a compulsory registration of their securities at the Land Registry Office. The powers given by the principal, and this, Act may be exercised by such companies incorporated and carrying on business under the Companies Act, 1862, or any other Act of Parliament, as at the date of the principal Act or thereafter should be entitled to advance money on the security of land; and the company must also, under its Act of Parliament or memorandum of association, be limited to one or more of the following objects—viz., the making advances upon any of the securities of a real or quasi real nature enumerated in the Act, or the borrowing of money on transferable mortgage debentures, or on one or more of the before mentioned securities. There is also a provision by which any company under the Companies Act, 1862, whose memorandum of association included, but was not limited, to the objects before mentioned, might alter its memorandum and bring itself within the purview of the principal Act (section 3). Any company to come under the Act must have a paid up capital of not less than £100,000, and each share must be of the nominal value of not less than £50, of which not less than one-tenth nor more than one-half must have been paid up.

The ratio legis to the advancement of which the provisions of the principal Act are directed, is the facilitating by means of companies formed under its provisions, the borrowing and lending money upon transferable mortgage debentures, to be issued by such companies under the authority of the Act; the right to issue such mortgage debentures being founded upon registration by the company, in the prescribed manner, in the office of Land Registry, of real or quasi real securities of the description enumerated (affecting property in England or Wales) to a value equal to the amount of debentures issued. Such securities, by the effect of such registration, are appropriated as a security for the debentures issued to the public. Provisions are made for securing, by the declarations of surveyors approved by the Enclosure Commissioners, a constat of the value of the property on which the company's advances are made, which value is to exceed the amount of the advance to the extent of one-third, at least, of such value. On the securities thus registered the company may (by section 11 of the principal Act) found and issue its mortgage debentures (such debentures being also registered), but the principal sum secured by all the mortgage debentures of any company shall never exceed at any one time the total amount (ascertained as prescribed by the Act) of the registered securities of such company, and also shall never exceed ten times the amount for the time being uncalled of its subscribed share capital. All registered securities of the company are charged with the payment of all the outstanding debentures of the company pari passu regardless of priority of date, and until discharged from such registration, as provided by the Act, can be used for no other purpose than the satisfaction of the principal moneys and interest secured by such debentures, except that the company may receive the interest on such securities.

There is a machinery (section 16) for the redemption of the registered securities, through the company, at the instance of the person executing the security, and on the neglect of the company, by the application of that person himself to the Court of Chancery (section 17). Every mortgage debenture may be transferred by endorsement and, on the registration of such transfer, the transferee is entitled to the full benefit of the original mortgage debenture, so far as it is then in force. There is an important provision (section 40) that in all cases in which, by the instrument creating the trust trustees have a general power to invest trust moneys in or upon the securities of shares, stocks, mortgages, bonds, or debentures of companies incorporated by or acting under the authority of an Act of Parliament, they may invest such trust moneys on the security of the mortgage debentures duly issued under and in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

The Amendment Act of last session is complete and ancillary to the provisions of the principal Act, the practical working of which it is designed to facilitate. The Amendment Act repeals sections 5, 12, 14, 16, 17, 20, 24, 26, 28, and 36 of the former Act, the provisions of which are mainly re-enacted, with some additions and variations, by independent sections in the ancillary Act. Section 5 of the principal Act excluded from the securities on which debentures might be founded (among other enumerated property of an uncertain or fluctuating kind) leaseholds for a less unexpired term than fifty years, or which were subject to "any rent beyond a nominal rent"; while section 4 of the Amendment Act substitutes for the vague terms "any rent beyond a nominal rent" the more definite description of "a rent beyond one-fourth of the annual value of the property leased, estimated at the date of the security given to the company."

Section 7 of the Amendment Act varies the provision in the principal Act by enacting that registration shall not prevent the company from receiving, applying, and giving a valid discharge for any instalments payable by the terms of the deed creating the security, or any annuities. The repealed section of the principal Act only provided for the receipt by the company of interest in the like case.

Sections 8 and 9 make improved provisions for the redemption of securities. Section 10, which appears to be altogether new, provides a mode whereby the mortgage security may be discharged in part, but this can only be done if the company make the application to the registrar at the instance of the person giving the security, and on complying with the requisitions of the section.

Sections 11 and 12 relate to the provisions for the inspection of the registers and returns, and the particulars to be contained in the quarterly returns to be made by the company to the registrar.

Section 13 provides that principal, distinguished from interest, and made payable by instalments, and remaining unpaid at the time of valuation, shall be deemed the value of the mortgage at the time of the return.

Section 14 provides for the calculation of the value of annuities.

Sections 15 and 16 regulate the form and terms of the mortgage debentures. They are required by the form B. in the schedule, and by section 16, to be issued in such terms that the principal sums shall be payable either at a fixed time to be named therein, not less than six months nor exceeding ten years from the date, or at any time on six calendar months' previous notice being given to the company by the holder for the time being of the mortgage debenture, or by the company to the holder for the time being, with interest thereon in the meantime at such rate as may be agreed, payable half-yearly or otherwise, and no mortgage debenture to be for less than £50.

Section 17 provides for the registration of the discharge or cancellation of a mortgage debenture.

Section 18 declares that nothing in the Act shall exempt the company from the provisions of any Act relating to joint stock companies, and applicable to the company.

The Town Council of Birmingham have recommended to the Home Secretary, that the sum of £150 be paid to the clerks to the justices of that borough, in consideration of the special and exceptional expenses they have been put to, during the years 1868 and 1869, in consequence of the abolition by the Reform Act of the power of compounding for poor-rates: provided that such sum shall not be deemed an increase of the salary of such clerks, or form the basis of any application by them, or either of them for any future increase thereof, and that their present salary shall hereafter be deemed the remuneration for all business which the said clerks may by reason of their office be called on to perform.

EQUITY.

COSTS OF BANKRUPT DEFAULTING TRUSTEE.

Bowyer v. Griffin, V.C.M., 18 W. R. 227.

Where an executor or trustee is a defendant to a suit to administer the trusts of a will or settlement and becomes bankrupt, it is now settled that he is entitled to receive all costs incurred subsequently to his bankruptcy as between solicitor and client. This rule appears to have been originated in favour of unfortunate rather than culpable defendants, and as a premium to defendants who afforded every assistance in their power to the plaintiffs. In Gibbons v. Hawley (May 10, 1832), cited in a note to Samuel v. Jones (2 Ha. 246), the order expressly mentioned that the defendant's solicitor had greatly facilitated the realising of the testator's assets. In Samuel v. Jones (ubi sup.), the Vice-Chancellor said—"An executor, although a defaulter to the estate at the time of his bankruptcy, yet properly conducting himself in his character of executor after the bankruptcy, is entitled to his subsequent costs, like any other executor. A different rule would be very harsh. Suppose the case of an executor who has had the misfortune to be made a bankrupt, and he is a debtor to the estate of his testator in a small sum, whilst the chief part of the estate has been got in and secured by his diligence: is a party in such a situation not to have his costs as executor until after the whole of his debt at the time of his bankruptcy shall have been repaid? The bankruptcy is the statutory mode by which in such a case the debt is discharged. . . . No case of misconduct or unnecessary litigation has been shown." In Carr v. Henderson (11 Beav. 415), the suit was by creditors against an administrator who became bankrupt, pending a reference for accounts on which a balance was ultimately found against him: Lord Langdale refused him any costs. In Bensusan v. Nehemias (1851, 14 D. G. & Sm. 387) the Vice-Chancellor refused to allow a bankrupt defaulting trustee to have any costs unless he would replace the fund. But subsequently the Courts have taken the mere hard rule of allowing bankrupt trustees all costs subsequent to the bankruptcy. In Cotton v. Clark (16 Beav. 134) Lord Romilly took Samuel v. Jones as "expressly deciding" "that the Court will not set off the costs incurred by an executor subsequent to his bankruptcy, against his debt which accrued previous to the bankruptcy." Turner v. Mullineux (9 W. R. 252), the case oftenest cited, merely affords the information that in that case Vice-Chancellor Wood allowed the costs; it appears from the argument that the bankrupt trustee had given every assistance since his bankruptcy. We do not approve of this indiscriminate rule of awarding costs after bankruptcy, thinking that a distinction might be usefully drawn between the meritorious cases in which the rule seems to have originated, and those cases which are not so. The rule, however, is as firmly fixed as many years' usage can make it. Vice-Chancellor Malins in the present case treats it as both binding and judicious. One hint may be gathered from this case as a matter of practice, and that is that where no dividend is to be got out of the defaulter's estate, or the probable dividend is less than his probable costs, it is not worth while to prosecute the writ merely to remove him; the proper course is to ask him to retire, if he refuse to retire voluntarily, Vice-Chancellor Malins will order him to pay the costs of his own removal.

BILL BY COMMONERS.

Smith v. Earl Brownlow, M.R., 18 W. R. 271.

We discussed this case from a somewhat popular point of view very shortly after the delivery of the decision (ante p. 242). The bill was filed by a plaintiff, who was himself both a freehold and a copyhold tenant of the manor, on behalf of himself and all other the freehold and copyhold tenants, against the lord, claiming the ordinary rights of pasture, and of cutting furze, fern, &c., &c., and also a jus spatiandi for purposes of enjoyment and recreation, and prayed an injunction against the interference with such rights.

An objection was taken that the freeholders and copyholders ought not to sue together. The defendant would appear not to have placed much reliance on this objection, for it was not raised by demurrer, and indeed nothing can appear more plainly from a perusal of the older cases, such, for instance, as Mayor of York v. Pilkington (1 Atk. 282), than that a perfect identity or privity of interest is necessary neither for plaintiffs nor defendants to a bill of peace. The pleader will remember, however, that such a bill can be maintained only on behalf of or against a large number of other persons, to save multiplicity of suits. So, in Phillips v. Hudson (15 W. R. 370, 2 L. R. Ch. 249), where the plaintiff was the only claimant (being seised of all the commonable land, except one small tenement, whose owner did not interfere), Lord Chelmsford (reversing Lord Romilly) dismissed the bill, saying that the plaintiff had his remedy at law.

The plaintiff established his case, except as to the right of recreation. As to this part of the subject, we refer the reader to our previous comment (ubi sup.).

EFFECT OF PARTIAL CONFIRMATION OF A VOIDABLE DEED.

Davies v. Davies, M.R., 18 W. R. 634.

In this case, as in Jarratt v. Aldam (18 W. R. 511), the Master of the Rolls followed Lord Eldon's decision in Milner v. Lord Harewood (18 Ves. 259, 277), that where a person confirms a portion of a voidable deed, with nothing more, it operates as a confirmation of the entire deed. Lord Hardwicke said in Harvey v. Ashley (3 Atk. 609), that at law the difference is taken, that where an agreement appears upon the face of it to be prejudicial to an infant, it is void, but if for his advantage, then voidable only (Lumsden's case, 17 W. R. 65, L. R. 4 Ch. 31). An infant's deed then requires some act on his part after he comes of age to effect a confirmation, although mere acquiescence, after knowledge of his rights, would be no doubt treated as a confirmation. In Jarratt v. Aldam the infant made a settlement of his estate before coming of age, reserving a power to jointure, and on his marriage, having attained twenty-one, he exercised the power, some time after which he filed his bill to set aside the settlement, without prejudice to the jointure.

The Master of the Rolls decided that after exercising the power to jointure, and thus recognising the validity of that part of the settlement, he could not be heard to say that he had not confirmed the entire settlement, and dismissed the bill. A man is not at liberty to adopt so much of any transaction as he pleases and reject the rest, where the instrument is voidable.

COMMON LAW.

CRIMINATING INTERROGATORIES.

Inman v. Jenkins, C.P., 18 W. R. 897.

We collected and examined all the cases upon criminal interrogatories not long ago (13 S. J. 738), and we then endeavoured, although the task was a difficult one, to deduce some general principle from the many decisions on the subject. We then said "the result of the cases seems to be that the mere fact that interrogatories have a tendency to criminate will not per se be a reason for refusing them. It is, however, always a matter for the discretion of the judge at chambers whether interrogatories should be allowed in any action. . . . This being so it seems that the judge will be slow to allow interrogatories having a tendency to criminate unless there is some special reason for them."

Inman v. Jenkins has again raised this question. It was an action for libel contained in a letter in the Times.

The plaintiff obtained leave at chambers to administer interrogatories to the defendant asking, if the defendant was the author of the letter. The Court upheld the decision, but it is difficult to understand the grounds upon which it was upheld. As far as we can see the decision was that the defendant ought to be interrogated, because his substantial defence was that the libel was true, and not that he was not its author (he had pleaded not guilty and justification), and also because facts were stated on the affidavits, which showed that it was very probable that the defendant was the author of the libel. The Court seemed to think that the fact that the substantial defence was a justification constituted a "special reason" which was sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to interrogate the defendant. It may be that the Court thought that only formal proof of the defendant's authorship was required, and that it was clear that in fact he was author. They do not, however, rest their decision on this or, indeed, on any intelligible ground. The only ratio decidendi is that as the real point in dispute had nothing in common with the matter inquired after, the plaintiff was entitled to put the question. Of course the defendant is not bound to answer a question of this sort, and, therefore, the whole of this discussion was for the purpose of putting a question which, it was admitted, need not and almost certainly would not be answered. This shows forcibly the vice of the present system, which requires leave to administer interrogatories. If interrogatories of any kind could be administered and all objections necessarily come from the person interrogated, we should seldom have cases of this sort. Even without giving up the present system a great improvement would be effected if the distinction of criminating and non-criminating interrogatories were ignored on the application for leave to administer them. Let all the objections on this head at least come when the answers are made. If this were the rule some intelligible principles might be laid down on this subject, but as it is the greatest confusion prevails and must continue to prevail as long as the present plan of requiring leave to interrogate is followed.

CONSTRUCTION OF WILL—EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE—"NEPHEW."

Grant v. Grant, Ex. Ch., 18 W. R. 951:

This case was decided in the Court of Probate (18 W. R. 230) as well as in the Court of Common Pleas before it came before the Exchequer Chamber. A testator devised land to and named as his executor "my nephew, Joseph Grant." At his death there was the plaintiff, Joseph Grant, the son of a brother of the testator, and the defendant, Joseph Grant, the son of a brother of the testator's wife. There was no doubt as a matter of fact that the testator meant his wife's nephew. The question was whether evidence was admissible to show this: Lord Penzance admitted evidence because the words in their ordinary signification might apply to either Joseph Grant, and there was therefore a latent ambiguity. The Court of Common Pleas decided in the same way and on the same ground but they also held that the evidence was admissible for an additional reason, viz., because the testator was in the habit of calling his wife's nephew "his nephew," and therefore that the evidence should be admitted even if the words "my nephew" in their ordinary signification did not apply to the nephew of a wife. The Court of Exchequer Chamber have upheld this decision on the former ground. They have not dissented from the second ground but they expressed no opinion upon it:

BANKRUPTCY.

GENERAL MEETING OF CREDITORS—ASSENT TO RESOLUTION.

Ex parte Pooley, Re Russell, L.J.J., 18 W. R. 1013.

A new point was decided in this case, as to the mode in which, and time at which the votes of creditors in favour of a special resolution, in case of bankruptcy or liquidation by arrangement, may be given and proved; and when the great part which general meetings of creditors are to play, and the great power conferred upon them, under the new law of bankruptcy, is borne in mind, the importance of any decision on such a question will be at once apparent.

Section 16, sub-section 8, of the Bankruptcy Act enacts that "a special resolution shall be decided by a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors present personally or by proxy at the meeting, and voting on such resolution." By rule 275, "Only such resolutions as are reduced into writing and are signed by or on behalf of the statutory majority of the creditors assembled at a meeting shall be taken cognisance of by the Court, but the signatures of such creditors may be subscribed subsequently to the meeting, but prior to the filing or registration of the resolution." Now it is plain that these provisions taken together are capable of two meanings. They may mean that the statutory majority must at the meeting vote in favour of the resolution, though their signatures may be affixed afterwards; or they may mean that, provided any creditor has been at the meeting, whichever way he may there have voted, it is still open to him to vote in favour of the resolution by signing it at any time before it is filed or registered.

Lord Justice James has decided in favour of the latter view. This case establishes that a creditor who at the meeting has opposed a resolution has still a locus penitentie; he may change his mind and sign it at any time before its filing or registration.

COURTS.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

BASINGHALL-STREET.

(Before Mr. Registrar ROCHE.)

Sept. 9.—In re Brady.

Application under section 80 of the Bankruptcy Act.

Brough, on behalf of the petitioning creditor, and of the receiver in this case, applied for an order under the 80th section of the new Bankruptcy Act, for a continuance of the proceedings notwithstanding the death of the bankrupt. Adjudication was made on Saturday last, and the present application became necessary in consequence of the bankrupt's death. The learned counsel stated that the receiver had taken possession of assets of considerable value, and it was therefore important in the interests of the creditors that the proceedings should continue. The bankrupt had carried on business as a solicitor in Carey-street.

His Honour said it was the first case under the new law in which it had become necessary to make an order under the 80th section. In this case there seemed to be sufficient reason why the bankruptcy should continue, and the application would therefore be granted.

COUNTY COURTS.

LAMBETH.

(Before R. J. CUST, Esq., Deputy Judge.)

Sept. 9.—Johnson v. McNeil.

Committal to prison with evidence of defendant's means to pay.

This case had been twice adjourned. On the first occasion the defendant appeared and declared his inability at present to pay on the ground that he was and had been some months out of employment. He depended entirely on his son for his means of living. The plaintiff's agent not being prepared with evidence as to defendant's means, the case was adjourned for the attendance of the son. On the second occasion the son not being in attendance the case was again adjourned; but on this, the third occasion, he appeared, when the judge told him some arrangement must be made to pay this debt, which was a balance of £2 12s. 0d. for medical attendance, and the doctor must be paid.

The son, in answer to the judge's questions as to his own means to pay it, said he was a clerk at a salary of £160 a year; he had a wife and family to keep out of it, but he had taken his father into his house and had been keeping him for many months past as he had been out of work. He (the son) was doing quite as much as he could do.

Mr. CUST said the money must be paid, and he should commit the defendant to prison, but the warrant would not issue if ten shillings a month were paid. Surely, the defendant could earn half-a-crown a week somehow or other.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. HENRY THOMAS COLE, Q.C., has been appointed Recorder of Bristol, which office was resigned by Sir R. P. Collier, the Attorney-General, in deference to the opinion of his Plymouth constituents. Mr. Cole, who was born in February, 1816, was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in November, 1842, and was appointed a Queen's Counsel and bencher of his Inn in January, 1867. He is a member of the Western circuit, and has been Recorder of Penzance since 1862.

Dr. JOHN THOMAS ARDY, barrister-at-law, of the Norfolk circuit, who was recently appointed Recorder of Bedford, has been appointed Revising Barrister for the county of Huntingdon.

Mr. ROBERT SAWYER, barrister-at-law, has been appointed Revising Barrister for the borough of Stafford. Mr. Sawyer was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in January, 1848, and is a member of the Oxford circuit.

Mr. CHARLES DUFFELL FAULKNER, solicitor, of Deddington, has been elected Coroner for the northern division of Oxfordshire, in the room of Mr. Henry Churchill. Mr. Faulkner was admitted an attorney in Trinity Term 1850, and was recently elected to succeed Mr. Churchill as clerk to the magistrates of the Walton division.

Mr. JAMES READ, jun., solicitor, of Mildenhall, Suffolk, has been appointed coroner for the borough of Thetford, Norfolk (in the room of Mr. R. E. Clarke, deceased), at the same fees as if he were a resident in the borough. Mr. Read was certificated in 1847, and has carried on business in partnership with his father.

Mr. WILLIAM JAMES GENN, solicitor, and town clerk for Falmouth, has been appointed Clerk to the Commissioners of the Falmouth Harbour Board, which has been newly organised. Mr. Genn was certificated in 1833, and is likewise clerk to the magistrates of Falmouth, and also to the justices for the division of East Kerrier.

Mr. CUTHBERT UMPREVILLE LAWS, solicitor, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, North Shields, and Tynemouth (himself Laws, Glynn, & Mayson), has been appointed, by his Grace the Duke of Northumberland, to be steward of the copyhold manor of Tynemouth, in the place of Sir Walter B. Riddell, Bart., judge of the Whitechapel County Court, who has resigned the stewardship of the said manor. Mr. Laws was certificated in Hilary Term, 1833, and has hitherto been bailiff of the manor of Tynemouth.

FOREIGN TRIBUNALS & JURISPRUDENCE.

AMERICA.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

Edward C. Bates, plaintiff in error, v. The Equitable Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Providence, Rhode Island.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Rhode Island.

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the Court.—The policy of insurance on which this suit was brought contained this provision: "And this company agree, that if the assured shall sell the aforesaid property, or any part thereof, before the expiration of this policy, a proportion of the premium received shall be repaid upon receiving notice of such sale before a loss happens . . . or this policy may be continued for the benefit of such purchaser, if this company give their consent thereto, to be evidenced by a certificate of the fact, or by indorsement on this policy." Philbrick, the party insured, sold the goods during the life of the policy of the plaintiff, and indorsed on the policy, "Payable, in case of loss, to Edward C. Bates. W. D. Philbrick."

The policy, with this indorsement, was sent by a policy-broker to the defendants, and the secretary of the company placed under the above indorsement these words: "Consent is hereby given to the above indorsement. Equitable Insurance Company. Fred. W. Arnold, secretary."

The secretary of the company swears that he had no knowledge of the sale, nor is there any evidence that any officer of the company had notice of it, unless it is to be implied from the request to give their consent to the indorsement made by Philbrick, and the consent so given.

One of the conditions of the policy was that if the property insured should be sold or conveyed, the risk assumed ceased, and the policy became void, and there can be no doubt that, looking to both the provisions of a policy, such as are here cited, it ceases to be binding when the assured parts with his interest in the property insured, unless the company be notified of the sale. When this is done before a loss happens, the company is bound to refund a part of the prepaid premium, to be apportioned in reference to the unexpired time for which the policy was given.

If, however, the purchaser and the assured ask it, and the company consent to it, the policy may continue for the benefit of the purchaser. This latter proposition is founded upon the knowledge of the sale, and upon the consent of the company to accept the purchaser as the party whose interest is insured, instead of the vendor who was originally insured.

As there is no evidence outside of the two indorsements we have copied from the policy that there was any consent to accept Bates, the purchaser, as the party whose interest was insured, and as the presumption, if there is one arising from those indorsements, of a notice of sale is not supported by anything else, it becomes important to determine what those indorsements imply on those two points.

If Philbrick could not, in law or in fact, have directed the payment of the loss, if one should occur to him, as owner of the property, to another party, with the consent of the company, then it would be a reasonable inference that the indorsement made by him implied a sale of his interest. But if he could make, with the consent of the company, a valid appointment that any loss covered by the policy should be paid to a third person, though he remained the owner of the goods, and the loss was his loss, then the indorsement of Philbrick does not necessarily convey the idea of a sale, nor the consent of the company imply a consent to a sale.

Now, it is a well known and frequent thing in insurance business for a person to insure his life, or his property, and either in the policy itself, or by indorsement at the time it is made, or by subsequent indorsement, to which the consent of the company is generally required, to direct the loss to be paid to some third party.

And this is done in language similar, if not identical, with that used in this case. It is a mode of appointing that the loss of the party insured shall be paid by the company to such third person.

This transaction is a very common mode of furnishing a species of security by a debtor to his creditor, who may be willing to trust to the debtor's honesty, his skill and success in trade, but who requires indemnity against such accidents as loss by fire, or the perils of navigation. The property of the debtor at risk being thus insured for the benefit of the creditor, gives him this indemnity.

In the face of this frequent use of the two indorsements on the policy, it cannot be held that they imply of themselves a knowledge of the sale or a consent to insure the purchaser.

If it could be shown that it had been the course of dealing between these particular parties to recognise the indorsement of the party first assured as evidence of a sale, and the indorsement of the company as a consent to the sale; or, if it could be shown that by custom and usage, in any particular place, these indorsements were so treated, the case might be different; but, in the absence of such usage or custom, we can see in these indorsements nothing more than the direction of Philbrick, and the consent of the company, that any loss sustained by Philbrick, covered by that policy, should be paid to Bates. As Philbrick did not have any interest in the goods when the fire occurred, he sustained no loss, and the policy covered none.

The analogy of the effect of such indorsements on promissory notes, in assigning the notes to the indorser, is very imperfect. In such case the sum mentioned in the note is payable absolutely, and without regard to the interest of the original payee in any other matter. It is all contained in the note when its contents, to use the language of the Judiciary Act, are thus made payable to the indorsee, and the indorser necessarily parts with his interest in the subject-matter of the contract.

These views are well supported by recently adjudged cases in this country (Fogg v. Middlesex Manufacturing Company, 10 Cush. 346; Hale v. Marine and Fire Insurance Company, 6 Gray, 169; Young v. Eagle Insurance Company, 14 Gray, 153; Grosvenor v. Atlantic Insurance Company, 17 New York, 391; State Mutual Fire Insurance Company v. Robert, 31 Penn. St. 438).

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore affirmed.—New York Daily Transcript.

OBITUARY.

EDWARD FOSS.

Among the veteran members of the profession who have lately passed away, we regret to have to record the name of Edward Foss, author of "The Judges of England," who died, July 27, at his residence in Croydon, in his eighty-third year, after a very short illness, from an apoplectic attack.

Born October 16, 1787, the eldest surviving son of the fifteen children of Edward Smith Foss, of 36, Essex-street, Strand, solicitor, he was sent at an early age to school at Greenwich, under Dr. C. Burney, "the Grecian," who had married his mother's sister, the daughter of Dr. William Rose, of Chiswick. Here he remained till he was articled to his father, in 1804. Residing at home among intelligent and literary connections he began to write early, and articles of his appeared in the Monthly Review (under Dr. G. Griffiths, a cousin of his mother's), Aiken's Athenaeum, the London and Gentleman's Magazines, and the Morning Chronicle, in James Perry's time. He was admitted partner with his father in 1811, and in 1814 married Catherine, eldest daughter of Peter Martineau, Esq., by whom he had one son who died in infancy. He resided in Bernard-street and then in Camberwell-grove, where his social talents were much appreciated. He possessed a powerful and expressive voice, and his reading aloud was excellent, especially from Shakespeare. Few who have heard him read will forget the impression made upon them, and he retained much of this power to the last. In 1830, on the death of his father, he removed to Essex-street, and in 1837 took a house at Streatham, where he lost his much-loved wife in November, 1841. In 1840 he had retired from business and devoted himself to the collection of materials for his long-contemplated work—the lives of all the English judges, and to the duties of the magistracy, to which he was appointed in 1841. In 1844 he married Maria Elizabeth, eldest daughter of William Hutchins, Esq., and retired to Street End House, near Canterbury, where he resided for fourteen years, removing thence in 1858 to Churchill House, Dover, and again in 1865 to Frensham House, Addiscombe, Croydon, where he died July 27, 1870, leaving six sons and three daughters.

Mr. Foss continued to write in various publications, especially in the Standard, the Legal Observer, and Notes and Queries, of which latter he was a constant reader and steady correspondent. His first separate publication had been "The Beauties of Massinger," 1817, and the second was "An Abridgment of Blackstone's Commentaries," 1820, published under the name of John Gifford (who had originally undertaken the work, but died before finishing the first sheet). This book is translated into German. The first result of his historical collections was "The Grandeur of the Law, or the Legal Peers of England," 1843. Lord Campbell being aware of his researches into legal history obtained from him the use of his valuable collections in the preparations of his "Lives of the Chancellors." "The Judges of England," vols 1 and 2, were published in 1848; 3 and 4 followed in 1851; 5 and 6 in 1857; and 7, 8 and 9 in 1864. It was remarkable that no judicial changes occurred during the publication of the last three volumes so that the book was absolutely complete to the end of 1864.

Mr. Foss next published, in 1865 a small useful handbook, which he named "Tabulae Curiales," being tables of the superior courts of Westminster Hall, showing the judges who sat in them from 1066 to 1864. At the time of his death he was engaged in the abridgment of his large work, and it will shortly be published, we understand, in one volume, having been seen through the press by his eldest son, E. W. Foss, Esq., barrister, of the Inner Temple.

During Mr. Foss's professional career he was actively engaged in many remarkable causes connected with literature and the press, and was employed by Cadell & Davies, Strahan, Spottiswoode, Baldwin, Dickinson, &c. In 1827 he acted as under sheriff to his friend Mr. Spottiswoode, and was treasurer and trustee of the sheriff's fund. Till 1831 he was secretary to the Female Orphan Asylum, continuing hon. secretary till 1841, and was also, till 1839, secretary of the Society of Guardians of Trade. The Law Clerks' Society obtained much attention from Mr. Foss, and he was one of their trustees, and chairman of their first public dinner. He took a great interest in the Incorporated Law Society, giving much time and care to forward its plans, and was actively instrumental in procuring the charter and arranging many difficulties attending its formation. He was on the first council, and was president in 1842 and 1843. He was also connected with the Law Life Assurance Society from its foundation in 1833, having been originally an auditor, and subsequently for many years a director. He attended the board meetings twice in the week before his death.

One of the oldest members of the Society of Antiquaries, of which he became fellow in 1822, he was elected on its council in 1854 and 1869, and contributed several articles to the "Archæologia." The Camden Society also counted him upon their list, and he was on the council from 1859 to 1853 and from 1865 till his death. He joined the Archaeological Institute on its formation, and read papers at several meetings (published in their proceedings), one of them, upon Westminster Hall, being included in the book called "Old London," published in memorial of their London Congress. He greatly assisted the late Rev. Lambert B. Larking in the foundation of the Kent Archaeological Society, and wrote several papers for it, notably one in the first volume, "Archæologia Cantiana" "on the Collar of SS."

From 1837 Mr. Foss was a member of the Royal Society of Literature, and was at one time auditor. He and his brother Henry (formerly of the firm of Payne & Foss, Pall Mall, and twice master of the Stationers' Company, who died January, 1868) took an active interest in the Royal Literary Fund, Mr. Henry Foss being on the general committee and Mr. Foss on the council, and for many years auditor.

He was appointed magistrate for Kent in 1846, and in 1853 deputy lieutenant of that county.

THOMAS GRUNDY, ESQ.

The death of this gentleman is referred to by the Bury Guardian in the following terms:—

"At his residence at Grange, Morecambe Bay, on Thursday afternoon, Mr. Thomas Grundy, for many years senior partner in the firm of Messrs. T., A., and J. Grundy & Co., solicitors, of this town, quietly breathed his last, at the comparatively mature age of sixty-four. The announcement of the demise of this well known and widely esteemed professional gentleman will no doubt produce much sorrow amongst his surviving townsmen. A fatal malady had for some years past been lurking in the frame of the deceased gentleman, and on Saturday last it suddenly reached its acme in a fit of apoplexy. From the time he was seized up to the last moment of his existence he remained perfectly conscious, and died calmly in the presence of all the members of his family. He was the eldest son of the late Mr. Edmund Grundy, a Radical of some repute, and who unsuccessfully contested the borough with Mr. Richard Walker, a Liberal, father of the present chairman of the commissioners, on the occasion of the first election in 1832. He went in partnership with the late Mr. George Whitehead for some years. The co-partnership was dissolved, and the firm of Messrs. T., A., and J. Grundy was established, the deceased taking the leading part in that concern. The railway age had just then dawned, and the enterprising firm succeeded in obtaining, amongst other appointments, that of solicitors to the East Lancashire Railway Company. As railway solicitors, the firm proved very successful. In addition to railway appointments, the firm, more especially through the influence and energy of the departed gentleman, had many of the local companies and bodies under supervision. For a series of years Mr. Grundy officiated as registrar of the county court, and was succeeded in that office by his son Mr. E. A. Grundy, the present registrar. He remained in the firm up till December, 1868, when his severance was completed, and he retired to spend the remainder of his days in quiet. As an advocate the late Mr. Grundy was distinguished at the local bar for his legal acumen, and the facility with which he conducted cases entrusted to him. He was twice elected to the Board of Commissioners, and took a lively interest in the affairs of the local Government. Inheriting the spirit of his father, and imbued with like political sentiments, he was a staunch Radical, and was foremost in all political movements in the town and district. Although we were opposed to him in politics, and differed with him in other schemes which his Radicalism would have promulgated, we mourn his loss in common with a large circle of friends. His wife and four sons survive him."

MR. B. L. CHAPMAN.

The death of Benedict Lawrence Chapman, Esq., M.A., Barrister-at-Law, took place at Melksham House, Wilts., on the 12th of September. The deceased gentleman was educated at Jesus' College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1832, and afterwards attained the degree of M.A. He was elected a fellow of Jesus' College about this period, and remained on the foundation up to the date of his death, standing next on the list of fellows to Mr. John Peter De Gex, Q.C. Mr. Benedict Chapman was called to the bar at the Inner Temple, in June, 1837, and has practised as an equity draughtsman and conveyancer.

MR. L. O. BIGG.

Mr. Lionel Oliver Bigg, solicitor, one of the oldest legal practitioners in the city of Bristol, died at Bruton House, Clifton-park, on the 30th of August, in the seventy-ninth year of his age. The late Mr. Bigg was certificated in Trinity Term, 1814, and was for many years, until its dissolution, the solicitor to the old Bristol Chamber of Commerce, and in his time was professionally connected with several important commercial firms in the western capital. He was latterly the chief partner in the firm of Bigg, Meade, King, & Bigg. His eldest son, Mr. Lionel O. Bigg, graduated B.A. at University College, Oxford, in 1863.

MR. C. NAYLOR.

Mr. Charles Naylor, solicitor, of Leeds, expired at his residence, Newton Lodge, Potter's Newton, on the 6th of September, in his sixty-fourth year. Mr. Naylor was admitted an attorney in Michaelmas Term, 1823, and was for many years solicitor to the guardians of the poor for the borough of Leeds. He was a Commissioner for affidavits in the County Palatine of Lancaster, a perpetual Commissioner, and a Commissioner to administer oaths.

COURT PAPERS.

GENERAL RULES AND ORDERS OF THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS AT LANCASTER.

The Right Honourable Frederick Temple, Lord Dufferin, K.P., K.C.B., Chancellor of the Duchy and County Palatine of Lancaster (with the advice and consent of Sir Robert Lush, Knight, Chief Justice, and Sir Anthony Cleasby, Knight, one of the Justices of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster), doth hereby, in pursuance of "The Common Pleas at Lancaster Amendment Act, 1869," and in pursuance and execution of all other powers enabling him in this behalf: and the said Chief Justice and Justice do hereby, also in pursuance of an Act of Parliament passed in the session of Parliament held in the 4th and 5th years of the reign of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, intituled "An Act for improving the practice and proceedings of the Court of Common Pleas of the County Palatine of Lancaster:" and in pursuance and execution of "The Common Law Procedure Act, 1852," "The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854," "The Common Law Procedure Act, 1860," and of all other powers and authorities enabling them in this behalf, make and publish the following General Rules, and do order and direct as follows:—

The General Rules and Orders of 23rd October, 1869, shall be varied, from the 1st day of October next, in the following particulars:—

1. At the end of rule 2, in lieu of words "the district where the defendant then is or permanently resides," the following shall be substituted:—"In such district as such attorney or the plaintiff when suing in person may select; provided that, when an attorney institutes any such cause, suit, or proceeding as aforesaid, by another attorney acting as his agent, the address for service of such agent shall be considered as the address for service of the attorney instituting the suit, cause, or proceeding, within the meaning of this rule."

2. In lieu of the last clause of rule 4, the following one shall be substituted:—"Provided that in the Manchester district the office of the prothonotary shall be closed during the whole of Whitsun week, and in the Preston district, only on Whit-Tuesday."

3. In lieu of the 13th rule the following one shall be substituted:—"An attorney of any of her Majesty's Superior Courts at Westminster may be admitted an attorney of this court, on producing his certificate of admission in one of such courts and his certificate to practise as such, or otherwise satisfying the prothonotary thereof, and on signing the roll of attorneys of the court; and any attorney already admitted by the prothonotary to practise in any district of the court on his signing the roll of such district, and such signatures may be either made personally or by another attorney of the court, duly authorised by the applicant in writing to sign it for him"

4. In lieu of the 20th rule the following shall be substituted:—"In addition to those enactments and provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, which were applied by section 229 of that Act to this court, the remaining enactments and provisions of the said Act are hereby applied with the requisite modifications to this court, and to all actions and proceedings therein. mutatis mutandis."

5. That rule 21 be amended by striking out the Regulars of Easter Term, April 23, 1857.

6. The following words shall be added to rule 23:—"And the table of fees to be taken by the prothonotary, as associate, shall be the same as by the table of fees published in the London Gazette of the 13th of February, 1866, is specified as proper to be taken by clerks of assize as associates and their officers, in reference to proceedings at Nisi Prius on the circuits; and that the fees on searches for fines and recoveries of record in this court shall be the same as heretofore."

7. The registry of executions, judgments, statutes, recognizances, &c., under the Acts of 18 Vict. c. 15; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112; and 28 & 29 Vict. c. 104, for the County Palatine of Lancaster, shall be kept by the prothonotary at Preston, who shall as such receive the fees thereon specified in the said Acts to be payable to the Senior Master of the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster.

8. In rule 24, in lieu of the words "and to include mileage, in actions above £20, £3 8s., in actions under £20, £2 14s.," the following shall be substituted:—"In actions where a Preston, Liverpool, or Manchester attorney properly concerned £3 8s.; service by a correspondent, or mileage where the distance exceeds five miles, in addition, not exceeding 12s. In agency cases, including mileage and whether served by plaintiff's attorney or by an agent, £4."

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE MAGISTRATES.—Mr. Elliott, one of the magistrates of the Lambeth Police-court, has resigned, and is succeeded by Mr. Lushington, of the Thames Police-court. Mr. Woolrych, the junior magistrate of the Lambeth Police-court, will fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Selfe, at the Westminster Police-court. Mr. Lushington has only been a magistrate eight months, and succeeded Mr. Benson on the transfer of that gentleman to the Southwark Court in December last. A new court is building for the Worship-street district near Finsbury-square, at the south-west corner of the district, in place of the present wretched and inconvenient court. The new court, however, will be four miles away from many parts of the district, and much disappointment is felt at the position chosen, which, it is thought, should be in the middle of the district. The death of Mr. Selfe and the retirement of Mr. Elliott create two vacancies in the police magistracy. The patronage is vested in the Home Secretary.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

Such fluctuations as have taken place in the market for securities during the past week have again been dependent almost exclusively upon the change in the character of the news of the war. The very limited extent of business done has reduced those fluctuations to very narrow limits.

In railway shares there has been a slight improvement apparent.

The supply of money is very abundant and the Bank rate of discount was on Thursday further reduced to 3 per cent.

Mr. Edwin Lovell, solicitor, of Wells, and clerk of the peace for Somersetshire, has recently presented to the 10th Somerset Rifle Volunteer Corps, of which he was formerly captain, an elegant silver claret jug, to be shot for. Mr. Lovell, when captain of the corps, gave several handsome cups for competition, and to each of the three Somersetshire battalions he presented silver challenge cups of the value of £50 each.

The Solicitors' Journal.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 24, 1870.

WE UNDERSTAND that Mr. H. T. J. Macnamara, of the Oxford Circuit, and Recorder of Reading, has accepted the vacant metropolitan magistracy. We are very glad that the place should be filled by so able a man, but Mr. Macnamara has been regarded on all sides as a barrister who must, before many years, become an ornament of the common law bench, and we can hardly spare such a man for a police magistracy.

IN ANOTHER column we print a report of a judgment recently delivered by the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries upon a point raised as to the liability of past members of cost-book mining companies.

The Budnick Consols Mining Company was in liquidation under, though not formed under, the Companies Act of 1862, and the liabilities of the adventure having been completely discharged by the calls made upon the existing members, a contention was raised on their part, that inasmuch as many of them had obtained their shares by purchase, there ought to be an adjustment between the transferors and transferees; and in point of fact the official liquidator made an order requiring these transferors as past members to recoup the existing members to the extent of the liabilities subsisting at the date of the respective transfers. The Vice-Warden held, and, in the result, we think rightly, that whatever might be the liabilities of these past members to creditors, they were not under any such adjustive liability to the present members.

So far as the liability of its shareholders to creditors is concerned, a cost-book mining company is very much like a common partnership, and accordingly a shareholder under a liability to a creditor of the mine does not shake it off by transferring his shares. When we turn to the relative rights of transferors and transferees, there is a divergence from the partnership analogy. The mining shares are perpetually being bought and sold, and pass from person to person like the shares in railway and other companies. Of course shares in any company may pass from one man to another subject to any stipulations which the buyer and seller choose to make; but the reasonable and most convenient arrangement, and that which is always understood in the absence of express statement to the contrary, is that the buyer takes the shares as they stand, accepts as between himself and the seller the existing liabilities, and is entitled to the prospective emoluments. The provisions of the Act of 1862 relating to the liability of past members are unhappily phrased, but on an attentive consideration they appear, as would reasonably be the case, not to contemplate or in any way include any question between transferors and transferees such as that raised in this Budnick Consols case. As to companies formed under the Act the liability of past members is governed by section 38, which enacts that present and past members shall be liable to contribute to the assets of the company, for the payment of its debts, &c., or for the adjustment of the rights of contributories inter se, but that no past member shall be liable to contribute to the assets at all unless he has been a member within one year of the winding up. Now, these words, "adjustment of the rights of contributories inter se," seem to have led to a misapprehension of the meaning of this provision. They seem to have been regarded by these shareholders and their official liquidator as enacting by implication that, within the year, there should be this liability to recoup transferees. A little consideration will show that they never could mean anything of the kind. The real meaning of the section is that, first of all, class A., the present shareholders, are to be called on, and if they cannot pay all the debts, or if, after class A. have paid the debts, more money is wanted to adjust and equalise matters between the members of class A., inter se, then class B., the past members, may be called upon. The liability (if any) of a transferor to recoup the transferee for existing debts of the concern must always be a matter depending on the particular bargain between those parties, and, as we have said, under the form which the bargain commonly assumes there is no such liability. Even supposing a case in which the buyer had stipulated for such a liability on the part of the seller, we do not see how the seller's liability to the buyer could come within the purview of an official liquidator; the buyer's remedy would rather be a personal one against the seller, to indemnify him against the obligations subsisting at the date of the transfer.

The section governing the case of a mining company winding up under the Act (as this company was being wound up) is the 200th, which enacts that, where an unregistered company is being wound up under the Act, every person shall be deemed a contributory who is liable at law or in equity to pay or contribute to the payment of the debts of the company, or to pay or contribute to the payment of any sum for the adjustment of the rights of the members inter se. The foregoing observations on section 38 apply in the same degree to section 200, but the variation in the phraseology of section 200 makes it additionally plain that the object of the enactments had nothing to do with such an "adjustment" as that contended for in this case. The effect of section 200 as regards cost-book mines is, that where a shareholder, being at the time under liability to creditors of the adventure, transfers his shares, inasmuch as his liability to the creditors is not extinguished by the transfer, he may be called on to contribute to the assets. This was subsequently amended as to mines in the Stannaries District by the 25th section of the Stannaries Act, 1869, which provided that notwithstanding section 200 of the Companies Act, 1862, a former shareholder is not to be liable to contribute unless he had been a shareholder within two years of the winding up. By section 35 transfers to paupers in order to evade liability are declared fraudulent.

There were two other points on which the Vice-Warden expressed himself as willing to hear argument. One was as to the liability of certain past members who, as we understand the case, were present members in respect of other shares. The facts are not stated, but in their absence we conceive that the case of these shareholders does not differ in principle from the general case which we have discussed above. The other point reserved was the liability of two past members who had got rid of their shares by relinquishing them to the company. Here, again, the facts are not given. As to the effect of such relinquishment on the rights of creditors, it was held in Fenn's case (4 De G. M. & G. 285) that where the rules of a cost-book mine provided that a shareholder might, on giving certain notice, relinquish his shares to the company, an adventurer who had relinquished in due form thereby determined his responsibility.

WE NOTICED, at the time of his appointment, that her Majesty's Consul at the Fiji Islands would have to act as arbitrator in the disputes to arise between the British subjects in the islands (13 S. J. 419). As there are now over 2,000 British subjects in Fiji, chiefly engaged in planting coffee and cotton, these disputes are by no means few in number; and, unless the Consul took cognisance of them, they could only be decided by the droit du plus fort. Yet, as the Consul has no magisterial powers, there is nothing to prevent a disputant from setting his authority at defiance and commercial matters being brought to a dead lock. This contingency is the more likely to happen on account of the Consul's instructions having recently been published in the colonial papers. The want of some civilised form of Government is therefore being more and more felt in Fiji, and we are not surprised to learn that a memorial has been sent to the British Government, signed not only by the white settlers, but also by the native chiefs, praying that Fiji may be taken under the protection of the British flag. This is not the first application of the kind that has been made, but, the case being stronger for annexation than it was before, there is a greater chance of the memorial being acceded to, as the cotton-growing capabilities of Fiji are becoming notorious.

THE MEMORANDUM RECENTLY communicated by Count Bernstorff to Earl Granville (which, by the way, is curiously like some similar documents of Mr. Secretary Fish) might have been suspected of being a hoax, so funny is the reasoning employed. The argument is this:—France has been a flagitious aggressor, while Germany entered the war with a righteous cause. England is neutral, but considering the foregoing, and considering that England and Germany were once allies against "Napoleonic aggression," Germany had a right to expect from England that her neutrality, "however strict in form, would at least be benevolent in spirit towards Germany." Count Bernstorff then goes on to explain that by a neutrality strict in form and benevolent in spirit, he understands a neutrality whose spirit should have prompted the bodily movement of restraining the export of rifles, coals, &c., to France. It is the old story: given two combatants and a neutral, each combatant wants the neutral on his own side, and thinks the neutral is not properly discharging his function if he declines to swerve from it. Neutrality is inexorably strict and just, or it ceases to be neutrality; "benevolent neutrality" is an absurd expression if the benevolence is to be one-sided. It is an accepted axiom of international law that a neutral power is not required or expected to interfere by her own municipal law with the trade of her own subjects. If one of the belligerents is able to derive more advantage from that trade than the other, that circumstance has nothing to do with the neutrality; and for the neutral to make it a reason for interference would be to lay herself open to the objection of the first belligerents, that she was making a deviation in favour of the other. The exportation of arms by Prussia to Russia during the Crimean War is a case in point; but an attempt is made to distinguish it. The Crimean war was not a matter of life and death to England, it was waged upon a foreign shore; and, moreover, "public opinion in Germany was very doubtful as to the wisdom of helping a Napoleon to become once more the arbiter of Europe." Such arguments as these require no refutation; neutrality is neutrality, and when a power has elected to be neutral, the policy of the war or its consequences to either belligerent are quite irrelevant to the duties and rights of the neutrality. It is no fault of ours that Prussia does not want our exportations and is not, to use Count Bismarck's phrase, the mistress of the seas, so as to be able to prevent them reaching her enemy, who does want them.

These reasons are quite enough, without reckoning the treaty by which we are bound not to prohibit the exportation of coals to France. We repeat that if "benevolent neutrality" means a neutrality which favours, it means an impossible contradiction; in the possible sense of the phrase, one can hardly conceive a more "benevolent neutrality" than that of the nation which has already furnished nearly £200,000 and countless stores for the relief of the sick and wounded. But if it should turn out that, the German fire having been more deadly than the French, the French patients have outnumbered the German ones, will Count Bernstorff complain of our benevolence as unjust towards Germany?

SINCE OUR REMARKS of last week were printed we have received a prospectus of the "Court of Reference" scheme to which we alluded, from which we learn that the promoter is a Mr. J. T. N. Burnand, solicitor, who a few years ago started another joint stock justice company (limited) in the shape of "Burnand's Law Monetary and Adjustment Association (Limited);" capital £2,000 in 2,000 shares of £1 each, of which eight were taken up by Mr. Burnand and seven co-promoters. We never heard anything more of the association.

MR. EDMOND BEALES has been appointed a county court judge. He lost his revising barristership, not because anyone in office suspected that his violent political bias would betray him into partiality, but because it was felt that the public might, though unjustly, suspect him of a judicial bias, and a judge should not only be, but be believed, impartial. A county court judgeship is different from a revising barrister's place. No one supposes that Mr. Beales will favour Radical suitors unduly. The only objection we have to Mr. Beales as judge of the Cambridge County Court is that we have not much faith in his efficiency. He has been very seldom seen in the Chancery courts of late years, and his Demonstration and League avocations may have encroached upon his law. Moreover a man of Mr. Beales' excitable temperament is hardly the one whom we should have chosen for calm impassive adjudication.

PATENT CASES.

THE PROCEDURE UNDER THE 21 & 22 VICT. C. 27, AND 25 & 26 VICT. C. 42.

NO. I.

The writer is not aware of any work which treats with detail, the practice which has arisen in relation to the trial of patent rights in equity, since the passing of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27 (1858), and the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 42 (1862)—commonly known as Lord Cairns' Act, and Sir John Rolt's Act.

Mr. Coryton's excellent treatise on the "Law of Patents" was published before those Acts, viz., in 1855. Mr. Kerr in his exhaustive treatise on injunctions, devotes portions of a section to the subject; but of course the extent of the ground over which he had to travel in such a work, precluded the possibility of treating that particular subject fully. Considerable information is to be found upon it in a very useful work by Messrs. Jas. Johnson and J. Henry Johnson, on the "Law of Patents," published in 1866; but that work also had a wide range to travel over, and could not be expected to devote much space to a particular branch of practice; and further, some important points have been decided since 1866.

It has been thought, therefore, by the writer, that a somewhat more minute examination of the practice may be useful.

The Acts of 21 & 22 Vict., and 25 & 26 Vict., have effected a complete revolution in the practice as to trying patent rights in equity. Before they were passed, a question of patent right might have been tried by a suit in equity upon affidavits on both sides (as such a suit is now sometimes tried). In practice, however, questions of patent right never were tried in equity, but were always sent to law. The course was, that when a bill was filed for an injunction to restrain infringement of a patent, and notice of motion for an injunction was given, the Court heard the motion upon affidavits. If it appeared to the Court a question of any doubt, whether the patent could be supported, an injunction was not granted, but the motion was ordered to stand over, with liberty to the plaintiff to bring an action at law. If the Court thought there was sufficient ground for granting an injunction, then it was granted only on the terms of the plaintiff bringing an action, and the injunction ultimately followed, in general, the verdict at law.* It is not proposed to treat further of the old practice.

The two Acts referred to have introduced an entirely new practice—viz, that of trying patent rights in equity upon issues; and of receiving oral evidence upon the trial of those issues. The following remarks are exclusively addressed to the routine and details of that new practice.

The suit is commenced now as formerly in the usual manner, by bill; the bill alleges the grant of the letters patent and the filing of a specification, and sets out the material terms of the specification; it alleges that the plaintiff is the first and true inventor, and that the invention is new and useful, &c., &c. It then alleges the facts constituting the infringement (with adequate charges) and any material correspondence which may have taken place; and it prays an injunction and an account; or in the alternative a reference to assess damages; and it may pray, if the case requires it, delivery or destruction of the articles made in infringement of the patent. It is unnecessary further to dilate on the frame of the bill, as that subject falls within the domain of ordinary pleading, and is perfectly familiar to equity counsel.†

The bill being filed, a notice of motion is usually given for an injunction, the motion being of course supported by affidavits on behalf of the plaintiff, and met by counter affidavits on the part of the defendant; and the filing of further affidavits by either side before the motion is heard, follows the general rules of practice upon motions for injunctions.

When the motion comes on to be heard, the old rule as to granting or not granting an injunction is followed, but even with more strictness than under the old practice. It must be at this day a very clear case of good title on the part of the plaintiff, and of infringement on the part of the defendant, to induce the Court to grant an injunction. If the validity of the patent in point of law is denied, and if the objection will at all bear argument; or, if a prima facie case is made by the defence as to facts affecting the validity of the patent or the question of infringement; or, if the patent is a recent date and has never been tried—in all these cases the almost invariable course is, to order the injunction to stand over, till issues have been tried. It has been stated that the usual course is to move for an injunction; but this is not absolutely necessary. If the plaintiff does not require for the conduct of his case to see the defence made by the defendant's affidavits, he may at once, without moving for an injunction or waiting for an answer, move for an order to try issues. The writer is not aware of any case reported on this subject, but he knows that orders of this kind have been made. It must be observed, however, that in the generality of cases, the circumstances render it prudent to move for an injunction, and for this reason; that it may be useful to the plaintiff to see the defendant's affidavits, in order to ascertain the nature of his defence; for the defence may be such as to make it advisable not to proceed further with the suit; as, for instance, the defence may disclose some clear antecedent user of the invention, which would at once dispose of the patent. On the other hand, the defence may be, on its face, one which the plaintiff is adviser cannot be sustained on cross-examination; and then the defendant's case would or might be damaged at the trial, by his witnesses being more or less discredited. Whether, however, to move or not for an injunction as a preliminary step, is so entirely a question for the discretion of counsel, that no specific rule of practice can be said to govern the course to be taken.

If an injunction is applied for, then whatever may be the result, viz., whether the Court simply refuses the injunction or simply grants it, or whether it directs the motion to stand over till after the trial of issues; the usual course of practice is for the Court then to direct issues to be tried under the 21 & 22 Vict.; and the breaches assigned by the plaintiff, and the objections taken by the defendant, are ordered, to be delivered within certain specified times. Usually the plaintiff is ordered to deliver his notice of breaches to the defendant within a week. The defendant is usually allowed a fortnight or more after service of the notice of breaches, to deliver his particulars of objection.

As to the issues.

The issues are usually in the following form, or a form more or less slightly varied therefrom, as the parties may agree or the Court may direct:—

1. Whether, at the date of the letters patent in the plaintiff's bill mentioned, and granted to the plaintiff, the invention for which the same were granted was a new invention within this realm.
2. Whether, at the date of the aforesaid letters patent, the said invention was any manner of new manufacture within the statute in that behalf made and passed.
3. Whether the said (the plaintiff) the grantee of the aforesaid letters patent, did in the specification in the said bill mentioned particularly describe and ascertain the nature of the aforesaid invention, and in what manner the same is to be performed.
4. Whether the said invention was, at the date of the aforesaid letters patent, of any utility to the public.
5. Whether the defendant has infringed the privileges granted by the said letters patent.

If there is any doubt on the part of the defendant, whether the plaintiff was himself the real inventor, there should be an additional issue, to try whether he was at the date of the patent "the first and true inventor."

If the parties agree upon the issues, the Court will at once make the order for trial of those issues. If the parties differ, the Court either itself directs what issues are to be tried, or refers it to chambers to settle the issues.

A very eminent judge has expressed an opinion that so many issues are useless; and that two issues, viz., whether the plaintiff's patent is valid, and whether the defendant has infringed it, meet all the requirements of the trial. The writer ventures, however, to submit that though such a form of issues may be sufficient where they are tried before the judge without a jury, yet, that where there is a jury, the jury might be much more embarrassed in separating the law and the facts upon the single issue of validity, than they would be where there are several issues of fact. At any rate the practice is to have several issues.

The Court may, instead of directing issues to be tried in equity, send issues to law. But it must be a strong case as to inconvenience in trying the case in equity, that will entitle the judge to do so. In a case where there appeared no special reason why the issues should be sent to law, and the Vice-Chancellor had directed issues at law, the Lord Chancellor reversed the order, and directed the issues to be tried in equity (Young v. Fennie, 1 De G. J. & S. 353). And the usual practice undoubtedly is now, for the Court to accept the jurisdiction cast upon it by the statute of 25 & 26 Vict.

* See on this Drewry on Injunctions, and Coryton on the Law of Patents.

† The bill may pray both an account and damages; as an inquiry may in a special case be directed back for an account of profits and damages (Betts v. De Vitre, 11 Jur. N. S. 217). As to destruction, the Court will exercise a discretion, and in a case where the patent was for a combination, so that the defendant might lawfully use the parts separately, though he could not use them combined, the Court refused an order for destruction of the machines made in infringement; but gave the plaintiff an order to mark the machines (Needham v. Oxley, 8 L. T. N. S. 604).

A defendant who has answered, will not be allowed after issues directed, to add another totally new issue of fact; the proper course is to raise the new issue by a supplemental answer (Morgan v. Fuller, 2 L. R. Eq. 296). The Court will allow an issue to try the question whether there is a substantial difference between the complete specification and the provisional, following the plea of non concessit at law; the form of the issue so ordered is, "whether her Majesty the Queen did grant letters patent dated the — for the alleged invention as described and claimed in the specification of the letters patent granted to the plaintiff for (the title of the invention) (Needham v. Oxley, 11 W. R. 745).

When the defendant holds a licence from the plaintiff, and is doing that which is alleged to be an infringement, without complying with the terms of the licence, then, as the defendant is estopped by his licence from denying the validity of the patent, the single issue of infringement will be directed (Trotman v. Wood, 16 C. B. N. S. 479; and Torr v. Bringer, Jan. 16, 1867, before Vice-Chancellor Wood). But it would seem from the case of Trotman v. Wood that though the defendant (the licensee), in admitting the validity of the patent, must impliedly admit novelty; yet, if the specification is capable of more than one construction, the Court will look at evidence of the state of public knowledge at the date of the patent, not with a view of disproving novelty, but for the purpose of putting that construction, if possible, upon the specification, which would support the patent, rather than that construction which would avoid it.

As to notice of breaches.

The particulars of breaches to be delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant are in general, of necessity, simple, consisting of a statement that the defendant has infringed the whole, or a part, as the case may be, of the plaintiff's invention, and stating sometimes when and where. A precedent may, however, be useful, and the following forms of particulars of breaches are substantially the forms used in two cases which were tried, one a mechanical, the other a chemical case. In the mechanical case they were as follows:—

"The breaches complained of by the plaintiff are as follows:—

"The making, using, and vending by the defendants of so much of the invention (of the plaintiff) in the bill in this cause mentioned as is claimed in the first claim contained in the complete specification of the invention of the (plaintiff) in the bill referred to, and which is described in such parts of the said specification relating to the subject of the said first claim as are comprised between the lines (stating the part of the specification), and in the drawings annexed to such specification to which such descriptive parts of the said specification refers."

In the chemical case, where the invention was of a process, the particulars of breaches were as follows:—

"That the defendant did at divers times in and before the month of (), in the year (), that is to say on the () of () and &c., &c., make, use, and sell (or make or use or sell, as the case may be), within the realm, considerable quantities of () made according to the process described in the specifications of the letters patent granted to () in the pleadings of this cause mentioned; or made according to some process being a colourable imitation of the said process described in the said specification, and being an infringement of the said letters patent."

The specific charges in the particulars of breaches, will, of course, depend on the particular facts ascertained. If the defendant is not satisfied with the particulars of breaches, he moves the Court, upon notice, for further and better particulars (unless, as is sometimes done, the order for the trial of issues has provided that if the parties differ upon the breaches and objections they should be settled in chambers). The Court, in the one case, or the chief clerk in the other, will decide whether the notice of breaches is sufficient, or in what matter it is insufficient, and will decree further and better particulars of breaches.

As to the defendant's particulars of objections.

The defendant's particulars of objections must state distinctly what are the grounds on which he contends, and is prepared to prove that the plaintiff is not entitled to relief. The broad grounds most usually alleged are that the invention is not useful; that it is not new; that it is not a new manufacture—sometimes in addition, that the provisional specification does not disclose an invention properly the subject of a patent; and that the patentee has not explained in his complete specification the nature of the invention and how it is to be performed. It would be useless to give any specific form of particulars of objection, as they must obviously vary according to the matters which the defendant believes he can prove. But, whatever they are, the defendant is in general bound by them; and he will not be allowed, on the trial of the issues, to bring forward evidence not founded upon the particulars, for that would be a surprise upon the plaintiff. At the same time, if such evidence not based on the particulars is really important, the Court will not wholly and finally shut it out (if the issues are tried without a jury), but will postpone the further hearing of the trial, and give the defendant leave to move that he may be at liberty to serve further and better particulars (Renard v. Levinstein, 13 W. R. 229, and Dav v. Eley, 14 W. R. 48, 1 L. R. Eq. 38). If the plaintiff is dissatisfied with the defendant's particulars of objections, he moves the Court that the defendant may deliver further and better objections; upon hearing such motion, the Court will express its opinion as to the insufficiency, and in what it consists, and make an order for the delivery of further and better objections.

The most common grounds of insufficiency in the particulars of objection arise where the novelty of the invention is disputed; and on this point it may be stated as a broad rule that, if the defendant objects that the invention is not new, he must state distinctly and specifically the facts and matters on which the objection is founded, so as to enable the plaintiff to ascertain by inquiry how far these facts and matters are true. If the defendant, for instance, objects that the invention has been used before the date of the patent, it is not enough to state that fact broadly; for then the plaintiff would have no means of obtaining information to meet it, and at the trial the evidence or some of it would come upon him as a surprise. Where, therefore, the defendant objects prior user, he must state specifically where and when and by whom, the user has taken place. It is not in general sufficient, for instance, to say that the invention was used "by divers manufacturers" or "by A., B. and C. and others." It must be stated as a general rule (unless under peculiar circumstances) by what manufacturers by name, and when, and where. So, if the allegation is that the invention has been published in books or prior specifications, the particulars of objection should give the titles of the books and the particular volume; and the titles, numbers and dates of the specifications; for the plaintiff is not to be put upon a general search through an encyclopædia, or a scientific journal, or the whole registry of patents (see on this point Curtis v. Platt 8 L. T. N. S. 657).

In a case, however, of Penn v. Bibby (1 L. R. Eq. 568), the objections stated prior user by A., B. and C. "amongst others," and the Court permitted the words to remain, that the defendant might have the opportunity of applying before the trial of issues, for leave to give particulars of other persons using the invention, if he should find any; expressing at the same time disapprobation of the general use of such terms. It is probable that there were special circumstances in that case, as it was heard before the same judge who had decided Curtis v. Platt, supra, and that case was cited.

The course taken by the Court in Curtis v. Platt—which was one of the earliest cases upon the new practice—affords a practical illustration of what is sufficient, and what is insufficient in particulars of objections. In that case, the particulars of objections first delivered by the defendants, were shortly to the following effect:—That the parts of the invention claimed by the plaintiffs in the first and second claims were anticipated by certain patents (naming them), and by machines made prior to the date of the patent by cotton spinners and others carrying on business at Manchester and in other manufacturing towns, &c. And that the invention contained in the third claim had been anticipated by patents granted to A., B. and C. (naming them), and to various other persons, and by machines used by cotton spinners and others carrying on business at Manchester and in other manufacturing towns, &c. On a motion for further and better particulars, the Court expressed its opinion, that this was insufficient, and pointed out in what it was insufficient, and directed further and better particulars. In such further and better particulars, the defendant set out the names of the several patentees, and the dates and numbers of their specifications; also the names of the persons alleged to have anticipated the invention in manufacturing, and where they had anticipated it; but the particulars did not give the dates when the machines had been used; and they also stated that the invention had been published in "various books, drawings, designs, treatises, and works," &c. These particulars were again objected to upon a further motion, and the Court required the defendants to give further information; and, ultimately, the particulars contained the dates of alleged manufacture as well as the names and addresses, and the titles of the works referred to, and the volumes and pages.

Trial of issues.

The conduct of the trial itself, is formed upon the model of a trial at Nisi Prius, whether there be a jury or not. The plaintiff's leading counsel opens the case; his junior or juniors do not argue; the plaintiff's counsel then examine their witnesses-in-chief; the defendant's counsel cross-examine, and the plaintiff's counsel re-examine; on the close of that evidence, the corresponding course is pursued by the defendant's counsel, with this exception—that at the close of the defendant's evidence, one of his counsel sums up the evidence (as it is technically called). In fact, he is allowed to argue the defendant's case; and then the plaintiff's leading counsel replies, and that ends the trial. If there is no jury, the judge finds upon the issues; if there is a question of law, the judge either decides it then, or he may postpone it till the hearing of the cause. If there is a jury, the judge will direct them as to the point of law, if it is such as to form an element in their view of the facts, or he may reserve it to the hearing, at his discretion. In general, of course, each party should complete his evidence on the hearing of his case. But in a case upon a trial of issues (without a jury) where there was an issue of novelty, and the plaintiff having closed his evidence, the defendant put in evidence of want of novelty, the plaintiff was allowed to call fresh evidence to rebut the evidence of want of novelty. But after the plaintiff's evidence in reply had been so given, the defendant was not allowed to bring in fresh evidence (Penn v. Jack, 2 L. R. Eq. 314).

The cause is usually put in the paper to be heard immediately, or as soon as may be, after the finding upon the issues. It is hardly necessary to say that the decrees will generally follow the verdict of the jury or the finding of the judge, unless there is some special equity to be decided or a point of law reserved. But if either party desires to appeal, the Court will postpone the hearing of the cause till after the appeal is heard. On the hearing of the cause, either on the equities or on a point of law reserved, the usual course of hearing equity causes is pursued; junior as well as senior counsel on both sides being heard.

LEGISLATION OF THE YEAR.

CAP. XXIII.—An Act to abolish forfeitures for treason and felony, and to otherwise amend the law relating thereto.

The object of this statute, in addition to the abolition of forfeiture for treason and felony, is to render conviction for those crimes a disqualification for public offices, to make those guilty of treason and felony liable to pay the costs of their own prosecution, and in cases of felony to pay compensation for property injured by the felony. The statute also provides a new machinery for the management of the property of "convicts" as therein defined. The Act deals solely with the crimes of treason and felony, and contains no provision with respect to misdemeanours.

By section 1 there shall be no attainder, corruption of blood, forfeiture, or escheat for treason, felony, or felo de se, but the law of forfeiture consequent upon outlawry is not affected. By section 2, if any person convicted of treason or felony and sentenced to death or penal servitude, or any term of imprisonment with hard labour, or exceeding twelve months, shall hold any public office, civil, military, or naval, &c., &c., or shall be entitled to any pension, &c., &c., such office, &c., shall become vacant, and such pension shall cease unless such person shall receive a free pardon as there specified, and such person shall continue (until he has suffered his punishment or been pardoned) incapable of holding any public office, &c., &c., or of being elected or sitting in Parliament, or of exercising any right of parliamentary or municipal franchise. This section, therefore, provides that those convicted of, at all events, the most serious crimes, shall not be entitled to continue in public employment; and the latter part of the section provides for such a case as that of the convict O'Donovan Rossa, who was elected member for the county of Tipperary last year. It will be remembered that Rossa had been convicted under the Treason Felony Act (11 Vict. c. 12), but he was not attainted (see 54 Geo. 3, c. 145), and there was much discussion at the time as to whether Rossa was capable of being elected a member. The House of Commons resolved that he was incapable of being elected. This resolution was based, however, on the somewhat vague "law of Parliament," as it is sometimes termed, and not on any statute or well-known rule of law. O'Donovan Rossa is now incapable of being elected by this section.

Persons convicted of treason or felony may be condemned to pay the costs of their prosecution (section 3), and after the conviction of any person for felony, and on the application of any person aggrieved, the court may award any sum of money not exceeding £100 "by way of compensation for any loss of property suffered by the applicant by means of the felony." The word forfeiture in the Act is not to include any fine or penalty imposed upon a convict by his sentence (section 5).

Sections 6—30 deal with the property of "convicts" as defined in section 6—i.e., of persons against whom judgment of death or penal servitude shall have been pronounced or recorded. This definition in section 6 is to apply to "the expression 'convict,' as hereinafter used." In section 5 the word "convict" is used, and there it appears to mean any person convicted of treason or felony. This is one of many instances of carelessness in drawing this statute. When a convict dies, becomes bankrupt, has suffered his punishment, or been pardoned, he ceases to be subject to this portion of the statute (section 7). There are no provisions regulating the status and disabilities (if any) of a convict while undergoing his imprisonment after he has been declared bankrupt, and this omission may be productive of curious results. A convict cannot bring any action, alienate property, or make a contract (section 8) except during the time when he shall be lawfully at large under any licence (section 30). The Crown has power (section 9) to appoint administrators for the management of the property of convicts, and upon such appointment all the convict's property, including choses in action, shall vest in such administrator (section 10), and the instrument appointing the administrator may provide for his remuneration out of the convict's property (section 11). Sections 12—20 deal with the powers and duties of an administrator. He has absolute power to let, sell, and otherwise deal with the property (section 12), out of which he may pay the costs of the convict's prosecution, if the convict is condemned to pay them, and of his defence and the expenses of carrying this Act into execution (section 13); also the debts and liabilities of the convict, whether established in due course of law or otherwise (section 14) and he may make compensation out of the property to persons defrauded by the criminal acts of the convict, provided that nothing in the Act shall take away any right or remedy to which any person alleging himself to have suffered such loss would have been entitled if the Act had not passed (section 15). By section 16 the administrator may make allowances for the relatives of the convict, or for the convict himself while at large under a licence. All these powers may be exercised by the administrator in such order of priority as to him shall seem fit, and the propriety of his acts shall not be afterwards called in question (section 17). By section 18, subject to these provisions, the convict's property shall be preserved for him, or his representatives if he dies, until he ceases to be under the operation of the Act as provided in section 7. Sections 19 and 20 provide that administrators shall only be liable for property which actually comes to their hands, and that they shall have the costs of actions brought against them with reference to the convict's property.

There is no provision amongst these sections respecting the bringing of actions by or against administrators, except that section 20 provides for costs in actions against them, and section 26 that proceedings by or against an interim curator are to be continued against an administrator if one is appointed. It seems that administrators must have power to sue for a convict, as the convict's choses in action are vested in the administrator. But in whose name is an administrator to sue? In the convict's name or in his own, or does he sue as administrators of a deceased person sue? How are the costs to be paid? Again, actions may be brought against a convict, and the judgments executed against the convict's property in the hands of the administrator, as is clear from the latter part of section 15 and also section 27, which we shall presently notice. Are administrators bound or entitled to defend, or to pay the costs of defending such actions? The convict cannot. So also, if an action is successfully brought against an administrator with reference to the convict's property, is the administrator liable out of his own property or only to the extent of the convict's property in his hands? These are not merely speculative questions; they must arise whenever actions are brought by or against administrators or against convicts. The inexcusable carelessness of the drawing of the statute becomes more apparent when we find that these very points are noticed when the powers of an interim curator are dealt with under the later sections of the Act.

By sections 21 and 22, when no administrator has been appointed, an "interim curator" may be appointed by justices; and by section 23 he may be removed on proper cause shown to justices. Section 24 describes the powers of an interim curator, which are much less extensive than those of an administrator. He has power to sue in his own name for the recovery of any property in respect of which he has been appointed, or for damages in respect of injury thereto, and to defend in his own name, as such interim curator, any action against the convict or against himself, to receive dividends and give discharges, to pay the convict's debts, and generally to manage the convict's property, to make allowances to the convict's relatives if authorised by the justices, and to reimburse himself for costs and charges, &c. The personal property of the convict may be sold by order of the justices (section 25), and, if an administrator is appointed, legal proceedings by or against the interim curator are not to abate, but are to be continued by or against such administrator (section 26). By section 27 judgments recovered against a convict may be executed against the convict's property in the hands of the interim curator or administrator. This seems to be the result of the section, which is most curiously worded. By section 28 an interim curator or an administrator may be called on to account for the property at any time by the persons therein mentioned; and by section 29, after the convict has ceased to be under the operation of the statute, the interim curator or the administrator shall be accountable to the convict, to whom the property then reverts. Property acquired by the convict while at large is not subject to the Act (section 30). Section 31 puts an end to the barbarous accompaniments of punishment for treason, and abolishes the drawing, beheading, and quartering of traitors. The Act applies only to England and Ireland.

We have noticed already several places in which great want of care has been displayed in this statute. It may be said that these are questions of detail, but they are questions which cause great uncertainty in the working of the law, and consequently much litigation, and it is this kind of legislation that renders necessary the disgraceful series of amending Acts which always follows a statute containing any important alterations in the law. We do not see how this statute can be worked without either an explanatory Act or much litigation. Not only, however, have these matters of detail been neglected but the whole scope of the statute is an instance of the worst kind of piecemeal legislation. As we have not much space at our disposal we will confine our remarks to a single section—viz., section 4, by which compensation not exceeding £100 may be awarded to a person aggrieved by a felony as compensation for loss of property. Why should compensation be restricted to cases of felony? A loss of property caused by a misdemeanor is just as deserving of compensation as one caused by a felony. Again, why (in extending the principle of section 100 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96 and section 9 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35) should the amount of compensation be limited to £100 and why should the compensation be only for loss of property? To most persons personal injury is more grievous than injury to their property and it deserves at least as summary a remedy. It is not too much to say that the statute is badly conceived and badly drawn, and the only idea that is carried out thoroughly is the abolition of attainder, forfeiture, and escheat in treason and felony, and this is done in the first section.

CAP. XXVIII.—An Act to amend the law relating to the remuneration of attorneys and solicitors.

For very many years past efforts have been made from time to time at the discovery of, as Lord Longdale phrased it, "more improved modes of remunerating solicitors, by which the remuneration may on every occasion be adequate to the real and just value of the important services which are rendered." In computing what a worker is to receive you may estimate either the labour and cost of the work done or the value to the employer, or both. In general traffic, not bounded by restrictions, there obtains in practice some compromise between these two, partaking more of the former or the latter according as the demand falls below or above the supply. It has been the disadvantage of the plan of paying solicitors according to mere length of time or length of documents, and so forth, that it did not necessarily involve any relation to either.

As the damages which a solicitor might have to pay if a charge of culpable negligence were substantiated against him would be proportioned to the value of the subject-matter, there is something to be said for the proposal which has been made in past times of adjusting the remuneration to an ad valorem scale. Such a scale might sometimes be feasible in matters like conveyancing, but it could scarcely be generally workable. The present measure does not touch on anything of the kind, except in so far as it permits the taxing officer to have regard to the "responsibility" involved. The system of remuneration having hitherto no relation to the "skill, labour, and responsibility" involved; and the solicitor, being forbidden to remedy this on his side by any special arrangement between himself and the client (though as against the solicitor such an arrangement might be used in limitation of a claim for work done), the main scope of this Act comprises two enactments. One, which engrosses the first fifteen sections, legalises agreements between solicitor and client as to the remuneration of the solicitor; the other, the best and by far the most important part of the whole Act, is comprised in a single section, and provides that taxing masters shall in future have regard to "skill, labour, and responsibility." Six years ago Lord Westbury introduced a bill dealing with the same subject. We then expressed the opinion, to which we still adhere, that so far as special agreements between solicitor and client are concerned there is a wide distinction between litigious and non-litigious business. Whatever might be said in favour of such arrangements where mere conveyancing work, for instance, is to be done, we do not consider that the payment of a solicitor for conducting actual litigation can conveniently be relegated to special agreement. The Legislature, however, has thought differently, and we must look to see what will come of the permission they have extended to both classes of business.

By section 4 the practitioner may agree with his client for the payment of any past or future services, either by a salary, commission, or a gross sum, or otherwise. By an amendment, applying only to litigious business, which Lord Chelmsford added to this section, the solicitor is not to receive the stipulated payment till the agreement has been examined and allowed by a taxing officer, who has power to send it before a judge, who in turn may, if he thinks fit, reduce the amount or remit the solicitor to his ordinary costs. This seems to us an inconvenient appendage, likely to inflict expense and delay on solicitor and client. The Legislature, in introducing these permissive agreements as to litigious business, has done an inexpedient thing, and has attempted to neutralise the inexpediency by this provision. It characterises the difficulty of the matter, and is likely to diminish the number of transactions under the permission.

Section 5 provides (as, of course, is just) that the agreement shall not affect the costs payable by or to the client from a third person. To this was added in the passage of the bill through the Legislature a proviso that no such third party shall be required to pay the client more than the sum payable by the latter under the agreement. This proviso is, of course, intended to prevent a litigious client from making a profit of his litigation. Some litigation will probably be necessary before the application of this section is settled, as to cases of set-off and cases akin to that of Galloway v. Mayor, &c., of London (15 W. R. 1032), in which the solicitor is paid by salary.

Section 7 prohibits the solicitor from contracting himself out of his liability for negligence.

Sections 8—10 provide that agreements are to be enforced or set aside, not by action or suit, but by motion or petition, with power to the Court (as before) to reduce the sum stipulated or cancel the agreements; there is also power to the Court (following the analogy of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act as to taxation of costs after payment), to re-open agreements twelve months after payment. This latter proviso is devised in favour of a client who proves to have paid too much (however that is to be estimated), but there is no corresponding provision in favour of a solicitor who proves to have received too little. The second part of section 10 (rather unnecessarily) repeats with special reference to trustees the above-mentioned provision as to allowance by taxing-officer before payment.

Sections 11 and 12 reserve the existing restrictions on purchases by solicitors of their client's interest and on dispositions invalid as in contravention of bankruptcy law.

Sections 13 and 14 deal with cases in which, pending the transaction of the business which is the subject of an agreement, a change of solicitor takes place. If the solicitor dies or become incapable to act the Court may deal with the agreement just as if no such event had happened, and the taxing officer may assess such payment as he considers reasonable, having regard to the agreement and the stage of performance. If the client changes his solicitor, the latter is to be considered as having become "incapable to act" within the meaning of the above.

Such are the provisions of the Act as to special agreements. As to the other of the two main objects of the Act, the 18th section, which is worth all the rest put together, enacts that taxing officers may in future have regard to skill, labour, and responsibility. If this discretion is reasonably and fairly carried out neither clients nor practitioners need ever resort to special agreements.

A very few provisions remain to be noticed. Section 16 abolishes an old prohibition, which bore very unjustly on solicitors, restraining them from taking security for future costs. Section 17 enacts that, subject to future general orders, &c., taxing officers may allow interest on disbursements out of pocket or sums improperly retained. By section 19 any person interested under an order for payment of costs in a suit may revive the suit when abated, and prosecute the order, while, by section 20, attorneys and solicitors may perform the work of proctors and make the same charges as proctors would have been entitled to make. Having regard to section 4, it would appear that special agreement as to services to be rendered in this capacity is not within its sanction.

We have not entered upon verbal criticism of the Act; we have not space now for that. Many applications to the Court will be necessary before there can be any reasonable certainty as to the practice under and construction of the agreements part of the Act. A very wide discretion is left to the Court and its officers; if this is not very judiciously exercised, this part of the Act will be impracticable. Under any circumstances we cannot imagine solicitors as likely to resort to such preliminary stipulations, except in the already existing case of salaried solicitors to corporate bodies, and perhaps a few exceptional instances in which a commercial or landowning client has work to be done on a large scale. We can hardly think that the stipulation will ever emanate from the solicitor's side. The important part of the Act is the "skill, labour, and responsibility" section. If this is fairly and discreetly interpreted, as the interest of the public and the profession demands, a great boon will have been bestowed. From the permission to make agreements we do not anticipate much except vexation to each party.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

"BUILDINGS," MEANING OF THE TERM.

Bones v. Law, V.C.J., 18 W. R. 640.

The precise meaning of a covenant that no buildings shall be erected on a particular plot of ground must always depend upon the intention of the parties to be gathered from the context. In Bones v. Law, where the covenant was that no buildings, except dwelling-houses not to cost less than £200, should be erected on the opposite side of the road, and there was an agreement to make a permanent fence around the land from four to seven feet high, it was held that the building a wall round the land to the height of eight feet six inches was not a breach, as coming within the definition of a permanent fence, but that the building a wall to the height of eleven feet was.

In Child v. Douglas (2 W. R. 701, Kay 560) the word "building" was held to apply to the erection of a wall rising to some fifteen feet. Vice-Chancellor Wood, however (2 W. R. 461), was satisfied that a wall two feet high with an iron railing upon it would not have been a building, at all events such a building as the Court would interfere with. The Vice-Chancellor inclined to think that a covenant to repair buildings would include the repairing of a garden wall.

What is a "building" as a qualification to vote is defined in Harris v. Amery (14 W. R. 199).

3 & 4 WILL. 4, c. 27, s. 28—ACKNOWLEDGMENT BY JOINT MORTGAGEES.

Richardson v. Young, V.C.M., 18 W. R. 800.

By the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 28, the mortgagor is barred at the end of twenty years from the time of taking possession, or from the last written acknowledgment; and where there shall be more than one mortgagor, such acknowledgment, if given to any of such mortgagees or their agent, shall be effectual. Where, however, there shall be more than one mortgagee, the same section provides that such acknowledgment signed by one or more of such mortgagees, shall be effectual only as against the party or parties signing. The latter provision, according to this decision, applies only where the mortgagees are tenants in common, and not in the case of joint tenants, at all events where such joint tenants are expressed to be trustees. In the latter case, if the present decision be sound, as to which we offer no opinion, an acknowledgment by less than all the mortgagees will be inoperative. The Vice-Chancellor viewed the case of joint mortgagees as a casus omissus from the statute. The other question in the case was one of some importance, whether an acknowledgment of the mortgage, as a subsisting security, could be made out from certain passages in one of the mortgagee's letters to the mortgagor. The references to the mortgage in these passages, as will be seen from the report in the Weekly Reporter, were vague enough. The Vice-Chancellor, however, would have felt himself bound upon the authorities to decide that there was a sufficient acknowledgment but for the conclusion already adverted to, that no acknowledgment by less than all, where the mortgagees are joint tenants, will be sufficient. The Court has certainly gone somewhat far in its interpretation of what constitutes an acknowledgment, no doubt out of the feeling as to hardship which so often arises where statutes of limitation are relied on in bar of an otherwise authenticated claim. In the leading case of Stansfield v. Hobson (1 W. R. 27, 3 D. M. G. 620), more than twenty years after the mortgagee entered into possession, the mortgagor's solicitor wrote to the mortgagee to know when he could see the mortgagee upon the subject of the mortgage. The reply to the letter was—"I do not see the use of a meeting unless someone is ready with the money to pay me off," and these words were held a sufficient acknowledgment to take the case out of the statute. A similar conclusion was come to in Trulock v. Robey (12 Sim. 402), where the mortgagee in possession wrote, "Concerning the business at Hendred, which you know nearly as well as myself, as there has been nothing kept from you, which I am very willing to settle if your granddaughter is of age," from which ambiguous and ungrammatical effusion the Court inferred an acknowledgment by the mortgagee, giving the mortgagor the right to redeem after upwards of twenty years. The mortgagee in possession ought clearly to remember what he is about before he puts pen to paper in a correspondence with a mortgagor, though he may indulge himself in as many admissions as he pleases of the mortgagor's title to redeem when addressed to third parties, and they cannot be used against him. "Why the mortgagee should not be allowed to make an admission in writing, signed by himself, of his mortgage title to a third person, of which the mortgagor may have the benefit, I do not know; but the statute requires that the admission should be made to the mortgagor himself" (Batchelor v. Middleton, 6 Ha. 75). Before the Act which requires the acknowledgment to be written, the Court admitted, but with hesitation, parol evidence to found a right to redeem after twenty years' possession, such right resting on the original contract, which was necessarily in writing (Reeks v. Postlethwaite, G. Coop. 164).

LIABILITY OF PERSONS WHO SUBSCRIBE THE MEMORANDUM OF ASSOCIATION.

Hall's case, M.R., 18 W. R. 818.

It is not competent for an extraordinary general meeting of a company to release persons from liability in respect of shares for which they have subscribed the memorandum of association. It was held in Evans's case (15 W. R. 243) that the substantial liability thus incurred can only be got rid of by transfer and substitution of another owner; or, since Snell's case (18 W. R. 30), a decision of the Lord Justice Giffard, by surrender of the shares subscribed for, in cases where the directors are empowered by the articles of association to accept surrenders of shares by any shareholders desirous of surrendering them on such terms as the directors may think fit, whether the names have been entered on the register of members or not being, according to the same decision, immaterial. We have always thought Snell's case a very strong decision, but it is that of a Court of Appeal. In Hall's case, however, the deed executed was in terms a release from all liability, and an abandonment of profits. It could not be twisted into a surrender, and thus brought within Snell's case, as was attempted to be done. It is not probable that it was the intention of the Legislature that persons who subscribe the memorandum and hold out their names to the public should be enabled by any change in the articles to surrender their shares and cease to have anything further to do with the company, though it has been expressly decided in Snell's case that they may; but it is quite certain that there is no authority in the Act for a transaction like that which was attempted to be carried out in the present instance in, it must be admitted, a most ingenious manner.

COMMON LAW.

LEX LOCI CONTRACTUS—BILL OF EXCHANGE.

Bradlaugh v. De Rin, Ex.Ch., 18 W. R. 931.

Bills of exchange, more frequently than any other instruments, give rise to questions respecting the effect in English courts of foreign contracts and foreign law, and these questions are daily becoming more common with the increasing spread of commerce. One of these questions arose in Bradlaugh v. De Rin, but before noticing the facts and decision of the case it will be well to notice two earlier cases. Trimby v. Vignier (1 Bing. N. C. 151) was an action upon a promissory note made and payable in France, and there indorsed in blank to the plaintiff. The French Commercial Code provides that such an indorsement operates as a "procuration" only and not as a transfer. The Court of Common Pleas, in Trimby v. Vignier, had evidence as to the legal effect of this provision, and they also referred to the code itself, and they decided, first, as a matter of fact, that by the French law the plaintiff could not, in his own name, under such an indorsement, sue the maker of the note; and, secondly, that as a matter of English law, this prevented the plaintiff from maintaining the action in his own name in England. In Lebel v. Tucker (16 W. R. 338) it was held that an indorsee, by a blank indorsement in France, of a bill of exchange drawn, accepted, and payable in England, might sue the acceptor here if the indorsement was valid according to English law although invalid by French law. The ground of the decision was that the acceptor's contract was to pay to any holder claiming under an indorsement valid by English law. In Bradlaugh v. De Rin a bill of exchange was drawn in Brussels upon an English drawee residing in London, who duly accepted it. It was afterwards indorsed in blank in France, and the indorsee sued the acceptor here. If the bill required an indorsement according to French law, and if an indorsement in blank by that law does not give a right to sue, the plaintiff was clearly not entitled to recover according to Trimbey v. Vignier. It was, however, argued that the acceptor, under the authority of Lebel v. Tucker, was liable, as the indorsement was good by English law. It was decided by the Court of Common Pleas, following Trimbey v. Vignier, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, because an indorsement valid by French law was necessary, and his indorsement was only in blank. Montague Smith, J., dissented, thinking that the decision should have been governed by the principle of Lebel v. Tucker. In commenting upon this decision (ante 13 S. J. p. 27) we endeavored to show that the arguments in favour of the opinion of Montague Smith, J., are of infinitely greater weight than those of the majority of the Court, and we suggested some cases in which the principle of the decision of the majority might lead to endless confusion and great hardship. If, on the other hand, the contract by an English acceptance is to pay to those authorised to demand payment by English indorsements, any holder, after acceptance, has a test to ascertain whether his own or former indorsements confer a good title upon him. If the contrary is to be the law, as decided in Bradlaugh v. De Rin, no indorsee of a bill with several indorsements can know whether he has a good title unless he know not only the facts concerning the indorsements, but also in what countries they were made, and the law of those countries. This might lead to most inconvenient results. What we say has of course reference only to the title and right of action of the indorsee against the acceptor. The obligation created by the contract of indorsement, as distinguished from the title transferred by indorsement, must, in all ordinary cases, be governed by the law of the place where the indorsement is made.

Bradlaugh v. De Rin is now overruled by the Exchequer Chamber on a point not taken in the court below. The Exchequer Chamber have held that, on a true construction of the French code an indorsee by a blank indorsement can sue in his own name in France, and therefore that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed here. This decision overrules Trimbey v. Vignier so far as that case decided anything about French law, but it leaves untouched the principle of Trimbey v. Vignier, viz., that if in such a case the indorsement by the French law had not given the plaintiff a right to sue in his own name, he was not entitled to succeed in an action in England. This decision of the Exchequer Chamber does not deal with the point whether it was necessary that the indorsement should be according to French law. All the Court of Exchequer say is that even if such indorsement be necessary the plaintiff is entitled to recover because the indorsement by French law entitled the plaintiff to sue in his own name. It must therefore not be taken that the Exchequer Chamber approve the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, viz., that the principle of Lebel v. Tucker does not apply in a case like Bradlaugh v. De Rin, although they do not overrule the decision upon that point. For the reasons we have above given we hope that this point will be carefully reconsidered whenever it again requires judicial decision.

Another point which was not discussed in this case might have arisen, viz., whether the fact that the plaintiff could have sued in France in his own name necessarily entitled the plaintiff to sue here. Supposing that by French law the plaintiff had no property whatever in the bill but only a right to sue on it in his own name as agent for the indorser, would the plaintiff be able to sue on the bill here? If yes, would that principle apply to all choses in action? If, for instance, the plaintiff had been appointed in France agent of the indorser to sue for a mere debt due by the defendant to the indorser, and if by French law the plaintiff could have sued in his own name for the debt, could the plaintiff therefore sue here? There might be much difficulty in answering these questions.

COURTS.

STANNARIES.

(Before the VICE-WARDEN.)

Re Budnick Consols Mine.

The following report of the judgment of the VICE-WARDEN in this case is furnished by the Registrar to the Mining Journal, from which publication we extract it:—

This is a case of liquidation, by an order made under the Companies Act, 1862. The order was made not long after the passing of that Act, and relates to a company not formed by incorporation under that Act, but long before it, in the ordinary form of a so-called "cost book mine" company, being a mining partnership or company within part eight of the Act. I do not find that there have been any special written regulations, which distinguished it from cost book companies of the common type. The official liquidator made, as is usual in the courts above, a list with two classes of contributories—class A, of present shareholders, and class B, of past shareholders, who had ceased to be shareholders either by bonâ fide transfer or by relinquishment, according to custom in such mining companies. It so happens that the entire claims of all creditors have been levied by calls on, and wholly paid by, the present shareholders or contributories of class A. It is assumed that the transfers were all made regularly and without fraud. In two cases only the shareholders had retired by resigning their shares to the rest of the company. The great majority of cases were cases of transfer to vendees of their shares. In ordinary cases this would terminate the liquidation, unless an adjustment as between contributories should become necessary.

Now, the question pending before me is in substance this—whether the present shareholders who have paid all the debts have any claim upon past shareholders to be repaid any part of those debts, in respect of expenses of working the mine during the time when the past shareholders actually held the shares, but had not paid, or been called upon to pay or contribute, any share of such expenses. In dealing with unincorporated companies not formed under the Companies Act, 1862, this Court, unfortunately, cannot look for much assistance from any recent decisions of the superior courts, for they almost exclusively relate to companies incorporated and registered under that Act; whereas the number of mining companies that come under the cognisance of the Stannary Court constitute at least two-thirds of the whole number of mining companies in the two western counties.

In Mr. Lindley's useful work the information on this class of companies is necessarily very scanty. The reported cases relating to them are chiefly collected in book i. chap. 5, book ii. chap. 2, book iii. chap. 5, book iv. chap. 3, div. 1, sec. 2. In none of these reported cases (so far as I recollect) are any to be found in which the relative position or equities of present and past shareholders of such companies on a question of adjustment, inter se, have been defined or even discussed.

Under section 200 of the Act, any person who is liable at law or in equity to pay or contribute to the payment of any debt or liability of the company is deemed to be a contributory. Therefore, any existing shareholder who was personally liable as such to a creditor for goods, &c., supplied, became a contributory within this definition when the order to wind up was made; but whether this liability to be a contributory, and so to aid in the payment of debts by subsequent shareholders will continue after the shares have been bonâ fide transferred to others, is another question.

It may be that a creditor not a member of the company may continue to hold a shareholder liable to an action for his debt though the debtor may have got rid of his shares; but it does not follow that a person who has afterwards become a shareholder can hold such past shareholder liable for debts incurred in his time which a solvent company or an official liquidator has called upon the new shareholders to pay. In a common partnership, not dissoluble at will, but only by common assent, such an adjustment is reasonable and proper; but where, as in a company like the present, an unqualified right of transfer is the admitted custom of this sort of partnership, the custom would be nugatory unless the discharge of past shareholders be complete as between him and the future shareholders, or any of them. It is contended that, under section 38 of the Act, past shareholders are contributory if they cease to be members of the company within a year before the winding up, and if the contributories of class A are unable to pay all the claims. By a sort of analogy to this provision it is contended that the like obligation should be incumbent on past shareholders in favour of class A. The answer to this is that, even if section 38 be applicable in this case, present or existing shareholders have, in fact, satisfied all the claims of the creditors; but, in my opinion, section 38 is solely applicable to registered companies formed under the Act.

It is true that the language of sections 199 and 204, part 8, seems strong enough to import into the construction of the Act all winding up provisions contained in the other parts of the Act, whether they relate to registered or unregistered companies; but I conceive that such is not the effect of these sections, which must be taken to relate only to unregistered companies, to which they seem to be in terms confined, and not to companies formed on a different principle; and that part 8 was not designed to alter the existing law of common law companies, whether cost-book companies or not. Upon the whole, there does not appear to me, on the present state of facts, to be any ground by analogy to section 38, or otherwise, to warrant the liquidator in calling upon past shareholders to contribute towards the payment of the calls, by which the liquidator has, in fact, satisfied all the debts of the company out of the pockets of the existing shareholders. This decides, so far as my judgment is concerned, the only point on which the case was originally argued before me in the latter part of last year. At the last sittings, in the present year, the parties appeared before me, with the official liquidator, by whom the principle on which he had founded his so-called "adjustment" was explained. On this occasion I was first informed of some additional facts in respect of some of the shareholders who were called upon to repay those of class A.

In the first place, it appeared that out of the whole number of shareholders who had got rid of their shares all except two disposed of them by transfer to other incoming members, and these two had resigned them to the rest of the company.

What were the terms or conditions of the relinquishments does not appear by any evidence before me. It may possibly turn out that some rights may have been then claimed by the outgoing shareholder against the company, or by the company against the outgoing shareholder, which the rules or customs of this company may have sanctioned; and it is possible that the position of these parties may be thereby altered, and be the foundation of some different form of claim. If not, then I think it makes no difference whether the shares have been parted with by transfer or relinquishment; and my judgment will then apply to both cases indifferently. Another fact also appeared on the last-mentioned occasion which did not appear on the original hearing—that some of the shareholders, who had been so called upon by the liquidator to reimburse the present shareholders in respect of the debts of the company which had been incurred before they became present shareholders, were themselves, and had always continued to be, shareholders, until the order to wind up was made; so that the relative position of past and present shareholders does not exist between them. All were, in fact, present shareholders, though some had been shareholders longer than others. This state of things appears to have been occasioned by the fact that calls had been made by the company before the rest of the existing company had taken shares by transfer, which calls were not sufficient to pay all the then current debts of the company.

The liquidator thought that these shareholders, though they had never ceased to be shareholders, should also be charged with so much of the previous surplus of current expenses which were not covered by their contemporaneous calls—in fact, these later shareholders had been obliged by call of the Court to pay some of the old debts of their co-contributories, and, therefore, thought themselves entitled to indemnity from the shareholders who were of longer standing than themselves.

The practice of making calls far short of their debts is so common among ill-managed companies as to be no surprise to me. The managers like to conceal the extent of their real debts, and prefer relying on the loans of a country banker to alarming their co-adventurers by heavy calls. There ought to be no difficulty, in consequence of this state of things, when the company is under liquidation. The debts, and credits, and property of such a company, whether incorporated or not, pass with the company for better or worse, and with the implied obligations of their members (as between themselves or co-adventurers) to pay off all unpaid debts whensoever incurred.

I do not see how a company of transient shareholders, with transferable shares, can avoid this, or be worked or wound up at all, without submitting to these consequences. It is idle to expect that companies, with shares negotiable ad libitum, are to be treated as if they were ordinary continuing partnerships. The Court is bound at once, after collecting all debts, and all unpaid calls existing at the time of the order, to make new calls on existing shareholders, pro rata in respect of their several constituted shares or interests in the mine; and cannot treat each shareholder differently, according to the time for which he has held his shares, or the relative expense of working during such times; and the amount must depend on a comparison of existing assets with the total unpaid claims of the creditors. Nor is there any hardship in this. A rational man who buys shares in a mine ought to make himself acquainted with the state and prospects of it, and of the existing debts of it; and the local laws of the Stannaries afford some facility for doing this. If he neglects to do this, he has nobody to thank for these unforeseen difficulties or hardships but himself.

As to the two last facts—the occurrence of two cases of relinquishment, and the fact that some twenty shareholders, charged by the liquidator in aid of the rest of the existing shareholders, are themselves also on the list of class A, I think I ought, if required, to hear either of those points regularly argued before the Court, on due notice at next sittings. But, so far as regards the main decision in this matter—the relative rights and obligations of past and present contributories on the matter of adjustment—my judgment is to be regarded as final, except on appeal to the Lord Warden.

In regard to this last-mentioned application, I direct that it may be dismissed, but without costs, and that the costs of the official liquidator be paid out of the assets of the company, as well as the costs of such of the past shareholders as appeared by their solicitors to oppose the present application.

APPOINTMENTS.

MR. EDMOND BEALES, M.A., barrister-at-law, has been appointed a Judge of County Courts (Circuit No. 35) in the place of Mr. John Collyer, deceased. Mr. Beales (who was born on the 3rd July, 1803) is the youngest son of the late Samuel Pickering Beales, of Cambridge, who took part in the reform agitation which led to the passing of the bill of 1832, in conjunction with Attwood, Scholefield, Cobbett, and Hunt. His eldest brother is Mr. Patrick Beales, who is an active member of the Liberal party at Cambridge, and has served as mayor of that borough. The family of Beales have long occupied a very respectable position in the trading community of Cambridge. Mr. E. Beales, the new county court judge, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1825, and M.A. in 1829; he was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in June, 1830. In that year he enrolled himself as a member of the Polish League, and was an active member of the Polish Exiles' Friend Society; he was also one of the original members of the Honorary Association of the Friends of Poland, founded by the Poet Campbell. In 1863 he promoted the organisation of the National League, of which he became president; he likewise held the chairmanship of the Circassian Committee, and was a member of the Emancipation Society. At the period of Garibaldi's visit to England, in 1864, he defended the power of meeting on Primrose-hill, which was interfered with by Sir Richard Mayne. He has, however, been chiefly known as President of the London Reform League, a society established to obtain manhood suffrage and the ballot, but which was dissolved after the passing of a measure of reform. He is principally remembered as taking an active part in the Hyde-park demonstrations of 1866. For some years previous to this he held the office of revising barrister for Westminster, to which he was not re-appointed in 1866, in consequence of the active part he took in political agitation. At the last general election he contested the Tower Hamlets unsuccessfully. The county court circuit to which he has been appointed embraces Cambridgeshire, and parts of Huntingdonshire, Hertfordshire, Bedfordshire, &c.

COUNTY COURT COMMITTALS.

Sir,—The "Debtors Act" enacts the abolition of imprisonment for debt, but permits orders of committal on proof of means "that defendant has or has had since the judgment the means to pay as ordered."

I have always opposed imprisonment for debt as unjust in principle and unfair and unequal in practice, and the fears I entertained that committals under the new Act in the county courts would not be limited to proof of means, are, I regret to say, being realised. Your last paper reports a case before the deputy-judge at Lambeth for the balance of a medical bill of £2 12s. and is headed "Committal to prison with evidence of means to pay." Perusal of the judgment, however, shows that the only means in the case were "defendant's son's means," and after evidence that "defendant had no means and was living with his son who had been keeping house for many months past, as defendant had been out of work," the judge orders a commitment to be stayed by payment of ten shillings a month, remarking "Surely defendant could earn half-a-crown a week somehow or other!"

If this had appeared in any other than a legal paper I should have thought it a hoax, and I trust the defendant will "somehow or other" apply to the Queen's Bench for prohibition.

I am aware that much doubt exists whether a county court order can be considered by a superior court, even upon clear evidence of the absence of "proof of means" in the inferior court, but I am hopeful it may, where the liberty of the subject is in peril; if it cannot, we shall know that the "means" mentioned in the Act is frittered away in practice to the judge's own notion—"that the debt ought to be paid," and that a summary committal order may get it paid "somehow," and that imprisonment for debt is not yet abolished in the county courts.

G. MANLEY WETHERFIELD.

OBITUARY.

MR. A. NORMAN, Q.C.

Mr. Alexander Norman, Q.C. of the Irish bar, died suddenly by the roadside, at Lynton, North Devon (where he had just arrived on a visit), on the 14th September, of disease of the heart. Mr. Norman, who was A.M. at Trinity College, Dublin, was called to the bar in Ireland in Michaelmas Term, 1833, and was appointed a Queen's Counsel on the 26th of May, 1858. He had for some years considerable practice on the North-Western Circuit.

MR. R. C. CHAWNER.

The death of Mr. Richard Croft Chawner, J.P., barrister-at-law, of Abnalls, near Lichfield, took place on the 13th of September, in the sixty-sixth year of his age. He was the seventh and last surviving son of the late Rupert Chawner, Esq., M.D., of Burton-on-Trent, where he was born in the year 1804. He was educated at Repton Grammar School, and afterwards proceeded to Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he graduated LL.B. in 1830. He was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in January, 1839. Mr. Chawner was a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for the county of Stafford, and a magistrate for the city of Lichfield. By his death the Court of Quarter Sessions has lost an able and experienced member; he was a regular attendant on the local bench. He devoted considerable attention to agriculture, and cultivated a model farm at Wall, in the neighbourhood of Lichfield. Of the Staffordshire Agricultural Society he was a warm supporter, and for a number of years he was an active member of the Council of the Birmingham Cattle and Poultry show. He was the first president of the Midland Farmers' Club, and was Chairman of the South Staffordshire Waterworks Company. At the last general election he contested the borough of Stafford in the Liberal interest, but was unsuccessful. At the meeting of the Lichfield magistrates on Thursday week, Mr. Chawner's death was referred to by the justices present, and the clerk was directed to communicate to Mrs. Chawner how deeply they felt the loss of their brother magistrate.

MR. T. DODGE.

Mr. Thomas Dodge, solicitor, of Liverpool, expired at Harrogate, on the 14th September, at the age of fifty-nine years. He was admitted in Michaelmas Term, 1832, and soon afterwards became a partner with Mr. Francis, whose son still carries on the business at Liverpool. Mr. Dodge was a member of the Incorporated Law Society, and of the Liverpool Law Society, also of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association, and of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association. For some years past he had been suffering from dropsy, which eventually carried him off.

MR. W. G. CHAMBERS.

Mr. William George Chambers, a young solicitor in practice in London, died suddenly at Southsea-common, near Portsmouth, on the 9th of September. He was staying there, with his wife and child, for the benefit of his health, and his death was caused by a fit of apoplexy. The late Mr. Chambers, who was only twenty-four years of age, was the only son of Mr. Alderman W. G. Chambers, J.P., of Portsmouth, and was certificated in Trinity Term, 1865; he has since carried on business in Southwark.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The news of each day bringing, at any rate, nothing adverse to the hopes of peace, the markets have been slowly creeping upwards and regaining strength. Railways have continued the improvement of last week. In the foreign market there is not much alteration, except a fractional improvement in Portuguese and a few other descriptions. There is now no demand for discount at the 3 per cent. to which last week saw the Bank rate reduced, and this week not having brought any further reduction, it is thought that there will now be no alteration till the October dividends fall due.

The Solicitors' Journal.

LONDON, OCTOBER 1, 1870.

THE METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW SOCIETY'S list * of suggested subjects for papers to be read at their forthcoming annual provincial meeting, which takes place at Bristol, beginning on the 11th of October, has already elicited a good deal of matter, including nearly all the topics embraced in the list.

The following contributions have been already announced to the secretary, and more will probably come in:—

1. On the High Court of Justice Bill (Paper); by Mr. W. A. Jevons, of Liverpool.
2. On County Courts Jurisdiction and Practice (Paper); by Mr. M. S. Mosely, of Bristol.
3. On Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration Act (Paper); by Mr. E. Bromley, of London.
4. On Taxation of Party and Party Costs (Paper); by Mr. R. B. Lowndes, of London.
5. On Project for Law University (Address); by Mr. J. M. Clabon, of London.
6. On Plans for New Courts of Justice (uncertain) (Address); by Mr. E. W. Field, of London.
7. On Law of Primogeniture (Paper); by Mr. T. M. Croome, of Cainscross, near Stroud.
8. On the Transfer of Land Bill (Paper); by Mr. G. J. Johnson, of Birmingham.
9. The Legislative Results of Last Session (Paper) by Mr. Philip Rickman, the Secretary.

We are particularly glad to see that Mr. Edward Bromley is going to deal with the Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration Act. Six years ago Mr. Bromley read, at a meeting of the same society, held at Leeds, a very able paper on the subject of attorneys and solicitors' remuneration, apropos of a bill of Lord Westbury's then before the Legislature. That bill, as our readers know, was dropped, but so ably did Mr. Bromley handle the subject that, since an Act has now passed, we would rather hear him on it than anyone else. Any contribution by Field on the new Law Courts will also be of exceptional value.

We understand that the following deputations have already been appointed:—

From Birmingham Law Society—Messrs. A. Ryland, C. T. Saunders, B. Chesshire, and G. J. Johnson.

From Gloucestershire Law Society—Messrs. T. M. Croome (President), H. Plumble, R. Ellett, and J. W. Burroughs.

From Liverpool Law Society—Messrs. M. J. Hors (President), J. H. E. Gill (Vice-President), W. A. Jevons, and F. D. Lowndes.

From Manchester Law Association—Messrs. M. Bateson Wood (President), G. F. Wharton (Vice-President), J. Cooper, and W. H. Guest.

From Newcastle and Gateshead Law Society—Messrs. G. W. Hodge (Sheriff of Newcastle), J. W. Swinburne (Town Clerk, Gateshead), R. S. Watson, and T. G. Gibson.

From Worcester and Worcestershire Law Society—

Messrs. W. Allen (President), J. Stallard, T. G. Hyde, and W. P. Hughes.

From Yorkshire Law Society—Messrs. Thomas Hawdon (President elect), John Holtby (Vice-President elect), and William Walker (Hon. Sec.) (Their President, Mr. R. Perkins, is prevented from attending by a recent death in his family).

A numerous deputation, not yet named, is also promised from the Northern Circuit Committee of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association.

The following solicitors also hope to be present:—

From London—Messrs. E. Benham, E. Bromley, J. M. Clabon, E. W. Field, E. Hedger, J. A. Rose, W. Shaen, C. F. Tagart, J. S. Torr, H. J. Francis, Stephen Williams, &c., &c.

From Birmingham—Mr. E. J. Hayes (Town Clerk).

From Leeds—Messrs. J. D. Kay, and F. H. Barr.

From Liverpool—Mr. T. Avison.

From Manchester—Messrs. J. F. Beever (Chairman of Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association) W. H. Partington, &c.

From Wareham—Mr. Freeland Filliter (Mayor).

From Bath—Mr. E. C. Petgrave.

WHENEVER AN ACT IS PASSED which seeks not merely to amend the law in details, but further to consolidate into one statute the whole law upon any subject it, of course, always becomes necessary to clear the ground for the new edifice by repealing the Acts previously in existence. It would be of great advantage if the Government draftsmen could be induced to choose some one mode of proceeding in such cases, and to abide by it. The fashion in which they indulge their love of mere variety for variety's sake is very inconvenient to the public. The commonest mode of procedure hitherto has been to insert a repealing section in the consolidation Act itself, and put the list of enactments repealed in a schedule. This plan is adopted, to take a single instance, in the Naturalization Act of the late session. A second plan sometimes taken has been to put only the positive law into the consolidation Act, and pass a separate and supplemental Act to repeal the statutes previously in force. This was the course taken in the bankruptcy legislation of the year 1869. The future law of bankruptcy was set out in the Bankruptcy Act; the old law was repealed by the Bankruptcy Repeal Act. There is no objection that we see to this mode of legislation, if it were uniformly adhered to, provided one precaution be taken—and that is that the title of the repealing Act shall clearly indicate its nature, so that anyone looking at the statute-book for the year shall see at a glance the connection between the enacting and the repealing Acts. In the case of the Bankruptcy Acts this precaution was taken; though it was a piece of great slovenliness not to manage that the two should stand next to one another in the statute book, instead of being separated by a dozen or so of Acts on other subjects.

In the statute book of the last session will be found an example of a third method of procedure, which is perfectly new, and as objectionable as it is new. This method consists in putting the enacting sections into one or more Acts, in the present case into two; and putting the repealing sections into another Act, but carefully labelling the latter with a title which shall not only not reveal its nature, but shall on the contrary expressly represent it to be something which it is not.

Two Acts were passed for the very useful purpose of consolidating all the statutory provisions relating to the national debt, the details of its management, the payment of dividends, the prevention of frauds, and other kindred matters. These are the Forgery Act, c. 58, and the National Debt Act, c. 71, of the session. These Acts contain no repealing clauses. But it was necessary to repeal all the old Acts. In doing so it was perhaps just as well not to entitle the repealing Act, the "National Debt Repeal Act," that might have suggested the idea of repudiation. Still it would surely have been possible to find some harmless title expressing the true nature of the measure. In fact, however, if any of our readers wish for a game of hide and seek, they cannot do better than take the list of statutes of the late session, read their titles, and try to imagine by which of them the old laws as to the national debt are repealed. They will never find it out, so we may as well say at once the Act in question is cap. 69 of the session, the Statute Law Revision Act, 1870. Now, all our readers are probably quite familiar with the fact that within the last few years a series of Statute Law Revision Acts have been passed for removing from the statute book, by expressly repealing them, a vast multitude of obsolete Acts—Acts which from lapse of time, or change of circumstances, from their having been impliedly repealed or entirely superseded by later Acts, had become totally inoperative. The Acts are not very happily entitled, they ought rather to have been called Statute Book Revision Acts. Their object was to facilitate an expurgated, and therefore, condensed edition of the statutes. Their peculiar characteristic was that they purged the statute book, leaving the law unaltered. To have jumbled up under the same title Acts of this nature with an Act such as that now in question—which, alters not the statute book only, but the statute law; which repeals not merely obsolete Acts, but Acts at this moment in full operation,—is a confusion very discreditable to those who have fallen into it.

This Statute Law Revision Act received the Royal Assent on the 9th August last; and if any one looks at the list of repealed Acts, in the schedule to it, he will find that the last in the list is cap. 47 of the same session, an Act passed exactly eight days previously. It is clear therefore that in these days Acts of Parliament grow obsolete at a wonderful pace. Cap. 47 introduced certain changes in the law as to the payment of dividends, especially in Ireland. Cap. 69 repeals the other Act except as to the dividends payable in January next. What the framers of these Acts meant to say was, such a thing shall be done in January next. And the way they took of saying this was, to pass an Act directing it to be done generally, and a week afterwards another Act repealing the former Act except as to January next. This is no doubt an ingenious mode of legislating, and leads to the desired result. But we should prefer a simpler process.

THE SUMMER ASSIZES.

An account of the circuit business of the summer assize having in the two last years proved welcome to our readers, as an index to the condition of common law business in the country, we now give a summary for the year 1870.

HOME CIRCUIT.

The Home Circuit always divides itself naturally, and, indeed, necessarily, into two parts, the distinction between which is pretty strongly marked. The business at the first four towns—Hertford, Chelmsford, Maidstone, and Lewes—partakes very much of the same nature as the average of the business upon other circuits. It is in the main country business, or, at least, business in some way connected with the locality in which the cases are tried. On the other hand, the cases tried in Surrey are, as a general rule, with few exceptions, London causes—the same class of cases exactly which are to be met with at Guildhall.

At the smaller circuit towns the business this summer was fully up to the average in point of amount; and, though there were very few, if any, cases of special importance, or of peculiar interest to the public, the unusually long time allotted by the judges to each place on the circuit was, on the whole, fairly occupied.

At Guildford the cause list was a very long one in point of number of cases. The list at Guildford is never as long as it is in the alternate years at Croydon, yet for Guildford the list was considerably long, there being 119 causes entered for trial; but the chief peculiarity of the assize in Surrey was not the number of causes, it was their character. A list so trivial in character has rarely been seen in this county. It is difficult to say to what cause the fact is to be attributed, whether to the depression of trade or otherwise; but certain it is that the serious commercial causes which generally form the staple of the Surrey list were this summer almost entirely wanting; and in their places was a large crop of cases of the class which the County Court Acts were supposed to have checked very materially. The assize in Surrey lasted, as it invariably does, whatever the amount and character of the business may be, exactly a fortnight.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.

The Nisi Prius business of the Northern Circuit was heavy at Manchester and Liverpool, but the cause lists at the more northern towns hardly reached their usual length. In fact, the number of causes for trial at Manchester almost doubled the aggregate number furnished by the previous towns, whilst the cause list at Liverpool more than doubled that at Manchester. The calendars throughout the circuit were all light in character, although the number of prisoners at some of the towns was very considerable. At Durham 10 causes were entered for trial, and the calendar contained 53 prisoners. There was only one case of exceptional character; a charge of conspiracy against ten pilots for conspiring to prevent a pilot from following his occupation on the Tyne. The cause lists at Newcastle, for city and county, showed an entry of 16, and the calendar, only numbering 16, was remarkably light. At Carlisle, Appleby and Lancaster, the aggregate number of causes was only 91, and the prisoners numbered altogether 27. The contribution to these numbers made by Appleby was one cause and two prisoners only. At Manchester the cause list amounted to 65, of which 20 were entered for special juries. There were eleven claims arising out of railway accidents, in most of which the companies had admitted their negligence and paid money into court, but failed to convince the jury of the sufficiency of the sum. The calendar contained 95 prisoners, but the offences were of a minor description. The Liverpool cause list amounted to the unusually large number of 143, of which 47 were marked to be tried by special juries. A marine insurance case, somewhat curious in its facts, occupied the Court for several days, and the list generally was of a substantial character. The calendar contained only 76 prisoners. The learned judge in his charge to the grand jury, alluded to the number of burglaries and other cases of an unimportant character which superior judges are called upon to try under the present system, and expressed a hope that the Legislature next session would relegate such cases to a lower tribunal.

Our report shows that the circuit has suffered no diminution of work as the result of the extended jurisdiction of the county courts. Most of the cases seemed in general to involve larger issues, and were of more substantial character, than was the average under the old system. The County Palatine of Lancaster makes great use of the special privilege granted to it two sessions ago, to commence actions and file pleadings in the offices of the Palatine Courts. At Manchester 29 out of the 65 causes were entered as from the County Palatine, and 82 out of 143 at Liverpool.

OXFORD CIRCUIT.

The character of the summer assize on this circuit may be sufficiently indicated by the following statistical summary of the civil work:—Reading furnished 1 common and 2 special jury cases; Oxford, 6 common and 3 special; Worcester (and city) 3 and 4; Stafford 14 and 7; Shrewsbury, 3 and 0; Hereford, 2 and 1; Monmouth, 1 and 0; and Gloucester 12 and 7, respectively. The business, on the whole, was a little below the average of the last four years. Monmouth showed a great falling off, and Oxford a large increase. The criminal business involved no characteristic calling for any comment.

WESTERN CIRCUIT.

The summer assize, which began on the 13th July and ended on the 16th August, was uneventful. The civil business was light, the total number of causes amounting to 58, made up of 21 special and 37 common jury cases, as against 49 last spring, and 66 last summer. The falling off of business at such places as Salisbury and Dorchester appears to be permanent. At the former place there were but 2 causes, at the latter but 1. Winchester supplied 8, Bodmin 4, Wells 5, and Exeter 12, Bristol finishing the circuit with a list of 26. There were no cases of general interest or that deserve special comment, almost the only noticeable feature being that slanders of a trumpety nature, which have recently been rare, again on several occasions occupied the time of the Court, until disposed of by the persuasions of judge or counsel, or both. The criminal list, as contained in the printed calendars, numbered 202 prisoners, as against 160 at the same time last year. We have been unable to trace the cause of this increase, which may be merely accidental. The two morals which we have before endeavoured to enforce are supported by examination of the nature of the crimes charged against the prisoners and of their degree of instruction. With regard to the former, as usual about one-half the cases are within the jurisdiction of justices, and very many others are of such a character that they should be put in the same category. The waste of judicial power arising from this circumstance is very great, and forms our excuse for repeating the same thing so often. If the jurisdiction of quarter sessions were to be enlarged, and the judges were relieved from trying all prisoners whose offences were within the jurisdiction of justices, the effect would be to reduce the assize work at such places as Salisbury and Dorchester to some three or four prisoners and one or two causes. How long they would keep their separate assize without amalgamation when this result became apparent we are unable to foretell; but we fancy the distaste already felt on circuit for visiting such an out-of-the-way place as Bodmin would be intensified if the circuit found, on arriving there, two prisoners, and no causes for trial—a thing that might not improbably happen. The Governor of the Somerset County Prisons appends to the calendar a very complete summary statement of the offences with which the prisoners for trial are severally charged. From this we gather that, out of 45 cases, 19 were within the jurisdiction of justices—a proportion smaller than usual. There were 11 prisoners who could neither read nor write; 5 who could read; 13 who could read and write imperfectly; and 5 who could read and write well. Not one of those in custody was of superior education, but 11 were on bail, and their degree of instruction not marked in the calendar. Looking at the offences with which the bailed prisoners were charged, there is nothing to lead to the inference that any of them, with one exception, were of superior education; but, assuming that they were all of superior education, the proportion of imperfectly educated is very large, and enforces a conclusion which is borne out by the general statistical criminal returns, that our criminals come from the uneducated class. Few are sanguine enough to hope that education will entirely eradicate crime, but the coincidence of crime and ignorance is one that affords no slight argument to the advocates of compulsory and universal education.

MIDLAND CIRCUIT.

The amount of business has been quite up to the average, and the importance of the cases tried, perhaps rather above it. At Warwick there was an entry of 10 causes, two of them being special juries. The only cause which occupied any considerable length was one in which a clergyman brought an action for libel against two boys, for imputing indecent conduct to him; the defendants pleaded a justification, and after a trial of nearly two days, the jury found a verdict for the defendants. In the Crown Court there were 48 prisoners, an unusually heavy calendar, comprising 2 charges of murder; neither of these latter, however, were found guilty of the full offence, but were both convicted of manslaughter. At Derby, there were only 7 causes, two being special juries, and a very light calendar; none of the cases at this place call for remark. At Nottingham also the calendar was light, and there were 7 causes. One curious charge of perjury, against a man named Burton, was tried here; he had been the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries against the Midland Railway, and, at the trial, had been carried into court in such a deplorable condition that the company at once threw up their defence, and paid him compensation. Afterwards, the defendants, having reason to believe that they had been deceived, moved for a new trial, on the ground that the man had been shamming, and that he had been seen working in the fields on the day before the trial. On showing cause against the rule being made absolute, Burton had sworn on affidavit that he had not left his house for some time before the trial, and it was upon this affidavit that perjury was assigned. The jury found him guilty. At Lincoln, there were few prisoners, but the cause list was heavy, there being 11 cases, and one of them, Merton v. The President of Magdalen College, Oxford, occupied some time; it was a question whether the boundary line between two parishes as defined by the boundary commissioner was the correct one; the jury, by their verdict, upheld the decision of the commissioner. There was also a case of Fellows v. Briggs, claiming and establishing a right to a several fishery in part of the river Trent; these rights, owing to the increase of salmon since the Salmon Preservation Act, are now becoming of importance in this river. At York there were 19 causes, and amongst them a criminal information against Sir Henry Edwards for bribery at the last Beverley election. The learned judge directed an acquittal, on the ground that the prosecution had failed to connect the defendant with the acts of bribery on which they relied; he also ruled that evidence of what had been done at former elections could not be admitted on this trial. At Leeds another criminal information was tried, in which the editor of the Sheffield Daily Telegraph was found guilty of a libel on the Earl and Countess of Sefton. At this place, 59 causes were entered, 24 being special juries. This appears to be about the average number of cases; last spring there were 53. The sittings lasted nearly a fortnight, notwithstanding that Mr. Justice Brett finished the criminal work in a very short time (there being only 40 prisoners), and was thus enabled to assist the Lord Chief Baron in disposing of the causes. There were 8 actions against railway companies for personal injuries, and as far as one can judge from what has taken place at these assizes, there seems no reason to complain that railway companies are unable to obtain justice at the hands of juries before whom their cases are tried.

NORFOLK CIRCUIT.

The amount of business on the Norfolk Circuit this summer has been about up to the average. The causes entered have been 34 in number, of which 11 were marked for trial by special juries. The circuit consists of nine counties, and these figures therefore give an average of not quite 4 causes to a county.

The only causes worthy of remark were the following:—At Northampton a plaintiff recovered the large sum of £2,000 for a breach of promise of marriage. At Huntingdon the Middle Level Commissioners were sued for flooding a considerable extent of fen land, just as a few years ago they were sued for a like cause at Norwich, in the great case of Coe v. Wise. In Merton v. Vaughan, at Norwich, an important point was reserved on a policy of marine insurance—viz., whether an underwriter on a time policy was liable for loss of ship whilst towing another ship on a voyage, and not merely assisting her in distress. In Betts v. The Great Eastern Railway Company, which took upwards of two days to try at the same place, the question was raised whether surplus lands which the defendants had not sold did not, in course of time, vest in the adjoining owners, under the Lands Clauses Act. In Cracknell v. The Mayor &c. of Thetford, entered for trial at the same place, it was sought to make the defendants responsible for flooding the lands adjoining the Brandon river by their mismanagement of the navigation and neglect; and the action was referred to an arbitrator to state a special case for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer. An action between the same parties for the same causes was tried in 1867, and afterwards decided in favour of the defendants by the Court of Common Pleas on a special case.

Most of the actions were of a substantial nature, which may in some measure be attributed to recent county court legislation; the bulk of them also were fully tried out, the result probably of light cause lists, and of there being therefore no inducement to hurry the business over; indeed on circuits like the Norfolk, where there is no pressure of time, references are only resorted to when necessary, and remanets are almost unknown. Since the county courts have possessed their admiralty jurisdiction there has been an absence from the lists of causes arising out of collisions at sea, which formerly found their way to Norwich from the neighbouring ports of Yarmouth and Lowestoft; they may be tried more cheaply now, but scarcely we should imagine so satisfactorily.

The criminal business was of the usual extent, there being perhaps 130 cases in all. The only exceptional case was that of the atrocious Denham murder.

NORTH WALES CIRCUIT.

At Newtown, the first assize town, there was no civil business, and only three criminal cases. One was a charge of stealing, to which the prisoner pleaded guilty. The other two were for housebreaking. All the prisoners, except the first, were strangers to the county. In Merionethshire, the business consisted of one criminal case, and three causes, one of them a special jury. The special jury was an action against the Great Western Railway by a passenger, injured by being jerked violently against the carriage in which he was carried, the engine and train being thrown off the line. The cause of this accident was an accumulation of gravel, occasioned by floods, against the effects of which it was contended the company were bound to provide. It resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, with £50 damages. The first common jury case tried—an action for services rendered as an engineer—ended also in a verdict for the plaintiff; whilst the second was removed to Carnarvon. At that place the only cause for trial was the one thus sent from Dolgelly, an ejectment by a building society for a forfeiture, which terminated in a verdict for the claimants. There were only four prisoners, the offences charged being of an ordinary description. Beaumaris contributed only one cause. This was an action of trespass, involving the question of an alleged right of way. After a long trial it eventuated in a verdict for the defendant. The name of one prisoner only appeared in the calendar, against whom the grand jury ignored the bill. Ruthin yielded two causes. One was an action of ejectment, in which the verdict was for the claimant. The other cause was referred. The calendar contained four prisoners; a case of aggravated assault was the only crime of a serious character. Mold, which terminates the North Wales Circuit, yielded only one writ to the cause list; an action for goods supplied to a mining company, ending in a verdict for the plaintiff. Three prisoners were tried and convicted, their offences being of an ordinary character.

SOUTH WALES CIRCUIT.

The prospect of business on the South Wales Circuit was never promising for the late assizes, though, in consequence of the anticipation of two long cases—one a civil cause at Cardigan, and the other the prosecution arising out of the death of the notorious fasting girl at Carmarthen—the circuit commenced early. At Haverfordwest the whole of the business was easily concluded in one day. There was not even a rumour of a cause, and the criminal work was of a very ordinary character. Out of a calendar of 6 prisoners for trial an indictment for sending a threatening letter to extort money, terminating in a conviction, was the only case of any public interest. At Cardigan there was no prisoner for trial, and only one cause entered. That was an action of ejectment brought to establish the claim of the Bishop of St. David's in right of his see, to certain lands within the limits of an ancient manor of which he is lord. The question was whether the land was waste of the manor, or the unenclosed sheep-walk of freeholders within it. Had the case been tried out it must necessarily have occupied several days, as a vast number of Welsh witnesses, requiring the services of an interpreter, were in readiness to be examined on behalf of the respective litigants. A verdict, however, was taken for the plaintiff by consent, on certain agreed terms, leaving four days for the learned judge and bar to make holiday. Carmarthen—like Haverfordwest—contributed nothing to the civil business of the circuit. The case of the Assizes was, of course, the prosecution, instituted by the Treasury, of the parents of the unfortunate fasting girl. Long and tedious as had been the preliminary inquiry before the magistrates, the trial was easily compressed into two days, and resulted in a conviction of the prisoners. There were only three other cases in the calendar, disposed of in as many hours.

Glamorganshire—the important county of the circuit—was expected to be unproductive on this occasion, and so it proved. The criminal business was below the average. The cases most likely to occupy time—an indictment against a police constable for perjury on a beerhouse information; and against a bankrupt for an alleged fraudulent disposal of his goods—terminated early in acquittals. Some indictments for obstructing railway trains by placing stones on the line, were the only other cases out of the ordinary routine. In none of them was a conviction obtained. The cause list was easily exhausted within three days. Three special and four common juries were indeed all it contained. Of the three special jury causes, one, an action for distraining a colliery railway, involving some nice questions of law, was at once referred. The second, an issue out of the Probate Court, to try the competency of a testator, collapsed at an early stage; and the third, an action against a railway company for negligence, eventuated in a verdict for the company. The common jury cases were of an ordinary character; three were tried out, and in the fourth a verdict was found for the plaintiff by consent. The ten days allowed for the assize afforded four days of holiday before the Brecon Commission day. Holidays indeed were rather the rule than the exception, throughout the whole of this unproductive circuit. Brecon was a signal example of this. It was, in fact, almost a blank. There was no prisoner, and a small action for dilapidations against the executors of a deceased clergyman—terminating in a verdict for the defendants—was the scanty material to occupy the attention of the bench and bar. The small county of Radnor, generally, as might be expected, very unproductive of business, on this occasion, however, contributed much more than its share to the sum total of the circuit. The criminal business consisted of five cases. Two of them were indictments for maliciously wounding sheep, a crime previously not unknown in that locality. They terminated in acquittals, as indeed did all the other cases in the calendar—the commission of jail delivery for this county being thus of an intensely practical character. The causes were both special juries, one an action against an attorney for negligence, in which the jury, failing to agree, were eventually discharged. It involved very nice legal questions. The second was an issue raised by the return to a mandamus under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts. With this unusually heavy crop, yielded by the smallest county on the circuit, the summer assize for 1870 terminated.

CHESTER ASSIZES.

At Chester the legal harvest was very scanty for the united professional strength of the North and South Wales Circuits. On the Crown side the work was almost unprecedentedly light, and easily finished by noon of the second day of the assize. The calendar afforded a list of cases, for the most part, of a very trifling character; nearly half of it being made up of a batch of prisoners charged with a riot of no very aggravated description. In consequence of the business in the Crown Court terminating thus speedily, the learned judge who presided there proceeded to assist the Chief Justice in the trial of causes; and, as the same counsel were retained in many of them, the practical difficulty in securing their presence when the cases came on for hearing was often very great. The list, which only contained an entry of 11 causes, was concluded on the morning of the fifth day of the assize. The common juries were of a very ordinary character. Two miserable actions for slander, arising out of family quarrels, were well disposed of by the withdrawal of a juror. One, a question of disputed boundary, was early referred. Of the special juries, one was an action of ejectment to recover an undivided moiety of land, which occupied the Court for two whole days. It ended in a verdict for the claimant, but with numerous points of law reserved for the Court above. An action of libel against an editor of a newspaper for an article reflecting on the character of the plaintiff, occasioned considerable local interest, and resulted in a verdict for £50 damages. A sporting action by a gamekeeper against his late employer, to recover a large sum for rearing game on the estate, ended in a verdict for the defendant. There were two actions tried involving railway contracts; but none of the "accident cases" in which companies figure as defendants, and which usually swell the cause lists, were found in it on this occasion. None of the other cases tried require special notice. The whole circuit business was concluded on the 12th of August.

PATENT CASES.

THE PROCEDURE UNDER THE 21 & 22 VICT. C. 27, AND 25 & 26 VICT. C. 42.

NO. II.

Appeal motion for a new trial.

An appeal from the finding of the judge or the verdict of a jury is not properly an ordinary appeal; but a motion to the judge who tried the issues, or to the Appeal Court, to direct a new trial. The motion is made upon the evidence taken in the Court of first instance, and the judgment and finding of the judge; or if there is a jury, upon the evidence and the judge's charge to the jury. This is the course of proceeding directed by the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27. The clauses of the Act regulating the course of proceeding seem to have been framed with a view to establishing a close similarity on the trial of issues, between the proceedings at law and proceedings in equity; in fact, a species of fusion.

Section 5 of the Act directs, where either party is dissatisfied with the trial, that he may "apply for a new trial, either to the judge before whom the trial was had, or to the Court of Appeal in Chancery," viz., to the Lords Justices or to the Lord Chancellor. The Act does not in terms say whether the Court to which the application is made, shall have any other power than that of directing a new trial; and, in the early days of the new practice, it was considered a question whether, when the application was made to the Appeal Court, it might not reverse the finding of the Court below, and direct a certificate to be entered up for the party against whom the finding had been; and appeal motions for a new trial were framed accordingly in some instances. All doubt, however, upon the point is set at rest by the case of Simpson v. Holliday (L. R. 1 H. L. 315), in which their Lordships held that the Court of Appeal has no power, on a motion for a new trial, to reverse the findings of the Court below on matters of fact; but it may, without directing a new trial, give final judgment on a point of law, and may on that point reverse the decision of the Court below. In the case referred to, the question of law arose upon the specification, so that the finding of the Court below on the sufficiency of the specification, though in form a finding of fact, was in truth a judgment upon a question of law; or, at any rate, the questions of law and fact were blended. A notice of motion for a new trial should therefore now simply ask a new trial. If the notice of motion is before the Lord Chancellor, it must be by special leave, and the notice of motion should state that it is by leave granted on a certain day.

The appeal motion is conducted like any other motion in chancery; all, or a reasonable number, of the counsel on both sides being heard. The evidence used is the evidence taken in the court below, both the oral evidence and the exhibits. It is usual and always advisable in patent cases, where there is any degree of complication, for each side to have a shorthand writer's note, or for both to concur in having one shorthand note. If the parties differ as to what the evidence was, the notes of the judge who tried the issues must be referred to, and they are conclusive as to what the evidence was. Here it may not be useless to mention that, neither on the trial below nor on an appeal, will the Court be bound by the evidence of experts; but it will consider and give weight to that evidence, only, however, as an explanation of scientific terms and matters of science. On any question involving the law—such as what is the construction of the specification, or what is infringement (if the latter question depends at all, as it frequently does, upon legal considerations)—the Court having received from the witnesses explanations of the scientific terms and facts, will decide for itself upon the specification and the exhibits or other information brought before it. Thus, in Simpson v. Holliday (13 W. R. 577), where the question turned upon whether the specification described only one process or two alternative processes, one of which would not be useful; although the great preponderance of evidence was to the effect that the scientific witnesses understood the specification as only describing the useful process, and were not at all misled by it, Lord Westbury, C., held that question to be a question on the construction of the legal instrument; and, in construing that question he determined that the specification did describe two processes, and accordingly decided against the patent; and of the same opinion was the House of Lords on appeal in the same case (ubi sup.). When judgment has been delivered in the appeal court, upon the issues, if it agrees with the finding of the judge or the verdict of the jury, and refuses a new trial, the cause, if not already in the paper of the appeal court, is directed to be put into its paper at an early date. The equities are disposed of unless the defeated party expresses a desire to appeal to the House of Lords, or wishes time to consider as to appealing; in which case the Court will postpone the hearing of the cause. If, however, the cause is heard, the usual course of hearing a cause in equity is followed, as to the hearing counsel and otherwise, if there is anything to argue on the equities.

The costs will, in general, follow the final judgment—viz., if the Appeal Court agrees in the findings of the Court below, or the verdict of the jury, it will make a decree with costs against the defendant; or dismiss the bill with costs, as the case may be. But in this, as in other proceedings in equity, the costs are in the discretion of the Court, and in a case in which the writer was counsel for an unsuccessful plaintiff, though the Court dismissed the bill on a defect of law in the patent; and as in consequence the bill was filed by a plaintiff who had no title, and would, in the ordinary course have been dismissed with costs; yet inasmuch as the greater part of the expense had been caused by an objection raised by the defendant and the evidence on a matter of fact, on which the Court was with the plaintiff, the bill was dismissed without costs.

Appeal to the House of Lords.

If either party is dissatisfied with the decision of the Court of Appeal, an appeal from that decision lies to the House of Lords. In Curtis v. Platt, the Vice-Chancellor (the present Lord Chancellor) found for the plaintiffs upon the first four issues (validity of the patent), and for the defendants on the fifth, that there was no infringement. Both petitioners moved before the Lord Chancellor (Lord Westbury) by way of appeal, for a reversal of the findings affecting them, or in the alternative for a new trial. That is, the plaintiff moved to reverse the fifth finding, or for a new trial, and the defendants moved to reverse the findings on the four first issues, in case the Court should accede to the plaintiff's motion on the fifth issue. The Court of Appeal affirmed the finding on all the five issues, and made a decretal order declaring accordingly, and disposing of the costs—and that order was enrolled. Both parties presented petitions of appeal to the House of Lords, and prayed the reversal of the Lord Chancellor's decree, so far as it prejudicially affected them. It was objected against the appeal of the plaintiff Curtis, that the appeal could not be sustained in point of form, as it was an appeal on a question of fact; and that the statute gave no such right of appeal; against which it was argued, that the 30th section expressly provided that from any order made by the Court upon a motion for a new trial, there shall be the same right of appeal as from any other order of the court. And so the House of Lords held, the Lord Chancellor in part of his judgment thus expressing himself: "The Court of Chancery knows no distinction between orders founded upon question of law, and those upon matters of fact, and the words of the 3rd section applying generally to any order made upon an application for a new trial, and there being nothing in the 5th section which can be considered as creating any distinction between the different kinds of trial, whether with or without a jury, the regular course of appeal in both cases must equally be open to the parties; and, therefore, the general appeal is not incompetent." The case was then argued upon its whole merits (L. R. 1 H. L. 337), and the judgment of Lord Westbury affirmed. This case is quite distinguished from the case where no motion for a new trial has been made. It is very material, as before observed, to bear in mind the true nature of the course of proceeding upon a motion for a new trial; because, where there is no jury, and the judge finds the facts, and then makes a decree accordingly, and no motion is made for a new trial, the judge's finding is exactly equivalent to the verdict of a jury, and is conclusive upon the facts, assuming that no reference is made in the decree to the evidence; so that, if the decree does not refer to the evidence, but merely to the issues and findings, no appeal can be made on the merits. This is shown by the case of Fernie v. Young (14 W. R. 714). In that case issues had been tried in the court below, by Vice-Chancellor Stuart without a jury. His Honour found on all the issues for the plaintiff Young on the 26th May. On the 1st June the cause came on for hearing, and the learned Vice-Chancellor made a decree, reciting the trial and the findings, the patent, the specification, and the answer, but not the evidence. On the 18th June, the defendant enrolled the decree without having moved for a new trial. On the case coming on to be heard by the House of Lords, a preliminary objection was taken by the respondent Young, that the appeal could not be supported, on the ground that the appellant had not moved for a new trial, but had enrolled and accepted the decree as it stood. And that the decree not referring to the evidence, the House of Lords would not look at the evidence, but would decide only on the decree as it stood—and of that opinion were their Lordships—and the decree being in conformity with the findings, the appeal was dismissed.

Lord Cranworth, L.C., however, in his judgment, expressly relied upon the fact that the decree did not refer to the evidence, and said, "Where the decree refers to the evidence which has been given in the cause, which is substantially part of the decree, it may be looked at here and always is looked at here." His Lordship's judgment therefore proceeded entirely on the ground that as the decree did not make the evidence part of it, they could not go into the merits as to the facts. And their Lordships by no means decided that the findings of the Court below must in all cases be taken to be binding, merely because there has been no motion for a new trial. The inference to be drawn from the language of the Lord Chancellor, is on the contrary, that if in such a case as Fernie v. Young the party intending to appeal were to take care to have the evidence referred to in the decree, the House of Lords would review the whole merits.

The decision of the House of Lords in Curtis v. Platt is quite consistent with Fernie v. Young. In Curtis v. Platt the judge of the first instance had found all the issues as to validity of the patent in favour of the plaintiff; and the fifth issue in favour of the defendant. On the motion for a new trial, the Lord Chancellor did not interfere with, but affirmed all the findings and disposed of the costs. A preliminary objection was taken, as above mentioned, that no appeal would lie on questions of fact. But it was held that the order of the Court of Appeal might be appealed to the House of Lords under the 3rd section of the 21 & 22 Vict. In Simpson v. Holliday what the Lord Chancellor had done was not simply to refuse a new trial, but to reverse the Vice-Chancellor's finding, and to decide and declare the patent bad in law. The House of Lords held that such reversal of the findings was irregular as ultra vires; but that was immaterial, as they held at the same time that his Lordship had power to decide the question of law, and to decree accordingly, and that that decree might be appealed. From these three cases Fernie v. Young, Simpson v. Holliday, and Curtis v. Platt,—it is submitted that the following conclusions may be drawn:—

1. That if a party to a trial by issues does not move for a new trial, but leaves the judge to make a decree, and the decree does not refer to the evidence, the evidence cannot be looked at upon appeal to the House of Lords, and the findings of the judge are conclusive.
2. That if the decree does refer to the evidence, the whole case is open on appeal.
3. That though on a motion for a new trial to the Court of Appeal, it cannot reverse the findings of the Court below; yet if it agrees with these findings, it may make a decree consistent with them, and on such decree an appeal will lie to the House of Lords, provided the decree refers to the evidence.

LEGISLATION OF THE YEAR.

CAP. XXIX.—An Act to amend and continue "The Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869."

The Wine &c. Act, 1869, made various alterations with respect to licences and other matters connected with the sale of beer, &c., by retail; and in the ordinary course of English legislation it has since been discovered that many amendments are necessary, and the present amending Act was passed to supply them. It repeals section 9 and alters the wording of six of the other sections in the Act of 1869, and it contains a number of provisions relating to the subject of that Act. The law, therefore, on these questions cannot be ascertained until both statutes have been read. No change is made in the general law, but much of the legal machinery is altered in detail for the purpose of more efficiently carrying out the scheme of the principal Act.

Section 4 substitutes in section 7 of the Act of 1869 "the superintendent of police of the district" for "constable or peace officer acting within such parish, township, or place," and allows the notices under that section to be given by registered letter. It allows certificates under the Act of 1869 to be stamped with an official stamp instead of being signed by the justices, and fixes a fee of four shillings to the clerk of the justices for the renewal of certificates and one shilling to the constable for the service of notices. Justices may either allow, refuse, or adjourn an application for a transfer. Section 9 and the proviso of section 5 of the Act of 1869, by which in some cases certificates may be transferred and certificates for licences under 23 Vict., 24 & 25 Vict., and 26 & 27 Vict. may be granted by justices in petty sessions and special sessions respectively are repealed, and 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, and Acts amending it relating to justices' licences, are to have effect with regard to certificates under the Acts of 1869 and 1870.

Sections 17 and 19 of the Act of 1869 respecting convictions are extended to this Act, and the period of five years mentioned in section 17 is changed to three years (section 5).

Section 6 contains provisions to prevent evasions of the law by persons licensed to sell beer, &c., &c., not to be consumed on the premises. It alters the wording of sections 15 and 16 of the principal Act so as to make them more complete, and it gives power to a constable to require any person present in a licensed house at a time when such house ought by law to be closed to give his name and address. If such person refuse to do so he is liable to a penalty. Section 7 extends the 19th section of the Act of 1869 to renewed licences, and it contains some provisions in detail respecting convictions recorded upon certificates. When a licensed house is required to close for the sale of any liquors during any time, such house shall close also for the sale for all other liquors and of all other articles whatever (section 8). When a renewal of a certificate is refused licences held under it shall become void unless there is an appeal against such refusal (section 9). The qualifications for a certificate for an additional licence to the holder of a strong beer dealer's licence to retail beer are assimilated (except in cases of renewal of existing certificates) to those required in case of licences to retail beer for consumption on the premises (section 10).

By sections 11 and 12 power is given to justices to postpone applications for renewals, and they are forbidden to reduce penalties for offences against the Acts to less than twenty shillings. Houses licensed to retail sweets are to be liable to be visited by constables under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 113, in the same way that houses licensed to sell fermented and distilled liquors are liable (section 13). Persons guilty of felony are for ever disqualified from selling spirits by retail (section 14).

Section 15 gives a justice power to grant a warrant to search houses where it is suspected that liquors are being unlawfully sold, and section 16 provides that there shall no longer be granted to brewers of beer brewers' licences to retail beer not to be drunk on the premises, and it repeals the sections of former Acts under which those licences have been granted.

The Act is to be cited as "The Wine and Beerhouse Amendment Act, 1870." It only extends to England, and, together with the Act of 1869, it is to remain in force for two years from the date of its passing, and to the end of the then next session of Parliament.

CAP. XXX.—An Act to abolish attachment of wages.

It is seldom that a statute with its preamble so accurately and fully explain themselves as is the case with this short but by no means unimportant Act. The preamble recites, first that by an Order in Council the clauses in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, relating to the attachment of debts were extended to the county courts. It then omits to express, though it plainly enough implies, a recital which, if expressed, would run as follows:—"And whereas, by Jones v. Thompson (E. B. & E. 63), Dresser v. Johns (6 C. B. N. S. 429), and divers other cases, it was decided that nothing can be attached under these clauses except legal debts already due, though the period of payment may be postponed, and therefore it was clear law that accruing wages could not be attached; and whereas several county court judges, being ignorant of the law, have issued many attachments against such accruing wages"—The next recital is expressed in full, and, if we are not misinformed, it by no means overstates the truth. It runs, "Whereas much inconvenience has arisen by the attachment of wages to satisfy judgments recovered in some of such first mentioned courts (i.e., county courts), and it is expedient to prevent the attachment of wages to satisfy judgments recovered in any court of record or superior court"—The Act then goes on to enact simply that no order for the attachment of the wages of any servant, labourer, or workman shall for the future be made by any Court of record or inferior Court.

CAP. XXXIV.—An Act to amend the law as to the investment on real securities of land held for public and charitable purposes.*

The Act 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, is commonly referred to as a Mortmain Act, though in some text-books this is said to be an inaccuracy. As the Act is directed to the restraint of gifts and conveyances of realty to charities, whereby it would become vested in mortuū manu, it does not seem inappropriate to call it (as Mr. Lewin has done, L. on Trusts, 408) a Mortmain Act. The Act says that after its date no land or money to be laid out in lands shall be given or conveyed to charitable uses unless the same be done by deed, enrolled with certain formalities twelve months before the donor or grantor's death, and unless the gift or conveyance be made to take effect in possession, and be "without any power of revocation, reservation, trust, condition, limitation, clause or agreement whatsoever for the benefit of the donor or grantor." The second section exempts from these requirements as to formalities lands bond fide purchased for valuable consideration. It has been held—though some readers may think that an equity of redemption reserved in a mortgage deed must surely be obnoxious to the prohibition of reservations, &c.—that investments of charity funds by way of mortgage of land are not within the application of that prohibition (Doe d. Graham v. Hawkins, 2 Q. B. 212), and Mr. Lewin (ubi supra) mentions a case of Re Prior's Charity (July 21, 1853, M. R.), in which the Court ordered an investment of the charity funds to be made on mortgage of land, in pursuance of which order £50,000 was placed out on mortgage of an estate in Northamptonshire. But nevertheless the formalities of enrolment, &c., prescribed by 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, are to be complied with. Even where charity land was taken under the compulsory powers of a public company—the Act which conferred the powers requiring that the purchase-money should be laid out in the purchase of other land to be conveyed and settled to like uses—Vice-Chancellor Wood held that the conveyance of the land so purchased must be made with those formalities (Re Christ's Hospital, 12 W. R. 669).

The present statute is intended to facilitate the investment of charity trust funds upon mortgage of realty. Section 1 enacts that it shall be lawful (according to the Queen's Bench case above cited, it was already lawful) for the trustees to invest on any real security consistent with the terms of their trust, without being deemed to have thereby acquired land within the meaning of any Mortmain or other Act, &c., and the formalities prescribed by 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, are not to be necessary. But by section 2, whenever the equity of redemption shall "become liable to foreclosure, or otherwise barred or released," "the premises shall be thenceforth held in trust to be sold and converted into money, and shall be sold accordingly;" and in foreclosure or redemption suits in such cases there is to be no option of ordering sale or foreclosure, but the decree against the mortgagor is to be invariably foreclosure.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

ACCEPTANCE—DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY PENDING WINDING UP.

Ex parte Bolognesi, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 876.

Section 153 of the Company's Act, 1862, declares that every disposition of the company's property after the commencement of the winding up, shall, unless the Court otherwise orders, be void. In the exercise of the discretion conferred on it, the Court will, as of course, confirm bond fide dispositions of property in the ordinary course of business, made after the presenting of a petition for winding up, and completed before the winding up order (Re Wiltshire Iron Company, 16 W. R. 682, L. R. 3 Ch. 443). In Ex parte Bolognesi the late Lord Justice Giffard held that an acceptance, signed on behalf of the company after the commencement of the winding up, was not a "disposition" of the property within the meaning of the foregoing section, but a mere incurring of liability, and so not within the discretionary power of the Court under section 153.

The acceptance was signed by one of the liquidators only. According to the Act (section 133, rule 6), liquidators, when they are in the plural number, cannot accept bills so as to bind the company except through the medium of two, at least, of their number, unless it was otherwise determined at the time of their appointment. Though they can afterwards give an authority to any one of themselves, as in this case, or to their clerk or secretary, yet that must be as confined to the acceptance of a specific bill or bills, and a general resolution that all bills, as in this case, should be signed in a particular way will be bad (Re London and Mediterranean Bank, 16 W. R. 1003, L. R. 3 Ch. 651). The acceptance, therefore, in this case, which was signed by the manager and one of the directors (who was also one of the liquidators), was not binding on the company, and no proof in respect of it was admitted. Had the director signed the bill as liquidator, as in the case of Re London and Mediterranean Bank, the indorsee had notice of the express provision of the statute, and it would have been his own fault if he had taken the bill. As it was, he did not know that the winding up had commenced, and there was nothing on the face of the acceptance to put him on inquiry, for it was signed by two persons as "manager" and "director" respectively, just as if the company were a going concern, and he suffered for his ignorance by having his claim against the company disallowed.

CRIMINAL LAW.

OBTAINING GOODS BY FALSE PRETENCES—OBTAINING USE OF GOODS FOR LIMITED TIME.

Reg. v. Kilham, C. C. R., 18 W. R. 957.

It is not larceny to take the goods of another with the intention of returning them again to their owner. Even if there is a fraudulent intent successfully carried out in so doing, the offence is not larceny, because, to constitute larceny there must be an intention to deprive the owner wholly of the property in the chattel (2 Russ. 4th ed. 160). Until Reg. v. Kilham it was not settled whether this principle applied to the offence of obtaining goods by false pretences under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 88. The only case upon the point was Reg. v. Boulton (1 Den. 508), where it was held that obtaining a railway ticket by false pretences was an obtaining of goods by false pretences, although the prisoner intended to give up the ticket at the end of the journey to the railway company from whom he obtained it. In Reg. v. Kilham the prisoner, by false pretences, obtained the use of a horse for a day, with the intention of returning it to the owner, and he did return it to the owner. The Court held that this did not amount to an obtaining goods by false pretences, and they thus applied the same principle to this offence as to larceny. They suggested that Reg. v. Boul- ton might be distinguished, on the ground that there the prisoner intended to deprive the company of the whole benefit of the ticket, and entirely converted it to his own use for the only purpose for which it could be beneficially applied.

Reg. v. Kilham, if it does not overrule Reg. v. Boulton at all events shows that Reg. v. Boulton is no authority for the proposition for which it has often been cited—viz., that the offence of obtaining goods by false pretences may be complete without an intent to convert the goods wholly to the taker's own use. Reg. v. Kilham quite agrees with the note on this subject in 2 Russ. on Crimes, 4th. ed. 646.

BANKRUPTCY.

FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE.

Ex parte Craven, Re Craven and Marshall, C. J. B., 18 W. R. 1022.

The doctrine of fraudulent preference is one of those many doctrines not founded upon any express enactment, but developed from the general principles, and intended to carry out the general policy underlying the laws of bankruptcy. The leading object of the bankrupt laws is to secure equality among the creditors when any man becomes insolvent. And any device by which the insolvent might seek to defeat this equality was early regarded as a fraud upon the law, which the law would not allow to succeed. Accordingly, if a debtor, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and voluntarily, gave goods or paid money to one creditor with the view of preferring him above the rest, the transaction was deemed fraudulent, and might be avoided by the assignees in bankruptcy. But it was of the essence of a fraudulent preference that it should be strictly voluntary, that it should move from the bankrupt; if the preference were the result of any pressure applied by the creditor, it ceased to be fraudulent.

By section 92 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, "every conveyance or transfer of property, or charge thereon made, every payment made, every obligation incurred, and every judicial proceeding taken or suffered, by any person unable to pay his debts as they become due from his own moneys, in favour of any creditor, with a view of giving such creditor a preference over the other creditors, shall, if the person making, taking, paying, or suffering the same become bankrupt within three months after, &c., be deemed fraudulent and void as against the trustee of the bankrupt; but this section shall not affect the rights of a purchaser, payee, or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration."

In the case which we are now considering the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy has decided that this section has made no change in the law as to fraudulent preference so far as the necessarily voluntary character of the preference is concerned. "The fraudulent preference which is made void [not voidable only, as it was under the former law] by the statute, is the same fraudulent preference as was invalid before, for the same reason and under the same circumstances. The motive in view which may have actuated the debtor wholly or partially is not material, unless it has also induced him, without pressure or just request from his creditor, to give him a preference over his other creditors."

This decision is clear and satisfactory. But we must confess ourselves wholly unable to understand the learned judge's meaning when he says that the statute has made a fraudulent preference "void, not voidable only as it was under the former law." A transaction is said to be void not voidable when it is void ab initio, for all purposes, and as against all the world. It is said to be voidable only when somebody has an option to treat it as void, but otherwise it remains valid. Under the old law it was in the option of assignees to avoid a fraudulent preference or not. It was, therefore, properly called voidable. The new Act says that such a preference "shall be deemed fraudulent and void as against the trustee." It is, therefore, also voidable, not void.

REVIEWS.

Lives of Eminent Serjeants-at-Law of the English Bar. By HUMPHRY WILLIAM WOOLRYCH, Serjeant-at-Law. London: W. H. Allen & Co.

It has been said that every man ought to have his hobby. Lawyers very often have hobbies. One devotes his leisure to music, another to antiquarianism, and a third to drawing or painting. A late Recorder of Stamford made a hobby of change-ringing. Serjeant Woolrych is known in the legal profession as having made a hobby of Serjeants-at-Law and everything connected with them. The dignity of this degree commends itself to our respects on account of its antiquity. The serjeants were the heads of the practising members of the profession when as yet Queen's Counsel were not. In our times the Queen's Counsel have superseded the serjeants and almost driven them from the field. In all courts they take precedence of the serjeants, excepting the Queen's Ancient Serjeant, which office, however, has been vacant ever since the death of the late Serjeant Manning. The serjeants once had the privilege of practising in the Court of Common Pleas to the exclusion of all the rest of the bar, which privilege was at length taken away from them in 1840. They are still addressed by the judges as brothers, they still pay their heavy fees on admission to Serjeants'-inn, and another remnant of their old dignity subsists in the fact that every barrister who is raised to the common law bench passes, if only per saltum, through the degree of serjeant.

But they have long ceased to be the heads of the bar, the rank to which its best members look to rise in natural sequence. The silk gown and not the coif is now the aim of the rising junior. The Queen's Counsel now number nearly 200, while the serjeants scarcely amount to one-eighth of that number. An old institution which in its day has done its work is dying out; it may, however, linger on for many years, its ranks being recruited, as is every now and then the case, by a few men, scarcely equal to the rank of Queen's Counsel, and yet desirous of being placed above the level of the junior bar. Serjeant Woolrych cannot bring himself to accept with resignation the declination of his ancient order; he hopes that the Queen will appoint another Ancient Serjeant, and that the order will be revived in its old glory. The only reason he can find for this, on the ground of expediency, lies in the fact that the serjeants are technically more independent of the Crown than the Queen's Counsel. Before a Queen's Counsel can appear against the Crown permission has to be asked, and though the leave is always obtained as a matter of course, Serjeant Woolrych thinks that perhaps in troublous times it might not be depended upon. A serjeant, on the other hand, is entirely independent, and can appear for whomsoever he pleases. But this distinction will hardly suffice to create a demand for serjeants. If the troublous times referred to should ever arise, it is very improbable, though just possible, that the technical dependence of the Queen's Counsel, should occasion any practical inconvenience; and even if the Q.C.'s were denied to a litigant adverse to the Crown, the junior bar would be a better recourse for him than the serjeants in the declining condition of that body.

The serjeants having been for hundreds of years at the head of the legal profession, it is superfluous to say that the annals of the dignity include very many men whose lives are interesting and instructive subjects for biography. There is Serjeant Maynard, the sound lawyer and honest statesman, the veteran whose integrity and ability kept him in office from the Commonwealth till his death under William III., of whom Macaulay recorded how, at the anxious moment when the Commons, between two kings, as between two stools, were debating on abdication and vacancy—"the orator who took the most statesmanlike view of the subject was old Maynard." Then there is Bulstrode Whitlocke, the friend of Clarendon, and Lord Commissioner in the Commonwealth, whose name is so intimately mixed up with the history of that period; Sir Thomas Crew, the bold assertor of the Commons' rights against James I.; Plowden, whose bust was placed in the Middle Temple Hall last year, and many others. Serjeant Woolrych confines himself to those serjeants who never became judges, excepting such as Maynard and Whitlocke, who attained a species of irregular rank in exceptional times. He has got together with much poring industry a great quantity of matter relating to his heroes (for in the exercise of his hobby he treats them all as such), and anyone wishing information about any one of them will do well to consult this book. He will at least get useful hints and clues from it. Serjeant Woolrych's honest enthusiasm about his subject has so won upon our sympathy that we heartily wish we could say more for the book. We cannot do that. The materials, though gathered painfully from far and wide are ill-digested and shaken down into the two volumes with a careless and vague garrulity. The most unreliable gossip is huddled up side by side with important authentic statements; and the whole composition is vague and inconclusive in the last degree. To make matters worse, the volumes are full of misprints, indeed their number would lead us to imagine that the author cannot have corrected the press at all. The reader is perpetually in doubt as to whether he is reading original matter or quotation, and is bewildered and harassed by every description of garrulous irrelevancy.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

LIABILITIES OF SOLICITORS.

Dear Sir,—There was a case in the Reporter some time ago, not long I think, in which a solicitor was sued upon a letter he had written promising to send some money due from his client. It was held that the solicitor never meant to charge himself, or personally undertake the payment, and he obtained a verdict. I shall feel very much obliged if you or a subscriber would refer me to it. I cannot find it.

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY ACT, 1870.

Dear Sir,—Will any of your readers kindly look at the 7th section of the Married Women's Property Act of last session, and tell me if the following propositions deduced from it are correct?

1. That a woman married after the passing of the Act and becoming entitled to a million of money as next of kin to an intestate takes it for her separate use.
2. That the same woman taking £250 under a deed or will does not take it for her separate use.
3. That the same woman taking furniture or jewels to the value of a million sterling under a deed or will takes them for her separate use.

It seems to me that all three propositions follow clearly from the language of the section, though they are not in accordance with the marginal note of its contents.

C. T. ARNOLD.

COUNTY COURT JURIS DICTION.

Sir,—Can any of your readers answer the following?

The traveller of a merchant residing in the City calls upon a customer in the country and takes his order, and receives directions to send the goods down by "Rail" (in the present case the London and North Western Railway). The goods are sent at the customer's risk.

The London and North Western goods station is at Camden, and the receiving house in the City is "Chaplin & Horne's," who are in truth the company's agents. Chaplin & Horne send round their carts to most warehousemen in a large way of business in the City, to collect their parcels, and they do so to the merchants in question. The various collections are taken to and separated and arranged at Chaplin & Horne's office in Gresham-street, and then conveyed by them to the various stations. Chaplin & Horne are, as before stated, the regularly appointed agents of the London and North Western Railway, indeed they are supposed to be the carriers.

The goods are, in fact, delivered to the railway company's agent in the city.

On applying, however, to the proper officer of the City of London Court, a summons against the country customer was refused, on the ground that the contract with the customer was to deliver the goods to be sent by the London and North Western Railway, and whose goods depot was at Camden Town, and that the latter was the proper district in which to take out the plaint!

On application being made to the county court of that district, they also declined issuing a plaint, on the ground that the delivery was in the City!!

Is there not such a delivery of goods in the City as to entitle the seller to sue the buyer in the City County Court? Or who is he to sue? A SUBSCRIBER.

ECONOMY IN THE COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—A curious bit of Government economy has just been commenced in the London county courts. These establishments have hitherto been supplied by local tradesmen with miscellaneous articles such as firewood, brushes, mats, &c. These are now to be supplied by contract through the Board of Works, and during the last few days some supplies for the winter have been delivered. My informant, a court keeper, says he has had his supplies of firewood, consisting of the ordinary bundles of pine, so well known to every London housekeeper, from a local tradesman, and the price paid has been four shillings per hundred bundles. He has just received his first supply under the new regime, and the price—the contract price to supply all the offices—is three shillings per hundred, or a clear saving of 25 per cent. This is what the Government accounts will show, but the facts show something widely different. The new supply consists of diminutive bundles of brushwood such as may be seen sputtering on the “iron dog” and darting its fiery particles about the kitchens of remote villages. This brushwood, my informant says, is not worth one-third, bundle for bundle, as much as the wood he has been using. According to this, the “saving” actually stands as follows:—Three hundred bundles, or nine shillings’ worth of the new supply are not equal to one hundred, or four shillings’ worth of the old, and this is altogether apart from the relative cleanliness and safety of the two kinds of fuel. It appears that the best London pinewood may be had by contract in large quantities at three shillings per hundred bundles, so that the result is the new supply, which consists of stuff no Londoner will buy at any price, costs as much as the best firewood in the market.

That the “Board of Works and Public Buildings” should manage what may be called the housekeeping department of the county courts seems appropriate enough, but if anything like the results I have indicated should become general under the new management, the County Courts (Building) Act, 1870, had better never have been passed. The Treasury, unfit as they might naturally be thought for the control of public buildings, could hardly have made a worse blunder in a small way (if blunder it be) than this contract for firewood.

COUNTY COURT.

SOLICITORS AND PROCTORS.

Sir,—Will you or some correspondent state if there are now any, and what, matters which only proctors in other than the provincial courts of the two Archbishops, and the Diocesan Court of the Bishop of London, can now act in, to the exclusion of attorneys and solicitors?

By the last section of the recent Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration Act it is enacted “that from and after the passing of the Act it shall be lawful for any attorney or solicitor to perform all such acts as appertain solely to the office of a proctor in any ecclesiastical court, other than [the provincial and diocesan courts mentioned above], without incurring any forfeiture or penalty, and to make the same charges which a proctor would be entitled to make, and to recover the same, any enactment or enactments to the contrary notwithstanding.”

What are the provincial courts of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and where are they situated? The Diocesan Court of the Bishop of London is, I apprehend, as its name implies, situate in London.

In the city where I reside there are some four or five of the solicitors, out of a total of some 150 of us, who are “proctors”—that is, as I understand it, hitherto alone authorised to practice before the bishop’s chancellor here, in cases of “brawls” in churches, grants of faculties, &c. But, if I understand the section of the Act in question, their “occupation” is now “gone,” and any solicitor can now practice before the Bishop’s Court in ecclesiastical matters, so that in fact the old “solicitor and proctor” specially, as such, is now extinct. Is it so? A SOLICITOR.

THE “COURT OF REFERENCE” SCHEME.

The following letters having been addressed to us: we print them, in order to avoid the risk of any injustice, verbatim et literatim:—

To the Editor of the Solicitors Journal.

Court of Reference.

In noticing this in your Journal you set out that it is proposed to have a Barrister for Equity and another for Common Law and in other respects allude to the prospectus you then go on to say that the present system of Arbitration is very faulty that no one has spoken of the defects more than you have done and that there is need for a Court with a Judge to dispose of cases referred to him but to let us have the Court of her Majesty and the Judge a Public Officer and as to your other comments thereon it is a matter of opinion. Now you admit that there is a clear need of such a Court and for years past you have pointed out the crying evils attached to the present system of Arbitration but object to an effort being made to eradicate that evil by private interprise notwithstanding that all former years of pointing out has become unavailing.

I intend to Establish such a Court with such appliances as I have, not in the way you have alluded to but simply by myself and by the aid of the profession and the public. You say you believe we soon shall have such a Court.

When the Law Lords do give us a public Court which I with many others do not expect until most if not all those at present in the profession are snuffed out by time so much the better if we do I shall be only too happy then to hand over the existing Court if any to the Government and avail ourselves of the New Court but if we are to wait for a Court of Reference by influx of time the same as we are likely to do for the New Law Courts it were better to be up and stirring at once at any rate no harm can come of it to any one and let us hope that much good may arise therefrom.

J. T. N. BURNARD.

27, Norfolk-street, Strand, Sept. 22.

Sir,—As the manner you have alluded to “Burnard’s Law Monetary and Adjustment Association “Limited” is calculated to convey an unfavourable impression I hope you will not refuse to insert this, and as to your remark about Mr. Burnard and 7 others taking up the 8 Shares I say it was all that was necessary to restrict the Capitalists Liability, to do more would have been as waste of money and superfluous Capitalists were willing to come in but having Incorporated the Association in my name I was fearful lest anything unforeseen should happen to it, and declined to bring it out (in my name) the Capitalists objected to join if I withdraw it I thereupon preferred to loose the money I had expended than allow its coming out altho all urged the goodness of the enterprise it being principally for negotiating monies and Securities and your comments thereon shows that I adoped a wise course. “that is why you have never heard any more of the Association.”

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. HENRY TYRWHITT JONES MACNAMARA, barrister-at-law, of the Oxford Circuit, and Recorder of Reading, has been appointed a police magistrate of the metropolitan district. The new magistrate is the second son of Frederick Hayes Macnamara, Esq., of H.M.’s 52nd Regiment, and was born in the year 1820. Mr. Macnamara was educated at the Lichfield Grammar School, and was called to the bar at Lincoln’s-inn in November, 1849. He joined the Oxford Circuit, practising as a special pleader, and was appointed Recorder of Reading in 1864. He married in April, 1850, Eliza, daughter of the late Walter Morgan, Esq., of Merthyr Tydvil, by which lady he has a family of two sons and three daughters.

Mr. WILLIAM CURTEIS, solicitor, of Plymouth, has been elected Clerk to the Stonehouse Waterworks Commissioners, vice Mr. J. P. Mann, resigned. Mr. Curteis was certificated in 1858, and is a member of the Plymouth firm of Curteis & Dame.

Mr. EDWARD ARNOLD, solicitor, and Town Clerk of Chichester, has been appointed Clerk to the Board of Guardians of the Chichester Incorporation, in succession to his late partner, Mr. James Powell, deceased. Mr. Arnold, who was admitted in 1862, now fills all the offices in which he officiated for some years during the long illness of Mr. Powell—namely, Town Clerk, City Coroner, Clerk to the Magistrates, and Clerk to the Board of Guardians of Chichester.

Mr. CHARLES ALEXANDER ADAMSON, of North Shields, Northumberland, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in chancery.

OBITUARY.

MR. G. PARKER, JUN.

Mr. George Parker, jun., barrister-at-law, died on the 13th of September, at the residence of his father, Mr. George Parker, of Bank House, Macclesfield. Mr. Parker, who was in his twenty-fifth year, was educated at St. Alban Hall, Oxford, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in June, 1867.

MR. H. DUCKWORTH.

Mr. Herbert Duckworth, barrister-at-law, died on the 19th September, at New Milford, South Wales, in the thirty-seventh year of his age. Mr. Duckworth was the youngest son of William Duckworth, Esq., of Orchard Leigh Park, near Frome, Somersetshire, by his first wife, Hester Emily, daughter of Robert Philips, Esq., of The Park, Prestwich. Mr. Duckworth was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in November, 1859, and for some years went the Northern Circuit, attending also the Liverpool Sessions and Passage Court.

MR. W. J. BACON.

Mr. Walter John Bacon, barrister-at-law, died on the 26th of September, at Malvern Wells, in the thirty-third year of his age. He was the youngest son of Vice-Chancellor Bacon, by his late wife, Laura Frances, daughter of the late William Cook, Esq., of Clay Hill, Enfield. Mr. Walter Bacon was educated at Merton College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1859. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in April, 1861, and was a member of the Northern Circuit, practising also at the Liverpool Passage Court, and at the borough sessions.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

As the prospects of speedy peace diminished, the funds became flat again, and the definitive extinction of these hopes augmented their dullness, and occasioned a decline in price. The foreign market has been weak, more so, indeed, than can be legitimately accounted for by the position of continental affairs, or otherwise than by the supposition that speculation has again been rife in this quarter. The English railway market exhibits considerable disposition to creep above the general dullness, an attitude attributable probably to favourable traffic returns and prospects. Contrary to the expectations entertained last week, this week has witnessed the reduction of the Bank discount rate to 2½ per cent. Considering the vast amount of unemployed money, and the cautiousness with which mercantile engagements have been restricted, even a further reduction is regarded as a possibility. The limit of 2 per cent. has been reached twice only since the Bank Charter Act was passed in 1844—viz., in 1852—3 and in 1862.

Mr. Douglas Straight, barrister-at-law, has been elected M.P. for Shrewsbury, in the Conservative interest, in the room of Mr. W. J. Clement, deceased. Mr. Straight is a son of the late Robert Marshall Straight, barrister-at-law, of the Middle Temple, and was born in 1844. He was educated at Harrow, and was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in November, 1865. He is a member of the Home Circuit, practising principally in criminal matters. Mr. Straight married, in April 1867, Jane Eilers, daughter of William Bridgman, Esq., D.C.L.

At a meeting of the Irish Privy Council, held on the 17th September, the Right Hon. E. Sullivan, Master of the Rolls, was sworn in as one of the Lords Justices for Ireland.

The Government of India is said to have sanctioned the employment of a solicitor in the Wahabee trials, on an allowance of 150 rupees (£15) per diem, exclusive of other expenses. Mr. Chisholm Anstey, of the Bombay bar, is now at Calcutta, engaged as counsel for the prisoners, who are confined for high treason.

LONDON, OCTOBER 8, 1870.

WE ADVERTED IN A FORMER NUMBER (ante p. 831), to the fact that by the passing of the Naturalization Oaths Act, 1870, all reasons for delay in issuing the rules, subject to which certificates of naturalization are to be granted, were removed. The rules, or "Instructions," as they are termed, are now issued, and we print them in another column. They differ very materially from the "Regulations" issued in 1847 for obtaining certificates of naturalization under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66. The most important divergences are (1.) that the old Regulations required, in accordance with the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66, the applicant to state in his memorial "on what grounds he seeks to obtain the right and capacities of a natural-born English subject," which is not now necessary; (2.) that neither of the four householders who now, as heretofore, are required to vouch for the respectability and loyalty of the applicant for naturalization, can now be his solicitor or agent; (3.) that the applicant is now required to have resided for five years within the United Kingdom out of a period of eight years preceding the application, whereas under the old system no previous residence was a necessary requisite; and (4.) the oath of allegiance which the grantee must take was formerly required to be taken within sixty days from the date of the certificate, before a common law judge or a master in chancery, and a certificate of such taking had to be enrolled in the Court of Chancery, but now the oath may be taken at any time after the grant before a justice of the peace or commissioner to administer oaths in chancery, and after the oath is so taken and subscribed by the grantee, the oath and the certificate have to be registered at the Home Office, and this completes the formalities requisite upon a grant.

The fees payable on naturalization are £1 for the grant of the certificate and the necessary documents other than the memorial which must be drawn up by the applicant or his solicitor, and half-a-crown for the administration of the oath. A certificate of naturalization is thus placed pecuniarily within the reach of every alien to whom it would be desirable to grant one.

IN PREVIOUS YEARS WE HAVE generally found interesting matter for comment in the proceedings of the Jurisprudence and Law Amendment Department of the Social Science Association at their annual Congress. This year we have waited to the end of the late meeting and at last have been forced to conclude that the association has not produced anything calling for notice. Lord Neaves, as a Scotch judge, delivered a lengthy address, rather entertaining, though not, that we can see, particularly instructive. He regrets much the Scotch aversion to jury trial, believing, not only that it is the best mode of determining certain classes of facts falling within the comprehension of ordinary men, but that it has an excellent educational effect as to habits of accuracy, care, and impartiality on the classes who take part in it. But he thinks it was a mistake to require unanimity in Scotland, because the Scotch mind is so opinionative, and he rejoices that the rule was afterwards relaxed. He notices another objection to jury trial with which his countrymen have been credited—viz., on account of its finality,—because Scotchmen like "to take their case to review through a succession of tribunals, and they are not satisfied with any more peremptory process." If the Scotch like to have a ladder of many rounds open to them in their litigation—the thing which in our own schemes for amending our judicial system, we have aimed at cutting as short as possible—it must be that they are naturally litigious.

The most noteworthy papers read at the Congress were by Mr. Westlake and others, on the duties of neutrals as to contraband. Their general sense appeared to be an assent to the principle of international law as now understood, that neutrals are not to be expected to interfere with the trade of their own subjects, beyond warning them that any dabbling in contraband will be at their own risk. Dr. Waddilove said that, from the frequency of wars, belligerents had engrossed an undue amount of consideration on the part of neutral powers. Mr. S. S. Dickinson, M.P., thought the existing rule should be reconsidered. He appeared to disapprove of the policy of denouncing a traffic by proclamation, and yet allowing it to be legal. He thought there should be some direct inhibition as to the more unmistakable commodities, such as arms. Captain Noble, of the Elswick Ordnance Works, said this would be an impossibility; either the exportation of arms must be entirely stopped in war time, or they must be allowed to go free.

On the whole, it will not do the Social Science people any harm to find once in a way that the public has not considered them worth listening to. Their object is good enough, but they are rather too fond of hearing themselves talk, and not particular enough about what they have to say. At their ordinary meetings, for instance, we sometimes find papers of a completely worthless description admitted.

WE TAKE THE FOLLOWING FROM the Bookseller of the current month :—

"The Law of Bankruptcy.—Having recently received a notification to the effect that a first dividend of 7d. in the pound was payable on the estate of Mr. —, and that the accounts of the trustees were open to inspection, we availed ourselves of the opportunity to inquire whether the legal charges for winding up the estate bore anything like a due proportion to the extent of the dividend; in reply to the inquiry the trustee politely handed us the bill of costs, which we print in other pages. The firm of solicitors is doubtless one of respectability, and the charges are, we believe, such as they were legally authorised to make. No blame can therefore be attached to them for availing themselves of making their full charges—most other solicitors would do the same. But—and here we think all persons will agree with us—we most unreservedly condemn the law which allows such a state of things to exist. When a trader finds himself insolvent it becomes his duty to submit himself to the direction of his creditors, who should at once have a machinery at hand which will enable them to realise the estate in the most beneficial manner, and to divide the largest possible amount. It is scandalous that the assets should be eaten up in charges which might either be avoided altogether, or which under a different state of things would not cost one-tenth of the present amount. Our intention was to select and analyse some of the items, but this would perhaps weaken the case, which we think will arouse the indignant feelings of all."

This is a temperately written paragraph, and perhaps our contemporary will credit us when we say that no one would rejoice more than ourselves at the invention of a machinery for realising the estates of insolvents in a more beneficial manner than at present. The Legislature has recently abolished, as having been well tried and found wanting, the system of winding up by means of official assignees; and under the new law the process of winding up is left to be conducted more by the creditors themselves. If the Bookseller or anyone else will suggest some "machinery" by which the costs of winding up and realisation may be reduced to a bona fide minimum, it shall have our hearty support. But we are afraid that our contemporary thinks more possible than really is so, and what makes us think so is his speaking of the "legal charges for winding up the estate" bearing "a due proportion to the extent of the dividend." There is a misconception here. The creditors may permit or refuse to permit the trustee to employ a solicitor, and when a solicitor is employed, the extent to which his services shall be made use of in the work of realisation is in the option of the trustee. In the case alluded to by the Bookseller, we find the trustee employing the firm of solicitors whom the debtor had employed to pilot his affairs in the bankruptcy, to write letters to creditors and debtors, get in debts, and pay small amounts, &c., &c. The trustee might if he had chosen have done all this himself. We do not mean to say whether or not it is a trustee's duty to take on himself labour and expenditure of time for which he will be paid nothing; but it is certain that if he employs a solicitor to do the work for him, the latter has, as any other workman has, the right to be paid for time and trouble. But it is a mistake to assume that such "legal charges" can, in the nature of the case, be in any manner "proportionate to the extent of the dividend." The solicitor is to be paid for the amount of the work which he has done, the number of letters he has had to write, &c., &c., and that amount of work done has nothing to do with the proportion which the debtor may pay in the pound. If someone owes twenty-five shillings to the estate, and the trustee wishes the solicitor to get it in, the trouble may be neither less nor more than if the sum was £25, but the solicitor can claim to be paid for the amount of trouble he has taken, and is entitled to nothing more. Of course it is annoying to creditors in the last degree to receive only a few pence in the pound; and angry men can hardly be expected to be just. All the same it is exceedingly unjust to reproach the lawyer for charging for his work done, work which may cost him just as much pains as if the dividend were 17s. instead of 7d. Where improper charges are made, the public are not readier than the profession with the wish for a prompt exposure.

WE ARE VERY GLAD TO FIND THAT Mr. H. T. J. Macnamara, of the Oxford Circuit, has reconsidered his acceptance of the vacant police magistracy, and withdrawn from the appointment.

BILLS OF LADING.

There are few documents whose use is so frequent and form so seldom varied as bills of lading. These instruments are signed by the master of the vessel in which the goods mentioned in them are shipped, and they are used not only as receipts for goods shipped, but are also most extensively employed as securities for the purpose of raising money. The nature and operation of these documents is very peculiar. They contain in terms only a receipt for the goods mentioned in them and a contract to carry such goods from one to another specified port, certain risks being excepted. Long before there was any statutory regulation on the subject, bills of lading were constantly assigned from hand to hand as if they had been negotiable instruments. In law they were not originally negotiable, and the assignment of them did not give the assignee any right to sue in his own name upon the contract contained in them. When, however, there was a sale of goods specified in a bill of lading, the contract of sale passed the property in the goods to the vendee according to the common law rule, and the vendee acquired all rights depending solely on property, for instance, the right to bring trover if the holder of the goods wrongfully refused to give them up. As the bill of lading is a receipt for the goods shipped as well as a contract to carry them, the vendor of the goods always assigned the bill of lading to the vendee at the time of the sale. The assignment is made by indorsing the bill in the name of the vendor, and the bill of lading so indorsed became equivalent to an order to the master of the vessel in which the goods were shipped, to deliver the goods to the assignee. If such delivery was wrongfully refused the assignee might maintain trover for the goods which belonged to him under the contract of sale, but he could not formerly sue in his own name, upon the contract in the bill of lading, that contract being a mere chose in action, and, therefore, not assignable at common law.

This application of the old rule that a chose in action is not assignable was often found very inconvenient, and a statute (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), was passed called the Bills of Lading Act, which renders bills of lading negotiable instruments, that is, the assignee of a bill of lading can now under this statute sue in his own name upon the contract of carriage contained in the bill of lading. This increased facility for the transfer of bills of lading has also increased the use of them as securities for money. In addition to the use of bills of lading as receipts, and now as negotiable instruments, they have also a peculiar operation in consequence of their being treated as symbols of property. The transfer of the property in, and the possession of a bill of lading is equivalent to a transfer of the property and possession of the goods represented by the bill of lading. The sale of the goods would transfer the property from the vendor to the vendee, but if in addition the bill of lading is transferred, the vendee obtains the same rights as if the possession as well as the property had been given to him. This is well illustrated by the law that the sale of goods does not determine an unpaid vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, but the transfer of the bill of lading for the goods puts an end to that right altogether (Lickbarrow v. Mason, 5 T. R. 683). This effect of a bill of lading was recognised long ago, and is not affected by the Bills of Lading Act.

The effect of the assignment of bills of lading under somewhat peculiar circumstances was much considered in Meyerstein v. Barber (18 W. R. H. L. 1041). The facts of the case were rather complicated, but so far as they raised the points of law in question they were as follows: Goods were consigned from Madras to London, for which bills of lading in three parts, in the ordinary form, were given by the master of the vessel in the usual way. The goods were landed at a wharf in London, but were under a stop for freight under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862. The effect of such a stop is that the consignee, or the holder of the bill of lading for the goods, cannot obtain them until the freight is paid. There had been some prior dealings with the bills of lading as securities; but finally, on the 4th of March, 1865, while the goods were under the stop for freight at the wharf, the consignee of the goods (one Abrahams) duly obtained possession of the bills of lading from a bank where they had been deposited, and paid off the money for which they had been a security. Abrahams then held the three parts of the bill of lading, and was absolutely entitled to the goods at the wharf, subject only to the liability to pay the freight. Abrahams then obtained from the plaintiffs a sum of money on the security of these goods, and duly indorsed and transferred to the plaintiffs two parts of the bill of lading. The plaintiffs believed that the third part was held by the master of the vessel in respect of the unpaid freight. On the 6th of March Abrahams obtained an advance on the same goods from the defendants on the security of the bill of lading, and indorsed and transferred to the defendants the third part of the bill of lading, which had remained in his possession. The defendants had no knowledge that the other two parts had been already transferred by Abrahams, nor did they know that the goods had arrived. Subsequently, and as soon as they knew that the goods had arrived, the defendants lodged their part of the bill of lading at the wharf, and the freight having been paid, had the goods transferred to their names, and obtained delivery warrants and sold the goods. The question was substantially to whom did these goods belong, to the plaintiffs or to the defendants? One of two innocent parties must suffer by the fraud.

The plaintiffs contended that they got the bill of lading, and thereby obtained both the property in the goods and also that which was equivalent to the possession of the goods. The defendants argued that, as they obtained a part of a bill of lading in perfect good faith, and as they had completed their right by having the goods transferred to their names, that they ought to be preferred to the plaintiffs, even admitting that the transfer of the bill of lading had, under the circumstances, the usual effect. They further contended that, as the goods had been landed before the 4th of March, and as on that day Abrahams had all the parts of the bill of lading in his hands, and was entitled to the goods on payment of freight, that the bill of lading had completed its object, and its operation as a symbol of property was determined. In short, that on the 4th of March there was no bill of lading, in the strict sense of the term, in existence. The House of Lords, affirming the unanimous judgments of the Court of Common Pleas and of the Exchequer Chamber, decided against the defendants on both points. The Lord Chancellor says "the proposition of law is clear that an indorsement of the bill of lading carries with it the property in the goods, when the goods are at sea;" and again, further on, he says, "the holder of the first assignment for value," although he does not get all the parts of the bill, "obtains a priority over those who obtain possession of the other bills." This result follows necessarily from the fact that there is only one bill of lading, although it is drawn in several parts. Where the bona fide assignment of one part is made, that part is the bill of lading, and the other two are but duplicates. This being the general law, the only question was, in the words of the Lord Chancellor, "whether or not the bills of lading had fully performed their office, and were discharged and spent at the time that the plaintiffs took their security." All the learned lords held that a bill of lading was not discharged until, in the words of Willes, J., in the court below, "a complete delivery of possession of the goods has been made to some person having a right to claim them under it." As there had been no such dealing in this case, the bill of lading was not discharged when the plaintiffs took it. Lord Westbury also says, "It is unquestionable that the handing over the bills of lading for any advance, under ordinary circumstances, as completely vests the property in the pledgee as if the goods had been put into his own warehouse. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the first person who for value gets the transfer of a bill of lading, though it be only one of the three bills, acquires the property, and all subsequent dealings with the other two bills must in law be subordinate to that first one, for this reason—because the property is in the person who first gets a transfer of the bill of lading."

The two points decided in this case have generally, we believe, been recognised as settled law, before the decision in Meyerstein v. Barber. No reported case had, however, directly so decided. These points are now conclusively settled by the decision of the Ultimate Court of Appeal, and the decision is quite in accordance with the mercantile practice which has hitherto prevailed in dealing with bills of lading. It is to be observed that although the first bona fide assignee of one part of a bill of lading gets a complete title to the goods, yet he may lose all right to them if he is guilty of laches. If by his negligence he allows the other parts of the bill to get into the hands of innocent holders for value, he may be prevented from setting up his own title by the application of the rule of estoppel in pais. The judgments do not deal with this question in detail. They only decided that the plaintiffs had not been guilty of any laches. It must also be remembered that the decision in Meyerstein v. Barber deals only with the rights of property acquired by the assignee of a bill of lading. It does not touch the question of the right or duty of the master of a vessel to deliver the goods to the holder of any one part of the bill of lading, whether such holder has or has not the property in the goods. Lord Westbury, who notices the point says, "It might possibly happen that the shipowner, having no notice of the first dealing with the bill of lading, may on the second being presented by another party, be justified in delivering the goods to that party. But although that may be a discharge to the shipowner, it will in no respect affect the legal ownership of the goods, for the legal ownership of the goods must still remain in the first holder for value of the bill of lading, because he had the legal right to the property."

JUDICIAL STATISTICS, 1869.

PART I.

Besides the usual information contained in these returns, we have, for the first time, a statement showing the number and offences of persons convicted at assizes and sessions against whom previous convictions were proved, and who consequently became subject to police supervision under the Habitual Criminals Act, 1869. This part of the returns, however, conveys but little instruction, seeing that it comprises only the short period between the date of the passing of the Act—the 11th of August—and the end of the year, 1869.

The numbers of the police and constabulary force in England and Wales are but very slightly altered from those of the year ending 29th September, 1868. In 1869 the number of the police force was 25,897, consisting of 4 commissioners and assistant-commissioners, 4 district superintendents, 1 inspecting superintendent, 56 chief constables of counties, 144 head constables of boroughs, 513 superintendents, 872 inspectors, 2,623 sergeants, 20,946 constables, 309 additional constables, and 425 detective officers. The principal difference in the constitution of the force consists in the circumstance that in the Metropolitan Police Force 4 district superintendents and 1 inspecting superintendent, officers ranking after the assistant-commissioners, were appointed during the year, and that, amongst other items, there were 15 more sergeants and 206 more detectives, while the increase is partly compensated by a reduction of 174 in the number of constables. The total number gives one for every 844.4 of the estimated population, while in 1868 the proportion was one for every 838.1. When we remember that far less than half the number of the police are on duty at any one time, it appears that, on the most liberal calculation, there is one constable for the protection of about seventeen hundred of her Majesty's subjects, and it cannot be admitted that this one constable is in every case more than equal to his work, nor that the country can afford to reduce the numbers of the police force. Notwithstanding the reduction already pointed out, the pay of the force is increased by no less a sum than £34,259, and it may be presumed that greater efficiency is expected. This difference would be sufficiently accounted for by the payment of salaries to 206 extra detectives. In 1868 the cost of the police under the heading of salaries and pay was £1,573,463, and the total cost was £2,084,596; in 1869 the amounts were £1,607,723, and £2,116,884 respectively. Each man cost on the average £81 14s. 10d., being £1 0s. 11d. above the average cost of each man in the previous year. Out of the total amount (£2,116,884) of the cost of the police, the sum contributed by the public revenue was £448,068, the remainder being provided from local sources.

As regards the returns of the number of depredators, offenders, and suspected persons at large, so far as known to the police, it should be pointed out that hitherto the tables have included headings for "prostitutes" and "vagrants and tramps," but it having been considered that any returns as to the former class must necessarily be uncertain and imperfect, and that, as to the latter class, the term is vague and liable to be differently understood, these headings have been omitted in the returns for 1869, and any persons of either of these classes known to the police as offenders or suspected persons are included under their proper classification. In 1868 these classes alone added nearly 62,000 to the number of criminals at large and suspected persons, an addition which was not warranted by circumstances, independently of the want of accuracy now admitted. Making allowance for the deduction of these 62,000, the returns show that in 1868 the criminal classes and suspected persons at large were 56,584, while in 1869 they numbered only 54,249, a decrease of 2,335, or 4.1 per cent. In the metropolitan police district alone the decrease amounts to 1,436, or 24.8 per cent. It is satisfactory to know that the decrease in the metropolis is attributed in a great measure to the success of the police in obtaining the conviction of many notable offenders, and to their stricter vigilance in forcing others to remove. As in former years, the decrease per cent. in the number of known criminals at large is greater in the metropolitan district than in any other of the groups of places into which the country is divided for the purposes of this return.

In addition to the criminals at large, there were in local prisons (exclusive of debtors and naval and military prisoners), 19,596, in convict prisons 8,864, and in reformatories 4,318, making a grand total of 87,027 as the number of criminals in the country. This number is 641 less than in 1868.

The number of indictable offences committed in 1869 was 58,441, being a decrease from that of 1868 of 639. In respect of these offences 29,278 persons were apprehended, a smaller number than those apprehended in 1868 by 251. There is in 1869 a slight increase in the proportion the number of persons apprehended bears to the number of indictable offences committed, but the increase is merely fractional, the proportion being in 1869, 50.09, and in 1868, 49.9 per cent.

The persons apprehended when brought before the magistrates were disposed of as follows:—

Discharged for want of evidence ...	7,417
" for want of prosecution ...	1,869
" on bail for further appearance if required ...	122
Bailed to appear for trial ...	1,679
Committed for want of sureties ...	43
Committed for trial ...	18,148
	29,278

It appears from this that the number of persons apprehended is about 49.5 per cent. of the known number of indictable offences committed, and that out of the number apprehended 31.7 per cent. were discharged by the magistrates, and therefore that in respect of nearly five out of every six crimes known to have been committed no punishment is awarded.

The principal offences enumerated as having been committed in 1869 are—151 murders, 61 attempts to murder, 699 cases of shooting at, wounding, stabbing, &c., 236 cases of manslaughter, 3,444 of burglary, 1,768 of housebreaking, 716 of robbery with violence, and 40,432 larcenies. There were 22 more murders in 1869 than in the previous year, and 23 more cases of shooting at, wounding, &c., but in the cases of manslaughter there was a decrease of 9.

Under the head of summary proceedings before the magistrates, it appears that 517,875 persons were proceeded against, and that 372,707 were convicted, the remaining 145,168 being discharged. In order to arrive at the total number of convictions during the year, 14,870, the estimated proportion convicted of the 19,827 persons committed for indictable offences, must be added to the number of those summarily convicted, and by this means we obtain the number 387,577, as the convictions of the year, being 25,143 or 6.9 per cent. more than in the preceding year. The summary convictions alone were 25,249 more than in 1868. Again there appears to be an increase in the proportion that summary convictions bear to the numbers proceeded against summarily. In 1867 this proportion was 70.6 per cent., in 1868, 70.7 per cent., and in 1869, 71.9 per cent. The males proceeded against continue to be about 80 per cent. of the whole number, the remainder being females.

Among the penalties inflicted in respect of these 372,707 summary convictions, we find that 51,314 were imprisoned for periods varying from fourteen days to six months and upwards, and that 41,340 were imprisoned for periods of fourteen days and under; 2,609 were sent to reformatories and industrial schools, 232,624 were fined, and 811 were whipped, the latter punishment being inflicted in 102 more cases than in 1868.

Among the entire number of persons apprehended for indictable offences, and of those summarily proceeded against it appears that 21,001 were known thieves, and that 209,832 were of previous good character, and the character of 34,152 was unknown. The number of known thieves at large was 12,434 of whom 1,825 were to be found in the metropolitan district.

In the year 1869 the number of appeals to Quarter Sessions from the decisions of justices was 95, being 11 more than in 1868, and 4 more than in each of the three preceding years; 53 of the decisions appealed against were affirmed, and the remainder were quashed. Thus there was only one appeal to every 5,536 summary convictions, and only 1 conviction in 12,280 was quashed; but we can have no statistics of the great mass of cases in which parties are too poor or too ignorant to appeal.

Besides the appeals to Quarter Sessions 10 appeals were removed into the Court of Queen's Bench, 4 of which were argued, in 2 of which the judgment was for the appellant, and in two for the respondent.

In 1869 there were 57 cases stated for the opinion of the Superior Courts, of which 49 were removed into the Court of Queen's Bench, 5 into the Court of Common Pleas, and 3 into the Court of Exchequer; 51 of these cases were argued, in 19 the judgment was for the appellant, and in 27 for the respondent, and 4 cases were remitted. The number of cases so stated in 1868 was 49.

Coroners' returns show the number of inquests held during the year to have been 24,709, being 65 less than in the previous year. Verdicts of murder were returned in 1869 in respect of 165 infants one year old and under, being 1 less than in 1868. The total number of verdicts of murder was only 265. Inquests were held on 6,854 infants seven years' old and under, and 1,643 on children between the ages of seven and sixteen. Of the children seven years' old and under 21.0 per cent. are said to have been illegitimate.

The expense of holding inquests amounted to £77,546 18s., being an average of £3 2s. 9d. for each inquest; in 1868 the total cost was £76,520, and the average for each inquest was £3 1s. 9d.

LEGISLATION OF THE YEAR.

CAP. XXXV.—An Act for the better apportionment of rents and other periodical payments.

The old rules of common law did not make any apportionment of rent in cases where the recipient died between two rent days. Thus, where the interest of the deceased determined with his death, and the lease was not binding on his successor, the portion of rent for the interval between the last rent-day and the death was actually lost. The representatives of the deceased could not sue for it, and as no other person had any claim, the lessee might keep it in his own pocket. To the hardship arising from this state of the law was added some amount of uncertainty arising from the well meant efforts of the Court of Equity to get over the injustice by applying rules of its own, equitable enough in their particular operation. In those cases in which the lease was binding on the successors, the common law awarded the whole of the current instalment to the heir, or devisee, or reversioner, or remainderman (as the case might be), not making any apportionment in favour of the executor or administrator. Thus, taking par exemple the simplest case, that of a lease made by owner in fee who afterwards died midway between two rent days; as the rent, though accruing de die in diem, became payable only on the periodical rent-day, the executor or administrator could claim nothing for the interval between the last rent-day and the death, and the heir or reversioner, &c., would be entitled when the rent-day came to receive the whole instalment, thus getting the rent for a portion of time antecedent to the commencement of his own estate in possession. (It need hardly be explained that arrears of rent, that is, instalments which had actually become payable at rent-days prior to the death, went to the executor or administrator.) Somewhat similarly it was held in the case of dividends on the public stocks that where a testator, entitled to the dividends for life, died between two dividend days, his executors could claim no apportionment, but the whole half-year's dividend should go to the reversioner (Pearly v. Smith, 3 Atk. 260; Michell v. Michell, 4 Beav. 549, &c.). Secus as to the interest on money lent: the distinction may seem to be one involving no difference, but as to periodical payments of that kind it was considered that the interest on a loan is not one entire thing, but an aggregate of many things, and so there should be an apportionment, right and left, of the interest accrued before the death and the interest accruing after. Even where the money had been secured on mortgage (Wilson v. Harman, 2 Ves. Sen. 673), or bond (Banner v. Lowe, 13 Ves. 135) conditioning it to be payable by periodical instalments, it was held that there ought to be an apportionment, "because there interest accrues every day for forbearance of the principal" (Lord Hardwicke in Pearly v. Smith, ubi sup.).

The Apportionment Act (11 Geo. 2, c. 19) remedied partially the injustice arising from the old common law rules. Applying only to land and to those cases in which the lease was not binding upon the successor, it gave to the executors or administrators of the deceased tenant for life the power of recovering from the lessee a due proportion of the current instalment of rent.

Some doubts as to the application of that Act to certain cases of tenancy pur autre vie were provided for by the subsequent Apportionment Act, 4 Will. 4, c. 22. After declaring that the Act of Geo. 2 should be taken to apply to the case of leases determining at the death of the maker, though such maker should not have been strictly tenant for life, the Act of Will. 4 proceeded to carry the apportionment further; its second section provides that not only rents, but annuities, pensions, dividends, moduses, compositions, and all other periodical payments payable under subsequent instruments, shall be apportioned. But, having regard to the preamble of this Act, it has been settled by the decision in Brown v. Amyott (3 Hare, 173), followed in Re Clulow's Estate (5 W. R. 544, 3 K. & J. 689), that the Act, like the Act of Geo. 2, applies only to those cases in which the interest of the deceased was one which determined at his death. Therefore, in the case which we took just now of a lessor seised in fee dying between two rent-days, the Act of Will. 4 effects no apportionment between heir and executor. It is important, too, to note this difference between the Acts of Geo. 2 and Will. 4. The Act of Geo. 2, applying to cases in which the lease is not binding on the successor, gives the representatives of the deceased power to sue for the apportioned rent; but the 2nd section of the Act of Will. 4 includes cases in which the lease, &c., continues in force under the successor, and the section provides that as to those cases the party who has to make the payment is to make it to whosoever would have been entitled before the Act (i.e., to the successor), and the latter is to account for the proper proportion to the representatives of the deceased. Moreover, as to such rents &c., continuing to the successor, and therefore not within the Act of Geo. 2 (e.g., leases under a power), as might have been created before the Act of Will. 4 (of course at this date such cases must be getting scarce), the Act of Will. 4 would not apply, and consequently in such cases there would be no apportionment between the successor and the representatives of the deceased.

It was held in Re Markby (4 M. & Cr. 484) that the Act of Will. 4, and in Cattley v. Arnold (7 W. R. 245, 1 J. & H. 651) that the Act of Geo. 2, did not include tenancies from year to year created by parol.

Such being the state of things under the common law, with the superimposed statutes of Geo. 2 and Will. 4, the present Act is intended to fill up the chinks between the two former Acts. Section 1 therefore enacts that after the passing of the Act (1 Aug. 1870) "all rents, annuities, dividends, and other periodical payments in the nature of income (whether reserved or made payable under an instrument in writing or otherwise) shall, like interest on money lent, be considered as money accruing from day to day, and shall be apportionable in respect of time accordingly." So that when the death happens after the 1st of August last, the Act applies to periodical payments created at any date whatever. Thus in the simple case which we have twice instanced, if an owner in fee, having leased for twenty-one years ten years ago, dies hereafter, midway between two quarter days, his next of kin will get half a quarter's rent, and the heir the other. By section 3 the apportioned rent is to be payable or recoverable when the next entire instalment would have been payable or recoverable.

Section 4, following the distinction already made by the two former Acts, between cases in which the rent does and does not continue, provides, in substance, that in the latter case the representative of the deceased shall be entitled to recover the apportioned payment directly from the person liable to make the payments; while in the former case the paying party is to pay the successor, who is to account to the representatives of the deceased.

The Act is not to comprehend payments under insurances, or any case in which apportionment is stipulated against. It extends to Scotland and Ireland, as to which latter principally the deficiency was already partly supplied by the 49th section of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 154.

CAP. XXXIX.—An Act to facilitate the transfers of ecclesiastical patronage in certain cases.

The 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 77, appointed the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, with power to hold land notwithstanding the Mortmain Acts. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, s. 73, empowered the commissioners to make arrangements for bettering the endowments or spiritual provision of ill-endowed parishes or districts, by exchanges or other changes of patronage agreed on by patrons with the consent of the bishop. The 4 & 5 Vict. c. 39, s. 22 empowers them to do this, notwithstanding that the patronage belongs to an ecclesiastical corporation. The 31 & 32 Vict. c. 114, s. 12 enacts that whenever a scheme of the commissioners for transferring, for the purpose above mentioned, "any advowson or other estate, or interest in real property" to any person or ecclesiastical corporation, has been ratified by Order in Council, such scheme shall thereupon operate to effect the transfer, without any conveyance being necessary.

The present Act enacts as to such transfers for better providing for the cure of souls, that the powers and provisions of the enactments above mentioned "shall be held to authorise the transfer, by the process and with the consent therein mentioned, of the ownership of any advowson or other right of patronage in any ecclesiastical preferment, or any estate or interest in the same." From which it would seem that the object of this Act is to include such patronage as may not be comprehended within the term advowson. Exempli gratia, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners may now commit simony by dealing in next presentations under their scheme.

CAP. XLIV.—An Act to declare the stamp duty on certain leases.

The circumstances which led to the passing of this Act are well known to practitioners, and were thoroughly discussed in our columns* during their progress. We shall, therefore, deal with them very briefly on this occasion. Section 16 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, provided that where a deed or instrument chargeable with an ad valorem duty "shall be made also for any further or other valuable consideration," it should be also chargeable with "such further stamp duty as any separate deed or instrument made for such last-mentioned consideration alone would be chargeable with, except progressive duty." In those cases in which a lessee covenants to build, repair, or do any other substantial or expensive act, it was never supposed, either by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or the profession, that such covenant was intended to be included in this section as a "further or other valuable consideration." At any rate the commissioners never charged the further duty, which in such a case would be the 35s. deed-stamp. But about the end of last year the commissioners suddenly discovered that such covenants rendered the leases chargeable with the extra duty; and in Boulton's case (18 W. R. 351), the Court of Exchequer decided that this was so. We understand that the section was framed in order to hit a particular power of lease in large use between a Devonshire Earl and a town corporation. The hardship involved in the new found application of the statute is obvious. The ad valorem stamp might be 5s. and a covenant to repair would entail a further 35s. Moreover the thousands upon thousands of leases which had been made under the old practice of the commissioners without the additional duty were now for the first time found to be insufficiently stamped.

To remedy this hardship the present Act provides that no lease already made or hereafter to be made and charged with an ad valorem stamp shall be chargeable with any further duty by reason of the "further consideration of a covenant by the lessee to make, or of his having previously made, any substantial improvement or addition to the property demised to him on any usual covenant." The reader will take notice that a subsequent Act is passed this session, dealing with the stamp duties at large.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT—"TRANSLATION."

Wood v. Chart, V.C.J., 18 W. R. 822.

The International Copyright Act (15 & 16 Vict. c. 12) provides (section 8) that no author of a nation with whom a convention has been concluded, shall be entitled to the benefit of the Act, unless upon compliance with several requisitions, one of which, in the case of dramatic pieces, is, that the translation sanctioned by the author must be published within three calendar months of the registration of the original work. This is a condition precedent to the right to sue. The Act contains no definition of the translation, but, judging from section 4, which enables the Crown, in certain cases, to empower authors of dramatic pieces to prohibit the representation of any translation of such dramatic pieces not authorised by them, the word seems to imply something which is capable of being put on the stage, and is therefore an adaptation rather than a word for word version. The Vice-Chancellor's view is that the requisite translation is something to give the English reader an opportunity of knowing the foreign work as accurately as it is possible to know a work in a foreign tongue, by the medium of any version. Such a translation would be like a school-boy's "crib," and be wholly unfit for representation.

The result of the decision will probably be that, in obedience to a suggestion of the Vice-Chancellor, the Act will be complied with by the registration of a literal translation, which nobody will read, but will serve to protect the adaptation which will be brought out under its shelter.

BANKER AND CUSTOMER—SPECIFIC APPROPRIATION.

Ex parte Massey, M.R., 18 W. R. 818.

The relation between a banker and his customer is often misunderstood. The relation is in general simply that of debtor and creditor. Money paid into a bank becomes part of the general assets of the banker, and he is merely a debtor by simple contract for the amount (Devaynes v. Noble, 1 Mer. 530; see Carr v. Carr, ib. 541n).

In Foley v. Hill (1 Ph. 399) a customer deposited with his bankers a sum, to be repaid with interest. In other words, he opened a deposit account. This was in effect a loan to the bank, and accordingly when upwards of six years had elapsed since the last transaction with reference to the account, the defence of the Statute of Limitations was successfully raised in a suit brought by the customer against the banker for an account.

The ratio decidendi in Ex parte Massey was that the money deposited with BARNED'S Bank, even with a direction to apply it to a specific purpose, was only a debt due from the bank to the depositor; and that he in consequence, the money not having been so applied, could only come in to prove in respect of it with the general creditors. In order that a sum may be ear-marked, there must be not only a direction to the banker to appropriate it for the particular purpose, but also the banker must have so appropriated it, either by carrying it to a separate account in his books, or otherwise. In Farley v. Turner (5 W. R. 666), the facts of which are stated in our report of Ex parte Massey, there was this feature, which distinguishes it from Ex parte Massey, that the banker not only received the money in obedience to his direction, but provided a fund in his books to meet the bill; to the discharge of which the fund so provided was accordingly held to be appropriated.

THE FIDUCIARY POWER OF DIRECTORS OF LIMITED COMPANIES.

Gilbert's case, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 938.

It was established by Weston's case (17 W. R. 62, L.B. 4 Ch. 20) that directors of limited companies have no inherent power to refuse to register proper and valid transfers of shares except where the articles of association enable them to do so. It is also settled by De Pass's case (7 W. R. 682), Chinnock's case (8 W. R. 255), and other cases, that a shareholder may lawfully transfer shares held by him at any moment, for the mere purpose of escaping liability, provided the transfer be absolute. The peculiarity of Gilbert's case was that Mr. Gilbert was a director, and the Master of the Rolls, admitting that an ordinary shareholder in a limited company can immediately get rid of all his liabilities by a transfer, considered that a director was not at liberty, by doing so, to throw an increased liability on the remaining members, of whose interests he was the trustee. It would appear, however, from the report of the decision in Gilbert's case on appeal, that a director is, in general, equally free with any other shareholder, to get rid of his liability, except as regards shares held by him by way of qualification for the post of director, which he must retain, or if he does not hold, will be charged with.

But, although directors have, like ordinary members of companies, a right to free themselves from responsibility by an out and out disposal of their shares, without retaining any interest in them, such right must be exercised, in the case of directors, with due regard to the fiduciary position they occupy. The directors in Gilberts case ought, in the due exercise of the confidence reposed in them, to have made a call upon a particular day. They postponed the call in order to get their shares transferred, and for no other purpose. That postponement was an improper exercise of their powers, and the Court accordingly held them to the same consequences as if the call had been made when it ought to have been made, and the result was that the transfers were determined to be void.

* Ante pp. 108, 292, 309, 329, 371.

CHARGES ON UNPAID CAPITAL.

Re Sankey Brook Coal Company, V.C.J., 18 W. R. 914.

In this case a power to pledge, mortgage, or charge the works, hereditaments, plant, property, and effects of the company, by way of security for money borrowed, was held not to authorise the directors to mortgage the proceeds of future calls generally. The case is quite covered by the authorities. The Vice-Chancellor followed Ex parte Stanley (12 W. R. 894), where the power extended to borrowing on the security of "the funds and property" of the society. King v. Marshall (12 W. R. 791) is to the same effect. Calls, when actually made, may be pledged, though the time for payment has not arrived, under a power to pledge the effects of the company, and it seems that the proceeds of a particular call, which the directors then and there decide upon making, may be lawfully pledged under such a power, though the call be not actually made at the time (Re Sankey Brook Company, 18 W. R. 427). But it is well settled that future calls generally cannot be pledged under such a power as that in the present case, nor indeed, we submit, under any circumstances, unless the right be expressly conferred by the articles. It is not conceivable that the Court would imply, in the absence of express words, that the intention was to confer such a power, the exercise of which would disable the directors thereafter from exercising their judgment in the company's affairs.

PATENT SUITS—JURISDICTION.

Betts v. Gallais, V.C.J., 18 W. R. 945.

The Vice-Chancellor's remarks in this case upon the well-known case of Davenport v. Rylands (14 W. R. 243, L. R. 1 Eq. 302) deserve a passing notice. The bill in Davenport v. Rylands was filed in November, 1864, to restrain the infringement of the plaintiff's patent for the manufacture of chenille. Owing to the plaintiff having made no application to have the cause advanced, the cause was not heard until December, 1866, after the patent had expired. The plaintiff succeeded in showing that, at the time of filing the bill, there was an equitable case; and, accordingly, Vice-Chancellor Wood, who at first doubted whether any relief could be given, there being nothing to enjoin, granted the inquiry as to what damages the plaintiff had sustained, with costs up to the hearing. So in Fox v. Dellestable (15 W. R. 194), where the patent had expired pending the suit, Vice-Chancellor Malins held that the plaintiff would be entitled to an account, although the patent had expired, on the Court being satisfied of the validity of the patent. As Vice-Chancellor Wood pointed out in Davenport v. Rylands, it would be a narrow conclusion to put on a beneficial Act (Lord Cairns' Act to wit) to say that a bill must be dismissed, and the parties sent to law, because the jurisdiction to grant an injunction had determined. There could be no ground for saying that the plaintiff had not been as diligent as he might have been in prosecuting his suit because he had refrained from applying to have the cause advanced. What the Vice-Chancellor condemned in Betts v. Gallais was a species of fraud upon Lord Cairns' Act. A plaintiff files his bill four days before the expiration of his patent, for an injunction, an account of profits, and inquiry as to damages, when he must have known that no application for the injunction could be entertained. As the Vice-Chancellor observed, the patent, for all practical purposes, had expired when the bill was filed, and the proper remedy was therefore by an action for damages, and not by a suit in equity.

DOUBLE PROOF—PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST—APPROPRIATION.

Ex parte Warrant Finance Company, M.R., 18 W. R. 961.

A creditor who has a right of double proof, i.e., a right of proof for the same debt against two estates, goes on receiving dividends from both estates until he has been paid his principal, interest, and costs in full. This is the rule in bankruptcy, and the rule in winding up is the same (Ex parte Warrant Finance Company, 18 W. R. 102, L. R. 5 Ch. 86). The principle is the same as that of a secured creditor (Kellock's Case, 16 W. R. 688, L. R. 3 Ch. 769), the right of proof against the surety's estate being in practice the same as having a separate security.

The question that arose in the present case was how the dividends were to be appropriated. Were the dividends paid by the Joint Stock Discount Company, who indorsed the bills of which the Warrant Finance Company were the holders, to be appropriated to reduce the principal—the dividends paid by the Contract Corporation, who accepted the bills, being applied first in payment of interest upon the debt as reduced by the dividends of the Joint Stock Discount Company? or were the dividends of the latter, like those of the Contract Corporation, to be treated as applied in payment of interest, and then of principal? The decision was that the holders were entitled to treat such dividends as ordinary payments on account—i.e., by applying each dividend in the first place to the payment of interest due, and the surplus in reduction of the principal debt. This was the principle recognised by Lord Cottenham in Bower v. Morris (1 Cr. & Ph. 351) as an established rule in bankruptcy.

ADMINISTRATION OF REAL ESTATE UPON SUMMONS.

Colman v. Turner, M.R., 18 W. R. 963.

By the Improvement of Jurisdiction of Equity Act, s. 47, an order for the administration of the real estate of a deceased person may be obtained upon summons, where the whole of such real estate is by devise, vested in trustees, who are by the will empowered to sell such real estate and authorised to give receipts. In the present case, where there was no express devise in trust for sale, but a mere power to sell and give receipts, the Master of the Rolls held that the order on the summons was properly made. So the Court made an order on summons where the trust for sale was only implied, in consequence of a charge of debts (Pigott v. Young, 7 W. R. 235). The section is clearly remedial, and therefore to be construed liberally.

PRACTICE AS TO THE APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVERS PENDING LITIGATION IN THE COURT OF PROBATE.

Hitchen v. Birks, M. R., 18 W. R. 1015.

It is a well-known branch of the jurisdiction to appoint a receiver for the protection of property, pending litigation. Hence, under the old practice, the Court appointed a receiver, pending litigation to determine the right to probate, where administration pendente lite could have been obtained from the Ecclesiastical Court (Atkinson v. Henshaw, 2 V. & B. 85), and even where administration pendente lite had been actually granted (Ball v. Oliver, ibid 96). In Rendall v. Rendall (1 Ha. 152) the Vice-Chancellor Wigram laid it down that where probate or letters of administration have been granted, the Court will not appoint a receiver, pending litigation to recal probate or letters of administration, unless a special case be shown for its interference; and that where probate or letters of administration have not been granted, pending bond fide litigation to determine the right to probate or letters of administration, it is of course to appoint a receiver, unless a special case be shown against doing so.

The jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court to grant administration pendente lite was established in Walker v. Woollaston, 2 P. Wms. 576. The Probate Act now provides (section 70) for the appointment of an administrator of the personal estate where the will is contested, or proceedings are pending for obtaining or recalling the grant of probate or letters of administration; and (section 71) for the appointment of a receiver of real estate under similar circumstances. The jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery is not thereby ousted, but inasmuch as no receiver to be appointed by the Court could do anything more in protecting the property than an administrator pendente lite, Vice-Chancellor Malins refused to appoint a receiver where such administrator had been already appointed (Veret v. Duprez, 16 W. R. 750, L. R. 6 Eq. 329). To appoint a receiver in such a case is entirely a matter of discretion (Grimston v. Timms, 18 W. R. 781), and in the last case upon the subject (Hitchen v. Birks, ubi sup.), the Master of the Rolls held on demurrer that the Court would not now exercise the jurisdiction unless a special case were made. In point of fact, now that an administrator pendente lite is able to protect the property as effectually as a receiver, why should the Court appoint a receiver in a suit for the purpose, when the same result can be arrived at with far less expense by motion in the Court of Probate?

COMPANIES ACT, 1862, s. 116—WHO MAY BE SUMMONED TO GIVE INFORMATION.

Swan's case, V.C.S., 18 W. R. 1017.

The Court may, after it has made an order for winding up a company, summon before it any . . . person whom the Court may deem capable of giving information concerning the trade, dealings, estate, or effects of the company (Companies Act, 1862, s. 116). In Bloxam's case (39 L. J. Ch. 687) the Vice-Chancellor thought that the words which authorised the Court to summon any person capable of giving information concerning the estate or effects of the company, extend to information concerning the estate or effects of the members of the company, and held that the managing clerk of a bank with which the contributory had an account was a person compellable to give information under the section. And in Clement's case (16 W. R. 559), a broker having lodged with the company for registration shares transferred to an infant, who was without apparent means of paying for them, Vice-Chancellor Wood held that the broker was bound to attend and be examined touching the transaction, it being prima facie one to be inquired into. These two decisions were followed in Swan's case, where the sister and the nephew of a contributory were required to answer questions touching their relationship with the contributory, who was indebted for calls, which the company were then attempting to recover. It is obvious, said the Vice-Chancellor, that any person possessing means of information which may enable the company to recover what is due to it, is within the meaning of the Act. On the other hand, where a person was merely a policy-holder, and as such a creditor of the company, he was not deemed to be a person capable of giving information (Re Accidental and Marine Insurance Corporation, 16 W. R. 116); where, however, the decision rested on the fact of an action by the policy-holder against the company, in which the desired information could have been obtained, had been stayed on the application of the liquidator. It is, of course, necessary in every case to be able to show that the person summoned does possess the means of giving the desired information.

BANKRUPTCY.

ATTORNEY—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION—EXAMINATION AS TO THE ACTS, ESTATE, OR DEALINGS OF A BANKRUPT, UNDER BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1861, s. 216.

Ex parte Campbell, Re Cathcart, L.J.J., 18 W. R. 1056.

The law as to privileged communication between client and attorney or client and counsel is laid down in the leading case of Greenough v. Gaskell (1 M. & K. 98), by Lord Brougham in the following terms:—"If, touching matters which come within the ordinary scope of professional employment, they (i.e., counsel or attorneys) receive a communication in their professional capacity either from a client, or on his account, and for his benefit in the transaction of his business, or, which amounts to the same thing, if they commit to paper, in the course of their employment on his behalf, matters which they knew only through their professional relation to the client, they are not only justified in withholding such matters, but bound to withhold them, and will not be compelled to disclose the information or produce the papers in any court of law or equity, either as a party or a witness."

In the latter part of this statement of the law there is a good deal of that looseness of expression so common in Lord Brougham's judgments. But the point to which we wish to draw attention has to do with facts not with documents; and, so far, Lord Brougham's statement is perfectly correct, and as such, has, been repeatedly adopted by later judges. It will be observed that, according to Lord Brougham's statement, in order to protect an attorney or counsel from the necessity of disclosing a fact which has come to his knowledge, two things must appear. First, it must have been a "communication," that is to say he must have learned it directly or indirectly from his client. If he, while acting professionally, has observed a fact for himself or learned it from any source other than his client, he is not privileged from disclosing it; see on this point particularly Brown v. Foster (5 W. R. 292, 1 H. & N. 736). Secondly, the facts must have been communicated to such persons "in their professional capacity." In other words, only such communications are privileged as are made with reference to and for the purpose of the matter in which they are professionally engaged (see upon this point especially Bramwell v. Lucas, 2 B. & C. 745, and Gillard v. Bates, 6 M. & W. 547).

These principles were applied in and are well illustrated by the case upon which we are now commenting. In the course of the bankruptcy of Cathcart, a Scotch writer to the signet was examined, who was agent both for the bankrupt and for his father, Sir John Cathcart. He was asked, among other questions, "Where is Sir John Cathcart residing at present?" And he declined to answer, on the ground that he knew Sir John Cathcart's residence only through acting for him as his legal agent. The matter ultimately came before James, L.J., on appeal, who held that the witness was bound to answer. "A solicitor was only protected from disclosing that which had been communicated to him sub sigillo confessionis—that is to say, for the purposes of professional advice and assistance. . . . A solicitor might know his client's residence without any professional confidence, and the mere statement that he knew his client's residence only in the character of his solicitor was not enough to protect him from disclosing it. If the client was concealing his residence, and the solicitor only knew it because it was communicated to him as solicitor for the purpose of advising his client, that would be professional confidence, and the solicitor could not be compelled to disclose what had been communicated to him."

A second objection was taken by the witness to the question—namely, that it was not a question "in regard to the acts, estate, or dealings" of the bankrupt, within the meaning of section 216 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, the section under which the examination was being taken. The Lord Justice overruled the objection, following therein the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench upon similar words in an earlier Act in Ex parte Vogel 2 B. & A. 219. "You might ask a witness questions about the estate of a bankrupt, and it was only reasonable if he could not give you the information, that you should ask him the address of a person who would tell you."

COUNTY COURTS.

LIVERPOOL.

(Before Serjeant WHEELER, Judge.)

Oct. 5.—Rook v. Turner.Goods damaged by illegal distress.

This action was brought by an owner of house property in Liverpool, to recover £12 13s., said to have been paid by him owing to the default of the defendant, an auctioneer.

Segar, for the plaintiff, said the plaintiff's case was that on the 18th of May Mr. Rook, being informed that Mrs. Cowley, the tenant of a house owned by him, was removing her furniture, sent a bailiff to distrain for a sum of £3 5s., rent owing. The bailiff, upon his arrival, found that the furniture was packed ready for removal on two carts. He entered the house and went into one of the rooms, when the key was turned upon him and the carts were driven off. He was shortly afterwards released, when he took a car and followed the carts, which he overtook. He took possession of one of them with its load, which he took to the defendant's rooms, where they were deposited. The plaintiff was subsequently advised by his solicitor that he had made an excessive distraint, when, to avert legal proceedings by Mrs. Cowley, he agreed to forego the rent owing, to return the goods seized, and to pay the costs. The defendant then received notice from the plaintiff to give up the goods, and the goods were returned, but the plaintiff was served by Mrs. Cowley with a list of goods alleged to be missing. The £12 13s. claimed was the value of the missing articles. That sum the plaintiff had paid to Mrs. Cowley; and by the present action he sought to recover it from the defendant, the goods being lost, it was said, while they were in his possession. A witness stated that he saw one of the boxes open in Mr. Turner's premises.

Mr. Nordon, for the defence, urged that the action could not be sustained against his client. If any person had a right to sue it would be Mrs. Cowley, and not Mr. Rook. Mr. Rook could not sue for the goods of another person. [Serjeant WHEELER.—It seems to me that he is responsible to Mr. Rook, and he himself is responsible to Mrs. Cowley.] As far as these goods are concerned there is no property in Mr. Rook. [Serjeant WHEELER.—He is the bailee.] I submit not. If a person takes goods to Mr. Turner not seized by process of law, he would then be a bailee. The goods in question were put there by way of impounding them. [Serjeant WHEELER.—Whilst the goods are in his possession he is liable to make good to Mrs. Cowley their fair value.] As to certain goods claimed by another lady, a Mrs. Halliday, which were said to have been taken along with the other goods, Mr. Turner could not be responsible for them. [Serjeant WHEELER.—This being a claim for rent, all goods on the premises, to whomsoever they belonged, were liable to be taken.] No doubt that would be so if the distraint was a lawful one; but the right to follow goods off the premises only applied to the tenant's goods. In this case the goods were actually off the premises, being on a cart in the street.

Serjeant WHEELER said the point raised by Mr. Nordon was an important one. The warrant under which the distraint was made was an authority to enter legally upon the premises occupied, and there seize and distrain. Now, these goods were not "there seized and distrained;" they were seized and distrained in Fox-street. There was one thing, however, to be considered with reference to Mr. Nordon's remarks as to the seizure of Mrs. Halliday's goods. It seemed that some of the articles were in a small box, which was placed in a larger one belonging to Mrs. Cowley. Mr. Nordon submitted that Mr. Rook could not sustain his action, and it seemed to him to be a great hardship to bring Mr. Turner to that court to fight the battle of Mr. Rook.

A number of witnesses in the defendant's employ were called, and said that all reasonable care had been taken of the goods. It was denied that any of the boxes had been broken open.

Serjeant WHEELER said one question was whether ordinary care had been taken by the defendant in reference to those goods. In considering this, he must take into account that the defendant's premises were a public auction room, and were known as such by the plaintiff when he deposited the goods there. Assuming that the goods were not returned, it seemed to him that the defendant was only liable if he had been guilty of a breach of duty. The defendant was not an insurer of the goods, and he did not undertake in any event to return them. He undertook to use all reasonable and proper care in his premises. The plaintiff must take the ordinary risks of such a place as defendant's premises. There was no evidence that the defendant had not taken proper care in keeping these goods; and under all the circumstances he thought the defendant was entitled to a verdict.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. MONTAGUE BERE, Q.C., has been appointed Recorder of Bristol, in the room of Sir Robert P. Collier, Attorney-General, who resigned the office to which he was nominated, in deference to the opinion of his constituents at Plymouth. The new recorder is the eldest son of the late Montague Baker Bere, Esq., Commissioner of Bankruptcy for the Exeter district, and Chairman of the Devon Quarter Sessions (who died in 1858), by Wilhelmina Jemima, third daughter of the late Right Rev. Dr. Sandford, Bishop of Edinburgh. Mr. Montague Bere was born on the 9th of July, 1824, and has therefore just completed his forty-sixth year. He was educated at Cheam School, and afterwards proceeded to Balliol College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. (2nd cl. Math.) in 1846. In May, 1850, he was called to the bar at the Inner Temple, and joined the Western Circuit, also attending the Devonshire Sessions. Mr. Bere was appointed Recorder of Penzance in February, 1857, and continued to hold that office till May, 1862, when he was nominated Recorder of Southampton. He was for some years the leader of the Western Circuit Sessions. In June, 1869, he was made a Queen's Counsel, and was soon afterwards appointed to conduct the inquiry ordered by the Poor Law Board into the irregularities of the St. Pancras Union, which duty he is considered to have performed very ably. At the beginning of the present year, on the transfer of Sir Richard Couch to Calcutta, it was announced that Mr. Montague Bere was appointed to succeed that gentleman as Chief Justice of Bombay; but this appointment did not take effect, it being afterwards decided to raise one of the local judges to the dignity of Chief Justice, and Sir Michael Westropp accordingly received the appointment. Mr. Bere married, in August, 1852, Cecil Henrietta, second daughter of Captain T. W. Buller, R.N., of Strete Raleigh, Exeter, by which lady he has a family of five sons and four daughters.

Mr. GEORGE CHANCE, barrister-at-law, of the Oxford Circuit, has been appointed a magistrate of the Lambeth police court, in the metropolitan district, Mr. H. T. J. Macnamara having withdrawn his acceptance of the vacant magistracy. Mr. Chance was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge where he graduated B.A. (twenty-third wrangler) in 1843; he was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in November, 1846. He was a member of the commission appointed a few years ago to inquire into the trades union outrages at Sheffield.

Mr. ROBERT FISHER THOMPSON, solicitor, of Kendal, has been appointed by Mr. T. H. Ingham (Judge of County Courts Circuit No. 3) Registrar of the County Court of Westmorland holden at Kendal, and the appointment has been confirmed by the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. DAVID BLACK, solicitor, of Brighton, has been appointed Solicitor to the Brighton Intercepting and Outfall Sewers Board. He was admitted in 1841, and holds the offices of Town Clerk of Brighton, and coroner for the borough.

Mr. EDMUND FAUNCE HARDWICK, solicitor, of Littlehampton, Sussex, has been appointed Clerk to the Littlehampton Burial Board, in succession to Mr. Robert French, solicitor, who has resigned. Mr. Hardwick was certificated in 1865, and has for some years acted as Deputy Clerk to Mr. French, with whom he has been latterly in partnership.

Mr. William Lawrence, of Newbury, Berks, known for many years past as assistant magistrates' clerk both in the county and borough police courts, died on the 24th of September, aged sixty-four years.

The Lord Chancellor is now the minister in attendance on her Majesty at Balmoral, having left town on the 26th ult., to relieve Mr. Goschen. His lordship will continue at Balmoral until the 10th inst.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

COUNTY COURT JURISDICTION.

Sir,—The question which your correspondent, "A Subscriber," in last week's Journal, asks is one which only one man can answer, and his answer will depend on the meaning he attaches to the words "part of a cause of action." Each judge interprets these words for himself, and, of course, differences of opinion exist, and not only do judges differ from each other, but from themselves at different times. The City Court furnishes a case in point of the latter kind of difference. Another case of the kind came under my notice just after the passing of the County Courts Act, 1867, which was the first to give jurisdiction to a Court on the ground that part of the cause of action arose within its district.

An applicant for a summons produced a letter from his debtor ordering goods, and the applicant contended that the receipt of the letter was part of the cause of action within the meaning of the 1st section of the Act. The point was referred to the judge, who decided that the receipt of the letter was not part of the cause of action, inasmuch as it was not an act of the debtor but an act of the creditor, and to found jurisdiction the debtor must have performed some act within the district. Under this dictum the clerks refused to issue summons for several months, when an attorney made an application based solely on the fact of an order for goods having been received by post within the district. The clerk explained the judges' dictum, and the attorney at once went before the judge and stated his case. The judge said of course the receipt of the order by post was an important part of the cause of action and amply sufficient to found jurisdiction; the debtor had made the post-office his agent, and the delivery of the order by his agent was a delivery by himself. I mention these facts to show that if "a subscriber" applies again to either of the courts mentioned he may possibly succeed in getting his summons issued.

The circumstances described by your correspondent are quite as open to opposite and equally conclusive arguments as the case of the receipt of a letter, and he will, of course, see that his question ought to take the form of "What does the judge think?" Mind, not what did he think, but what does he think now? instead of "What constitutes a delivery of goods?"

I have frequently advised wholesale houses to instruct their travellers to obtain from customers written instructions as to the specific mode in which they wish goods to be sent. Such written instructions constitute the sellers clearly the agents of the buyers for that purpose, and I think places the right of the seller to sue in the district indicated by the instructions beyond the reach of even the most ingenious quibble—that is supposing the second dictum relating to the receipt of letter by post be the true one.

AN OLD HAND

BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES BY J. GIFFORD.

Sir,—Perhaps the author of the notice of the late Mr. Foss in your issue for 17th of September, for which, as a literary student, I beg to thank you, and very much regret that such notices of men who have distinguished themselves in literature are not more frequent, can explain away a difficulty which has frequently been mentioned before.

It is with regard to the "Abridgment of Blackstone's Commentaries," published in 1821, under the name of John Gifford, which is mentioned in your notice as begun by Gifford (a pseudonym used by J. R. Green), and completed by Mr. Foss, and by him published under the name of John Gifford.

Mr. Green, who throughout his life used the name of John Gifford, died in 1818.

In 1823 was published "Blackstone's Commentaries," abridged for the use of students (Lond., 8vo pp. 604), also by John Gifford.

The difficulty is this—are these two abridgments the same, the issue of 1823 being that of 1821 with a new title-page only, or are they two distinct works. I may mention that the edition of 1821 is simply "by John Gifford," whereas that of 1823 is "by John Gifford, the author of the Life of Pitt," thus clearly identifying the latter with J. R. Green.

It may perhaps not be known to your readers that John Gifford, who wrote the "English Lawyer," which has passed through upwards of thirty editions, is not the above, but it is a pseudonym of Alexander Whellier.

This is not the first time an explanation of the above has been asked for; amongst other places, I find it referred to in the "Handbook of Fictitious Names of Authors," published in 1868. If you can clear up this point, you will oblige, yours, &c. R. T.

A CASE OF PRESCRIPTION.

Sir,—A. lets a field. B., the owner of an adjoining field (which is used as garden land), fills up the ditch which belongs to A., without his knowledge. A. by accident hears that his ditch has been filled up and wishes to have it reopened, but is told by B. that he claims a right by prescription, it having been filled up and crops grown upon it for more than twenty years. B.'s (A.'s?) tenant has always paid his rent, which, of course, would be as much for the ditch as for any other part of the field.

It appears a hard case that a landlord should by the neglect of his tenant lose his right to property which he supposed he was receiving rent for. I should be obliged by a reference to any similar case that has been tried.

OBITUARY.

MR. W. H. GRIFFITHS.

Mr. William Henry Griffiths, barrister-at-law, died at Lindfield, Sussex, on the 23rd September, in his fortieth year. The deceased gentleman, who was a deputy-lieutenant for the county of Middlesex, was the only son of William Griffiths, Esq., of Great Cumberland-place, London, and Lindfield, Sussex. He was educated at Worcester College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1853. He was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in June, 1854.

MR. G. GRAY.

Mr. George Gray, solicitor, formerly of Newbury, Berks, died at Canterbury on the 16th September, at the age of sixty-one years. He had retired in 1853 from the legal firm of Godwin and Gray, his senior partner being Mr. Henry Godwin, clerk to the county and borough magistrates, and to the commissioners of taxes.

MR. J. J. HUBBARD.

Mr. Joseph John Hubbard, solicitor, of Bucklersbury, City, died at his residence at Upper Clapton on the 25th September, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. Mr. Hubbard was certificated in 1844, and was a commissioner for the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer. For many years he filled the office of clerk to the City ward of Candlewick, and was formerly honorary solicitor to the Shipwrecked Fishermen and Marines' Benevolent Institution, and also to the Fishmongers' and Poulterers' Institution. Mr. Hubbard was likewise deputy steward of St. James's, Duke's-place, &c., and his business was at one time chiefly that of a parliamentary agent. Since 1867 he had been in partnership with his son, Mr. David John Hubbard, under the style of Hubbard & Son. He was a member of the Incorporated Law Society.

MR. W. WHISTON.

Mr. William Whiston, senior, solicitor, of Derby, died there on the 31st of September. He was born in the year 1780, and was therefore now in his ninety-first year. In early life he entered the office of the Messrs. Simpson, solicitors, of Derby, with whom he remained for some years. He was admitted a conveyancer at Gray's Inn, about the beginning of the present century, but his admission as an attorney took place in 1815. He continued to practise as a solicitor at Derby from that time down to the end of 1857, when he retired from the active duties of the profession. He was clerk to the county magistrates of Derbyshire for many years, in which office he was succeeded by his son, Mr. William Whiston, the present clerk. The late Mr. Whiston was a member of the old local militia, in which he obtained the commission of ensign in 1809, being promoted in the following year to lieutenant, which rank he held until the disbandment of the corps a few years afterwards. His remains were interred in the new cemetery at Derby on the 6th inst.

NATURALIZATION ACTS, 1870.

INSTRUCTIONS TO ALIENS APPLYING FOR CERTIFICATES OF NATURALIZATION.

1. Any alien desirous to obtain a certificate of Naturalization must present to one of her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State a memorial praying for the grant of such certificate.

2. The memorial must state—

- (1.) Of what foreign state the applicant is a subject.
- (2.) His name, address, age, profession, trade, or other occupation.
- (3.) Whether he is married, and has any children, under age, residing with him, and if so, to state their names and ages.
- (4.) That during the period of eight years preceding the application, the applicant has for five years resided within the United Kingdom (the place or places of such residence being specified), or that during the same period of eight years he has for five years been in the service of the Crown (the post in which he served being specified.)
- (5.) That he intends to reside in the United Kingdom or to serve under the Crown.

3. The applicant must verify the statements in his memorial by a declaration made before a magistrate or other person authorised to receive such declaration, in pursuance of the Act passed in the fifth and sixth years of his late Majesty King William IV., chapter 62.

4. The statements in the memorial must be further verified, and the respectability and loyalty of the applicant vouched for by a declaration made in like manner by four householders who are natural-born British subjects, and neither of them the agent or solicitor of the memorialist. The declaration may be made by such declarants jointly or by each separately; but each of the declarants must in his declaration state, as to himself, the fact that he is a householder, and a natural-born British subject, the place of his residence, and the period during which he has personally known the applicant.

5. The fee payable upon the grant of a certificate is £1, which will include payment for the registration both of the certificate and of the oath of allegiance.

6. After obtaining the grant of a certificate, the grantee must take and subscribe the oath of allegiance, a blank form whereof will be annexed to the certificate.

7. The oath of allegiance may be taken and subscribed:—
In England or Ireland—

In the presence of any justice of the peace, or any commissioner authorised to administer oaths in chancery.

In Scotland—

In the presence of any sheriff, sheriff-substitute, or justice of the peace.

8. The fee for the administration of the oath is 2s. 6d., payable as follows:—

In England or Ireland, if the oath is administered by a justice of the peace, to the clerk of such justice, otherwise to the officer administering the oath; in Scotland, if the oath is administered by a sheriff or sheriff-substitute, to the sheriff-clerk or any of his deputies; if by a justice of the peace, to the clerk of the peace or any of his deputies.

9. After taking and subscribing the oath of allegiance the grantee of the certificate shall cause the oath to be registered at the Home Office.

10. After registration, the certificate and oath of allegiance will be re-delivered to the grantee of the certificate.
Home Office, August, 1870.

DEDDINGTON.—Mr. Charles Duffell Faulkner, solicitor, of Deddington, Oxfordshire, has been appointed agent for that district to the Liverpool, London, and Globe Insurance Company, in the place of Mr. Henry Churchill, the former agent there. This is the fifth appointment Mr. Faulkner has received since Mr. Churchill's strange disappearance.

The chairmanship of the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Hereford, has become vacant by the death of John Freeman, Esq., of Gaines, in that county, who expired at his seat on the 4th of October. One of the late Mr. Freeman's daughters is married to Charles J. Sidebottom, Esq., police magistrate of Worcester.

Judge Gillespie, of Bellville, Ill., has decided that there is no law in that state to punish adultery where both parties are white.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

During the greater part of the week the funds were daily gaining strength, on a prevailing idea that peace must come before long. Railways also were decidedly firm and the general foreign market nearly as much so. A reaction then took place, which, however, was of very short duration, and to-day, with the commencement of the payment of dividends, has witnessed a further increase of strength in Government securities, while the railway market, though the transactions have been small in extent, has been exceedingly firm. In foreign securities also the few changes of the last day have been principally upward.

BAGGAGE OF PASSENGERS.—We call the attention of our readers to the opinion of the United States Court for the district of Mississippi, delivered by Hill, J., in the case of George F. Ring and wife against the steamer Robert E. Lee, holding that the steamer was not liable for the personal jewelry of Mrs. Ring which she left in her state-room in a small carpet-bag, and had stolen therefrom while she was taking supper as a passenger upon the steamer. It is often a difficult question to determine what articles will be considered a lady's ordinary personal baggage, and under what circumstances a common carrier will be held liable for their value in case of loss. The learned judge states in his opinion that under our recent modes of travel the strict rule, as applied to common carriers in England, and perhaps in this country, has been very properly modified. We remember a case where a gentleman who was a passenger upon a steamer upon the Mississippi river some years ago had his bowie knife and duelling pistols stolen, and it was held they were a portion of a gentleman's ordinary baggage, and that the steamer was liable as a common carrier for this loss. It would be difficult to find a court that would make such a decision now.—Chicago Legal News.
